Mr. SAYLER. I will answer the question of the gentleman from Maine with pleasure. On several different occasions in the organization of the House there has arisen very great confusion. Once the House was not organized during a period of nine weeks and scenes by no means creditable to the American Congress were enacted during that period. In the organization of the Thirty-first Congress, in the organization of the Thirty-fourth Congress, in the organization of the Thirty-sixth Congress, there was the utmost disorder, and in the organization of the Forty-second Congress Mr. McPherson, a most efficient presiding officer, as my friend from Maine will certainly concede, bitterly complained that he had no power whatever under the rules to preserve order any further than to appeal to members. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] asked me yesterday if that was not enough. I think we have had some evidence within the last week that that is not enough. I think we have had evidence in our own experience within the last week that the man who presides over the deliberations of this body—if sometimes they can be called deliberations—needs to have at his command an officer armed with power to enforce the order of the House.

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman propose to give to the Clerk any more power than is now given to the Speaker?

Mr. SAYLER. Not at all. The committee proposes to give to the Clerk pending the election of a Speaker, and at no other time, precisely the same power to preserve order as is now given to the Speaker all the time.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman has just referred to disorders that have ocurred here within the last few days. Now, during those disorders we have had an organized House—a Speaker. I do not see there is anything in what the gentleman proposes that provides a remedy or that giving to the Clerk any power additional to what he has now would do so.

Mr. SAYLER. We have had an organized House. We have had a Speaker, and he has had power to enforce order, and has done it well and faithfully. But if it had been the Clerk who was the presiding officer he would have had no power to order the Sergeant-at-Arms to shoulder the mace, which is the emblem of the Speaker's power. Now what we want is to give to the Clerk pending the election of Speaker the power to control the Sergeant-at-Arms for the enforcement of order.

Mr. CONGER. Does the gentleman not think that among the patriotic members of the next House there will be some gentlemen willing to shoulder the mace and bear it about the House?

Mr. SAYLER. They would have no authority to do so.

Mr. CONGER. Would they not volunteer?

Mr. SAYLER. They have no authority to volunteer. I have no doubt there would be a great many gentlemen willing to shoulder the mace or anything else.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move that the gentleman from Michigan have that privilege.

Mr. SAYLER. I always appreciate the jests of my friend from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] but I ask the House to remember that this is serious business. The only proposition before the House is to add to the twenty-second rule, which makes it the duty of the Sergeant-at-Arms to aid in the enforcement of order under the direction of the Speaker, these words:

And pending the election of a Speaker under the direction of the Clerk.

Mr. COX. I suggest that the confusion is so great that nobody is hearing anything that is said.

Mr. SAYLER. I am willing to yield now to any gentleman who desires to speak.

Mr. CONGER. Does the gentleman propose to confine that privilege to members of the committee?

Mr. SAYLER. Not at all.

Mr. CONGER. Then I would like to have five or ten minutes.

Mr. SAYLER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. CONGER. Unless there is something hidden beneath this rule which gentlemen have not explained, some secret object connected with the organization of the next House, I am sure no reason has been adduced why gentlemen should dare to presume that the members-elect of the next House will need any further control as gentlemen, as men, as members, than gentlemen of this House or any preceding House. What is there in the character of the members-elect of the next House that warrants gentlemen in presuming that they must have unusual restraints placed upon them? I wish the committee would inform the House what there is in the character of the members-elect that requires the Clerk to have power to call upon the Sergeant-at-Arms; what there is that requires it to be necessary that the eagle should be taken down to perform this great duty and to be put up again when he has done it. Mr. Speaker, I will venture that the bird will be taken care of without the proposed change of the rules, and I hope my friend from Ohio will be there to see that it is.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman yield to me one moment?

Mr. SAYLER. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I agree with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that there is nothing in the apprehension of the future that calls for any additional power to be granted to the Clerk of the House. There is no reason to believe that in the organization of the next House any circumstances will arise that call for additional power.

The Clerk of the House is not a member of this body; he is not selected, as the Speaker is, from the floor, with the power that goes with the Speaker; he is simply a creature of the House. The gentleman from Ohio, well informed as he is upon parliamentary history, cannot have forgotten the memorable scenes upon the floor of the House of Representatives in the New Jersey case, where the Clerk of the House, a creature of the House, and of a former House, undertook to exercise certain powers, and when the House rose against him, and John Quincy Adams, then standing upon the floor of the House of Representatives, representing the sentiment of the body, rose above the Clerk, calling him a creature only of the body, and proceeded to put motions that the Clerk had declined to put. That was a memorable instance, and it shows that no additional powers should be given to the Clerk. We are asked to legislate for the future, and we cannot tell how this power may be abused. There is no reason now why this House should vote to lodge in the hands of the present Clerk, much as we may respect him personally, any additional powers over those that have been exercised by the Clerk in past Congresses. I protest against any action that lodges in the hands of that official any power that in the future may tend to hamper, control, and cripple the House of Representatives.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman has occupied my time much better than I could have done myself; but I had some more remarks that I desired to submit.

Mr. SAYLER. I only desire to say, in reply to the gentleman from Maine, that the facts to which he refers occurred prior to the time when the law was enacted which authorized the Clerk of the House to make up the roll of members, and which gave him additional powers in the organization of the House of Representatives. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.]

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, I beg the attention of gentlemen of the House for a few minutes to the character of the proposition which has been made, and when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] has ceased conversing with the gentlemen in his neighborhood I will go on.

Mr. Speaker, stripped of all the adventitious circumstances connected with the proposition made by the gentleman from Ohio representing the Committee on Rules, it means just exactly this, nothing less and nothing more, that if there should be anything extraordinary and unprecedented in the organization of the next House there must be something extraordinary and unprecedented prepared to correct it. That is what it is, and nothing but that. I ask permission to repeat that the proposition which the gentleman from Ohio reports from the Committee on Rules is in substance and in spirit and in effect this: that if any extraordinary and unprecedented conduct should occur in the organization of the next House of Representatives, then there must be prepared in advance extraordinary and unprecedented legislation to prevent it.

Now, what I say to the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] and what I say to the House of Representatives, in all good faith and not speaking as a partisan and not caring what may occur in the next House, is that this House has no right to assume either that extraordinary and unprecedented occurrences are to take place or that extraordinary and unprecedented legislation is required to correct the expected abuses. Gentlemen in this House have had no intimation from any source or from any quarter that any danger of this kind is impending or that any legislation of this kind is required.

Now, sir, let me say a word in regard to what has occurred heretofore on this very subject. I remember very well the organization of a House of Representatives which required nine weeks of time, beginning on the morning of the first Monday in December at twelve o'clock and ending nine weeks after at seven o'clock in the evening. That occurred when the House of Representatives was composed of the ablest men that the country ever knew. I speak with the highest respect of my associates in this House. I know and appreciate their powers, their comprehension of its duties, but I can say without reservation and without injustice to anybody that the House of Representatives to which I refer was stronger in its individual and in its associated power than any House of Representatives that I have ever known in the last twenty-five years. For those nine weeks the Clerk of the House was the presiding officer, and nobody else. It was a time when party feeling ran high. It was a time when the revolution through which we have passed had just shown itself. It was before the insane passions of the people of this country had been cooled by the sacrifice of the blood of more than a million and a half of the best men of the country, South and North. It was before sixteen States of the Union had been ravaged by flame and by the sword. It was before any of these dangers were either anticipated or believed possible, and when men in excitement such as we have not seen in this session, with determination and spirit that has been shown nowhere by anybody this session—when questions were presented men were ready with the bowie-knife and the revolver to defend their own rights and what they considered to be the rights of their people.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Will the gentleman from Masschusetts yield for a question?

Mr. BANKS. Not now; I have but ten minutes. In all those nine weeks Hon. John W. Forney, of Pennsylvania, who was Clerk of the House, had the power, without even the privileges that are accorded by the rule which has been read by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SAYLER,] to suppress every disturbance and to control the House as it never has been controlled by a presiding officer either before or since. And he did this in virtue of his office and in the exercise of his power as Clerk of the House.

Now, does the gentleman from Ohio anticipate any such difficulty in the organization of the next House; has he any right to anticipate it; has any man, South or North, East or West, the right to discredit the next House upon any information we possess by the intention or the assumption that any impending difficulty or danger is likely to exist? No, sir, it does not exist, and therefore this legislation is not necessary. And I return again to the proposition that I laid down in the commencement of my remarks, that nothing but the assumption of the probability of extraordinary and unprecedented dangers can justify the enactment of extraordinary and unprecedented legislation to prevent them.

Let me refer for a moment to what is the general principle of parliamentary law in regard to a presiding officer. It is laid down in Cushing's Manual of Parliamentary Practice, on page 152, concerning the personal deportment of members while the assembly is sitting. It refers to the rights and powers of presiding officers anywhere, whether in a Legislature, in a town-meeting, or any assemblage of citizens:

> For the purpose of obtaining and securing the observance of order and decorum among the members of a legislative assembly while they are sitting as such, the presiding officer is invested with authority to suspend all ordinary business until order is restored; and if order cannot be obtained in any other way to call men by their names, which is equivalent to a complaint against them.

By the announcement of the name of a member who is disturbing the assembly, a complaint is made against him, and he is for the moment under arrest. And the Clerk of the House, as every other presiding officer in a deliberative assembly, public or private, has in that power the privilege and the capacity of putting any member of that assembly under arrest; and he is authorized to call in the assistance of any peace officer that may be within his hearing, whether belonging to the assembly or whether connected with it or not, so it be that his mission and his duty is to preserve the peace. And every presiding officer has that right and that power.

Now, what is the power of the Clerk of this House? It is expressed in general terms on page 49 of Barclay's Manual:

> Pending the election of a Speaker, the Clerk shall preserve order and decorum, and shall decide all questions of order that may arise, subject to appeal to the House.

He is to "preserve order and decorum." In what way? By calling the Sergeant-at-Arms, an officer of the House of which the Clerk is the presiding officer, whose duty it is to preserve the peace. The Sergeant-at-Arms, in the organization of the House, is just as much subject to the order of the Clerk of the House as he is subject to the order of the Speaker after the House shall be organized. And if the Sergeant-at-Arms is not enough, the Clerk can call every police officer in the Capitol; and if the police officers in the Capitol are not enough, he can call the police officers of the city. Wherever there is a man vested with the authority to keep the peace under the Government of which the House of Representatives will then be a part, the Clerk of the House has the right to call in the aid of that man, if necessary.

Mr. BANKS. One moment more. With these powers in the hands of the Clerk; with these powers exercised for seventy-five years without any difficulty at all, and with the additional fact that no difficulties equal to those that have environed this House in the past will affect the next House, there is no reason for us to discredit in advance by such legislative proceedings as these the character of that House. And let me say this is not all that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] proposes, if I correctly understand what is to be proposed. The force in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms is to be increased; there are other Sergeant-at-Arms to be proposed to this House, as I understand it, after this shall be enacted. And I ask the gentleman if this extraordinary and unprecedented legislation is necessary to keep the peace of the next House? What is the danger that threatens that assembly, requiring us in the last moments of this session, when the Sabbath day is breaking upon us, to suspend all legislation connected with appropriations in order to secure the passage of such legislation as this?

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 4187) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1878.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. No. 4691) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and other purposes, and requested a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as the managers of the conference on the part of the Senate Mr. BLAINE, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. WALLACE.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

The House resumed the consideration of the report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] a question. I ask the gentleman, who proposes to give to the Clerk power over the Sergeant-at-Arms, if he proposes to give him power over the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House, or what Sergeant-at-Arms? There is no Sergeant-at-Arms of the next House yet.

Mr. SAYLER. I will inform the gentleman very readily that the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House continues to be the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House until his successor is elected.

Mr. GARFIELD. I want to call attention for a moment to two points in regard to this proposition. In the first place, there are I believe, one hundred and fifty men of the present House who will not be members of the next House; and the proposition is that one hundred and fifty men who within less than twelve hours cease to be members of Congress, shall make a rule in advance to govern three hundred men who are to be here as members of the next Congress.

Mr. SAYLER. I will ask my colleague whether he did not at the opening of the present Congress, assert directly and explicitly that the rules of the former Congress continued to operate in the organization of a new House, and until revoked by that House?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will complete what I was about to say. Every House may determine the rules and proceedings of its own body.

Mr. BUCKNER. Nobody doubts that.

Mr. GARFIELD. Each House may punish its members for disorderly behavior; but no power is given to one House to determine the rules of any other. It has been always ruled here—has been so ruled by the present occupant of the Chair, as well as by his immediate predecessor—that the rules of a former House have no binding authority on us until we adopt them.

Now there is one other point to which I ask attention. No member of this House has any power over any other member, except the Speaker, who is elected by the House, and as our direct superior has power to command the Sergeant-at-Arms to keep order and even arrest an unruly member. But this proposition is to put into the hands of a Clerk, who is no member of the House, the power on his own motion to use the constabulary to control the members of the next House

In other words, a man not a member of the House directs another man not a member to restrain of their liberty members of a House that will assemble here in perhaps a few weeks. I for one will never consent by any act of mine to usurp, or allow any other man here to usurp, any authority over a House that is to succeed us. That House is to be an independent House of Representatives of the American Congress, and it is to keep order for itself, to make its own rules. If that House itself directs the Clerk to use the constabulary to preserve order, it may do so; but this House may not command anything in reference to the next.

I think it not only a menace but a dangerous confession for us here to make, that after more than eighty years of peace and order in the autonomy of the various Houses of Representatives, we are now to have a manufactured machine by which to run the new House before it can be consulted in regard to it. If you adopt this proposition it is a brutum fulmen. The next House is in no way bound to regard it. It is an irrelevant, frivolous impertinence that can only do harm and can have no power, if the next House chooses to assert its rights.

Mr. SAYLER. My colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] is certainly not given to the vice of consistency; and he makes a proposition here which is directly antagonistic to the proposition which I quoted from his own record in the beginning of the last session of Congress. I do not feel that I have occasion to make any further reply to him.

I am sorry that my republican friends have taken a scare at this proposition. I assure them that there is in this proposition to amend the rules no deep-laid scheme, no dynamite that is going to blow up the next Congress. It is simply a plain proposition in explicit terms to invest the temporary presiding officer of the House with the power which my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] says that officer is already possessed of.

It is to me a matter of surprise that the gentleman from Massachusetts should first warn us of the great danger of conferring this extraordinary power, which could only be justified by an extrordinary occasion, and then in the next breath tell us that this officer is at any rate armed not only with this power but with the power to summon any officer of the peace to preserve order. Now, I do not think that he is armed with any such power. I only want that he shall be empowered to preserve order, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall be explicitly declared to be the executive officer who, pending the election of Speaker, shall, under the direction of the Clerk, assist in the preservation of order.

I demand the previous question.

On seconding the previous question there were—ayes 91, noes 73.

Mr. CONGER. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; Mr. CONGER and Mr. SAYLER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 108, noes 75.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered; which was upon agreeing to the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 138, nays 9, not voting 143; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Ainsworth Ashe, Atkins, John H. Bagley, jr., Banning, Beebe, Bell, Blackburn, Bland, Bliss, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, William P. Caldwell, Candler, Caulfield, John B. Herr Smith, Stephens, Stowell, Strait, Swann, Thornburgh, Martin I Townsend, Washington Townsend, Tufts, Van Vorhes, Wait, Waldron, Gilbert C. Walker, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, Ward, G. Wiley Wells, Wheeler White, Whitehouse, Whiting, Willard, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, William B. Williams, Wilshire, James Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, Woodburn, and Woodworth—143.

So the report was adopted.

During the vote,

Mr. POPPLETON stated that his colleague, Mr. MCMAHON, had been called home suddenly by sickness in his family.

Mr. COCHRANE stated that his colleague, Mr. MAISH, was absent from the House on account of sickness, and that if present he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. FORNEY stated that his colleague, Mr. CALDWELL, was paired with Mr. WAITE, who would vote in the negative, while his colleague would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, stated that he was paired with his colleague, Mr. ROBINSON, who, if present, would vote in the negative, while he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. PAGE moved the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Objection was made.

Mr. O'BRIEN stated that Mr. COX had gone into the Senate on a mission of peace and good will in regard to the amnesty bill.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I move the tally-list be read over again.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the roll-call be again read.

The SPEAKER. That is not the gentleman's privilege.

Mr. CONGER. I dispute the report of the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not the right to dispute it.

Mr. CONGER. I have the tally here, which I obtained at the desk.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman was there in violation of the rules of the House.

Mr. CONGER. I was there nevertheless. I claim there were but 143 votes cast, and several gentlemen have kept it as carefully as could be.

The SPEAKER. The clerks assert that it is correct, and the Chair takes their tally.

Mr. CONGER. Have it read again.

The SPEAKER. Is there consent to having the roll-call read over?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I object. I know it is right.

LAKE GEORGE SHIP-CANAL, FLORIDA.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. No. 4456) to authorize William A. Dorner and others to construct a ship-canal at the head of Lake George, Florida.

The bill was read as follows:

That William A. Dorner, of Macon, Missouri, be, and he is hereby, authorized, with such others as may be associated with him, on the conditions hereinafter mentioned, to construct a ship-canal at the south end of Lake George, in Volusia County, Florida, at the point known as Volusia Bar; and for that purpose he may construct in the river or lake such walls, jetties, dikes, levees, and other structures, and employ such boats, rafts, and appliances as he may in the prosecution of said work deem necessary; and to protect his said works, he may build and maintain such levees or embankments as may be necessary to secure their permanency along the banks of the river or lake: Provided, That unless the construction of the proposed work shall be substantially commenced within six months from the date of the approval of this act, and prosecuted with due diligence, the provisions contained herein in relation to the said ship-canal shall be null and void; and unless the said Dorner and his associates shall secure a navigable depth of seven feet of water through said ship-canal within one year after the date of the approval of this act, Congress may revoke the privileges herein granted.

SEC. 2. That in no case shall the Government of the United States be liable for any losses incurred by said Dorner and his associates in the performance of the work herein mentioned.

SEC. 3. That when a channel seven feet in depth and not less than sixty feet in width shall be obtained, said Dorner and his associates shall have full power to collect the following rates of tolls, to wit: For each steamboat, sea-vessel, barge, or keel-boat, ten cents per ton, United States measurement; for each flatboat, $2; for each raft of timber, plank, or other lumber, $2 for each sixty feet in length, not exceeding twenty feet wide.

SEC. 4. That any person maliciously or intentionally injuring said works, or interfering with the construction thereof, or who shall neglect or refuse to pay the tolls as specified in section 3, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and may be tried for such offense before the district court of the United States for the district wherein such offense may be committed; and, if found guilty, he shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $1,000, or to imprisonment for not more than two years, or to both fine and imprisonment as aforesaid, for each offense.

SEC. 5. That Congress shall have the right to purchase said ship-canal from said Dorner and his associates at any time after ten years from its completion, at its actual cost-price, with interest added at the rate of 5 per cent.

SEC. 6. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

The House divided; and there were ayes 41, noes not counted.

So the House refused to suspend the rules, two-thirds not voting in favor thereof.

LAW OF DOWER.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I submit the following report from a conference committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 2043) entitled "An act to improve the law in relation to dower in the District of Columbia," after full and free conference thereon, beg leave to report as follows:

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

WILLIAM LAWRENCE,
WILLIAM P. LYNDE,
SCOTT LORD,
Managers on the part of the House.

GEORGE S. WRIGHT,
JOHN W. STEVENSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The report was adopted.

Mr. LAWRENCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 515) for the relief of Sarah E. Garland and Frank M. Hoppin; and

An act (H. R. No. 4475) removing the political disabilities of Joel S. Kennard, of Savannah, Georgia.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. SCHLEICHER, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House papers on the following pending bills, there being no adverse report thereon:

The bill for the relief of William Vance and brother;

The bill for the relief of Grandison Ruby;

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Ben. Edwards; and

The bill for the relief of Stephen Powers.

On motion of Mr. WARREN, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Bernard S. Swart.

ELECTORAL VOTE OF OREGON.

Mr. PAGE. I move that the rules be suspended and that the resolution which I send to the desk be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this House condemns the recent attempt to defeat the will of the people of Oregon by the refusal of the governor of that State to certify the election of an elector having a majority of the legal votes fairly cast and issuing a commission to a defeated candidate. And the House also condemns and denounces the corrupt use of money to aid in this outrage, and especially the payment of $3,000 to one Cronin, the defeated elector, for his part in the infamous transaction.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to hear that resolution again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me to put into the resolution a condemnation of the offered sale or the consummated sale of the electoral vote of the State of Louisiana for $200,000?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] how much money Wells did get.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is a disputed question. He is not yet paid. He is to get it after the inauguration.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is it competent to move to indefinitely postpone that resolution.

The SPEAKER. It is not; the gentleman from California having moved to suspend the rules and pass the resolution.

The House divided on the question of suspending the rules, and there were ayes—78, noes 95.

Mr. PAGE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

PENSION BILLS PASSED.

The SPEAKER. Pending the call of the roll on the resolution of the gentleman from California the Chair asks that by unanimous consent the House should now act on a number of pension bills which the Committee on Pensions desires to have passed. Unless they are passed immediateiy they cannot be signed and become law.

Mr. CONGER. Will that interfere with the call of the roll?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will order the roll to be called immediately on these pension bills being disposed of.

Mr. CONGER. With that understanding I make no objection.

The following pension bills were, by unanimous consent, read three times, and passed:

The bill (S. No. 210) granting a pension to Austin R. Mills;

The bill (S. No. 735) granting a pension to Martha Irwin, widow of John Irwin;

The bill (S. No. 816) granting a pension to Laura M. Knowlton;

The bill (S. No. 1123) granting a pension to M. F. Woodard, mother of George R. Woodard;

The bill (S. No. 1152) granting a pension to Amasa J. Finch;

The bill (S. No. 535) granting a pension to Armstead Goodlow;

UNION PACIFIC AND CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. FORT. I ask unanimous consent, on behalf of my colleague [Mr. WHITING,] to have a joint resolution in relation to the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroads printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and leave was granted.

The joint resolution is as follows:

Joint resolution in relation to the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroad Companies.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it is hereby declared unlawful for the Union Pacific Railroad Company or for the Central Pacific Railroad Company to declare or pay over any dividend whatsoever upon the capital stock of said railroad companies so long as there remains due and unpaid any interest upon any of the mortgage bonds of said companies, and so long as the interest upon the bonds loaned to the said railroad companies by the Government of the United States to aid in and secure the construction of the same shall remain unadjusted by the said railroad companies.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled, a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 3892) to remove the political disabilities of George Watson Carr, a citizen of Virginia.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. POWELL, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Zebulon Vincent, no adverse report having been made.

NATIONAL MUSEUM.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 1252) for the erection of a fire-proof building for a national museum be taken from the Speaker's table and passed.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That for a fire-proof building for the use of the national museum, three hundred feet square, to be erected under the direction and supervision of the regents of the Smithsonian Institution, in accordance with the plan of Major-General M. C. Meigs, now on file with the Joint Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, on the southwest corner of the grounds of the Smithsonian Institution, the sum of $250,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; said building to be placed west of the Smithsonian Institution, leaving a roadway between it and the latter of not less than thirty feet, with its north front on a line parallel with the north face of the buildings of the Agricultural Department and of the Smithsonian Institution; and all expenditures for the purposes herein mentioned, not including anything for architectural plans, shall be audited by the proper officers of the Treasury Department.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I object.

Mr. CLYMER. I move that the rules be suspended and the bill passed, and I ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement in regard to it.

Mr. MILLS. I object.

The question was taken on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill; and on a division there were—ayes 71, noes 41; not two-thirds voting in the affirmative.

Mr. CLYMER. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CLYMER and Mr. THROCKMORTON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 106, noes 42

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 99, nays 72, not voting 119; as follows:

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. COCHRANE said: I desire to announce again that my colleague, Mr. MAISH, is absent on account of sickness.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 4616) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 4188) making appropriations for fortifications and for other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes.

Mr. POPPLETON, from the same committee, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 3833) for the relief of John N. Hall.

CONGRATULATIONS FROM THE IRISH PEOPLE.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of this session a congratulatory address from the people of Ireland to the people of the United States on the celebration of the centennial anniversary of our Independence was presented to this House and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I have looked anxiously for the report of that committee; but I apprehend the extraordinary press of business before that committee, and the confusion in legislation caused by the unprecedented condition of affairs resulting from the presidential election, has prevented the committee from reporting. I think such an address at such a period in our history, from a people whose cordial love for this Government and admiration for our institutions has been so unmistakably manifested from the beginning to the end of our centennial existence, should not be allowed to pass beyond the period of this session without its merited recognition and acknowledgment. Disclaiming, therefore, the least reflection on the Committee of Foreign Affairs, I offer the preamble and resolutions I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask for their adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the people of Ireland, at a meeting held in the city of Dublin July 4, 1876, representing all sections of that country, adopted with unanimity a congratulatory address to the people of the United States on the celebration of the centennial anniversary of American Independence;

And whereas from the infancy of this Republic down to the present time the generous people of Ireland, who are allied to us by the ties of kindred and sympathy, have proven our friends in time of need, especially during the war of our independence, for which they twice received the thanks of the Continental Congress, and also of our embassador to France, the illustrious Franklin, in 1778;

And whereas at a crisis memorable in the annals of the war of the Revolution, when our brave soldiers under the command of Washington at Valley Forge were suffering the vicissitudes of poverty and distress from want of stores and clothing, they were succored by the patriotic and munificent contribution of nearly a million of dollars generously tendered by twenty-seven of Ireland's sons in Philadelphia;

And whereas by their fervent loyalty in peace and patient sacrifices in war on every field from Lexington to Appomattox, evidenced by their heroic conduct in the van of battle, our fellow-citizens of Irish nationality have ever been among the foremost to contend for the triumph of liberty and self-government;

And whereas, with a view to the appropriate reception and acknowledgment of the address of the people of Ireland, it has been presented to the House of Representatives of the American Congress: Therefore,

Be it resolved, by the House of Representatives, That the people of the United States of America accept the congratulations of the people of Ireland, with a profound acknowledgment and grateful recognition of the cordial sympathy always entertained and manifested toward themselves and their institutions, from the first struggle for freedom of our infant nation to the present time; and sincerely hope that the example of this republic will spread its benign influence among the nations of the earth until the principles of self government shall be firmly established, and descend, as a sacred heritage, to all future generations.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, this Congress should not adjourn without a cordial reception and acknowledgment of the address of the Irish people tendered to the American people on the occasion of the centennial anniversary of our nation's independence.

No nation in the world has afforded deeper sympathy with us during our career as a republic. From the dawn of freedom on this continent the sons of Ireland were distinguished for their noble zeal in behalf of the principles of liberty. By centuries of suffering from every form of tyranny and despotism and unparalleled sacrifices on behalf of self-government, the people of Ireland had become illustrious; and when our first struggles for the rights of the colonies began, Ireland's sympathies were extended to America and Ireland's sons were foremost in the contest, by sea and land, contending for our independence.

There is no field, whether in the peaceful departments of letters, the arts, and sciences, or on the bloody field of war, where America, during our first century's career has achieved fame and triumph, but that a full share of the laurels crowned the brows of the sons of Ireland. To-day, the greetings of Ireland are responded to by millions of American citizens of Irish nativity whose love of our country and devotion to its interests stand unsurpassed. Let every American whose pride in his country's greatness is an inspiration of patriotism remember that the principles which have made us the foremost nation in the world have been cherished for centuries by the people of Ireland, and that though bound by the iron despotism of British power, they have never failed to contribute to our glory and prosperity.

Ireland in chains and America free are kindred nations, bound together by the inseparable ties of blood and the tenderest sympathies which could make two separate nations friends. Brothers, though in adversity, they rejoice in our success and bid us Godspeed for the centuries to come. Let us, Mr. Speaker, accept their congratulations, and in the hope that the day of liberty may soon dawn for the oppressed of every clime we will give renewed courage, hope, and life to a brave and chivalrous people. Therefore, if necessary, Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the preamble and resolutions.

The preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted.

PROCEEDS OF PUBLIC LANDS FOR EDUCATION.

Mr. WHITE. I move to suspend the rules, so as to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of and the House to pass House bill No. 748, to apply the proceeds of sales of public lands to the education of the people. This bill was reported from the Committee on Education and Labor, and I hope it will receive the favorable consideration of the House.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill to apply the proceeds of sales of public lands to the education of the people.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the net proceeds of the public lands are hereby forever consecrated and set apart for the education of the people: Provided, That this act shall not have any effect to repeal, impair, or suspend any law now authorizing the pre-emption of public lands or the entry of public lands for homesteads, nor as limiting in any manner the power of Congress to alter or extend the right of homestead upon such lands: And provided further, That nothing contained in this section shall be held to limit or abridge the power of Congress over the public domain or interfere with granting bounty lands.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause an account to be taken upon the close of each fiscal year, and ascertain the total receipts from the sales or other disposition of the public lands of the United States, including all fees received at the general and district land offices during such year, and the amount of expenditures during said year, incurred or occasioned by the survey, sale, location, entry, or other disposition of such lands, including appropriations for the expenses of the said officers for said years, and shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount of the net cash proceeds from the sale, entry, location, or other disposition of such lands as aforesaid after deducting such expenses and expenditures.

SEC. 3. That upon the receipt of such certificate the Secretary of the Treasury shall, on or before the 31st day of July of each year, apportion to the several States and Territories and to the District of Columbia, upon the basis of population of the said States and Territories between the ages of five and twenty-one years, the net proceeds of sales of public lands for the previous year: Provided, That after five years one half of said net proceeds and after ten years the whole of the same shall be set apart as an educational fund, which said fund shall be invested in the bonds of the United States bearing a rate of interest not less than 4 per cent. per annum, both principal and interest payable in coin, the interest on such educational fund only to be appropriated as above provided: And provided further, That for the first ten years the distribution of said net proceeds and the interest on said fund to and among the several States, Territories, and District of Columbia shall be made according to the numbers of their respective population, of ten years old and upward, who cannot read and write, as shown from time to time by the last preceding published census of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the first appointment under this act shall be made on or before the 31st day of July, 1876, and each of said States and Territories shall be entitled to receive its distributive share of each apportionment, to be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to its treasurer or other officer authorized by its law to receive the same, whenever thereafter it shall file with the Secretary of the Treasury a certified copy of the law of such State or Territory accepting the provisions of this act and undertaking that the funds provided by the same, whenever paid over to it as above provided, shall be faithfully applied to the free education of all its children between the ages of six and sixteen years. The distributive share of the District of Columbia shall from time to time be paid over to the commission of said District created by act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," or other officer or officers provided by law, and shall be applied in the same manner as above provided for the States and Territories.

SEC. 5. That to entitle any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to the benefits of this act, it shall maintain for at least three months in each year a system of free public schools for all the children within its limits between the ages of six and sixteen, and shall, through the proper officer thereof, for the year ending the 30th day of June last preceding such appointment, make full report of the number of public free schools, the number of teachers employed, the number of school-houses owned and the number of school-houses hired, the total number of children taught during the year, the actual daily attendance, and the actual number of months of the year schools have been maintained in each of the several school districts or divisions of said State, Territory, or District, and the amounts appropriated by the Legislature or otherwise received for the purpose of maintaining a system of free public schools. And if any State or Territory shall misapply, or allow to be misapplied or in any manner appropriated or used other than for the purposes herein required, the funds, or any part thereof, received under the provisions of this act, or shall fail to comply with the conditions herein prescribed, or to report, as herein provided, through its proper officers, the disposition thereof, such State or Territory shall forfeit its right to any subsequent apportionment by virtue hereof, until the full amount so misapplied, lost, or misappropriated, shall have been replaced by such State or Territory, and applied as herein required; and until such report shall have been made; and all apportionments so forfeited and withheld shall be added to and become part of the principal of the educational fund hereby created.

SEC. 6. That nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to affect in any manner the existing laws and regulations in regard to the adjustment and payment to States of the percentage of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands within their respective limits, as provided in section 3689 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I object to the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. WHITE. It is a bill to distribute the proceeds of the sales of public lands for educational purposes according to the illiteracy of the people; and I can tell you, gentlemen, that the South needs a great deal of assistance on that ground.

The question was taken upon suspending the rules and passing the bill; and upon a division there were—ayes 9, noes 141.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. WHITE. I ask consent to have printed in the RECORD as a portion of the debates some remarks upon this subject.

There was no objection, and leave was granted accordingly.

The remarks are as follows:

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, the bill proposes to distribute the proceeds of the sales of public lands to the school funds of the several States, and the distribution is to be made on the basis of illiteracy of the people. It would be very well for members to examine the report of the Commissioner of Education for the year 1872 and to reflect on the startling facts found there concerning the illiteracy of our whole people.

I need not remind members of the great necessity of a Government appropriation for the newly enfranchised citizens of the South; and I confess that it does seem to me that there is quite as much propriety in making the appropriation as the necessity, for it is urgent.

It is impossible for any one to exercise intelligently the rights and privileges of an American citizen, especially in the use of the elective franchise, without having at least a common-school education. Some of the Southern States make a discrimination in favor of the white children in the apportionment of the school fund. As an illustration I give the following:

STATE OF KENTUCKY, OFFICE SUPERINTENDENT PUBLIC INSTRUCTION,
Frankfort, August 1, 1876.

To the Commissioners of Public Schools:

I furnish you with the following statement concerning the apportionment for the school year ending June 30, 1877:

White children	459,357
Increase	11,215
White, per capita	$1 90
Colored children	53,196
Increase	2,524
Colored, per capita	55 cents.

For your further information, I publish the letter of the State auditor.

H. A. M. HENDERSON,
Superintendent Public Instruction.

The above statement made by the superintendent of public instruction for the State of Kentucky shows that $1.90 per capita is given to the white children of Kentucky, while only 55 cents per capita are given to colored children of that State.

Now, Mr. Speaker, is it possible for the United States Government to guarantee a republican form of government to a State which tolerates such a state of things as this! I imagine that the support which most of the Southern States are able to give to their systems of public schools is hardly better than that of Kentucky. In Delaware there is one man in every five who can neither read nor write; in North Carolina one in three; and in Georgia there are fifty-seven in every one hundred who can neither read nor write.

The colored people are not the only illiterates who are to be benefited by the provisions of this bill. I regret to say that there are thousands and tens of thousands of white children and white men in this country who can neither read nor write. Since the money resulting from the sale of public lands is to be divided on the basis of illiteracy, of course it follows that white illiterates will receive proportionately with colored illiterates.

Should the bill become law, as it is just and right and humane that it should, then I predict that the necessity for Federal soldiers to protect and defend the rights of citizens which are conferred by the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution will rapidly disappear.

It is a disgrace to the nation and a sad comment on our free institutions that such a state of affairs could exist in our borders as would justify and make it necessary for this democratic House of Representatives in the Forty-fourth American Congress to pass the following resolution:

Whereas the right of suffrage prescribed by the constitutions of the several States is subject to the fifteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which is as follows:

"ARTICLE XV.

"SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

and whereas the exercise of the right of suffrage so prescribed and regulated should be faithfully maintained and observed by the United States and the several States and the citizens thereof; and whereas it is asserted that the exercise of the right of suffrage is in some of the States, notwithstanding the efforts of all good citizens to the contrary, resisted and controlled by fraud, intimidation, and violence, so that in such cases the object of the amendment is defeated; and whereas all citizens, without distinction of race, or class, or color, are entitled to the protection conferred by such article: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That all attempts by force, fraud, terror, intimidation, or otherwise, to prevent the free exercise of the right of suffrage in any State should meet with certain, condign, and effectual punishment, and that in any case which has heretofore occurred or that may hereafter occur in which violence or murder has been or shall be committed by one race or class upon the other, the prompt prosecution and punishment of the criminal or criminals in any court having jurisdiction is imperatively demanded, whether the crime be one punishable by fine or imprisonment or one demanding the penalty of death.

In conclusion, I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that the bill which I have had read has been considered by the Committee on Education and Labor, to which I belong, and has been reported to this House for favorable action. For some time past I have tried to get the floor to present this bill. I ask the House to pass it now, even at this late hour of the last session of the Congress.

ALEXANDER & CO.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move to suspend the rules and put upon its passage the bill (H. R. No. 361) for the relief of Alexander & Co. for the loss of whisky by the negligence of the Government. This bill is now on the Private Calendar. The case is one of peculiar merit and very great hardship. I hope the bill will be passed.

The bill was read. It directs the Treasurer of the United States to pay to Alexander & Co. $3,000 in full satisfaction of their claim against the Government for loss of whisky seized for taxes, a large part of such whisky being lost by the negligence of the officers of the Government while the whisky was in their possession.

The motion to suspend the rules was not agreed to.

J. B. M'CULLOUGH.

Mr. GOODE. I move to suspend the rules to take up and pass the bill (S. No. 1127) for the relief of J. B. McCullough.

The bill was read. It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to pay to J. B. McCullough, of Petersburgh, Virginia, $328.87 for rent of property occupied under contract by the United States, for which vouchers were given to McCullough.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report was read.

The motion of Mr. GOODE was agreed to, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the bill was passed.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to lay before the House two bills from the Senate for the removal of political disabilities.

The Clerk read the titles of the bills, as follows:

A bill (S. No. 1293) to remove the political disabilities of Theophilus H. Holmes, of North Carolina;

A bill (S. No. 1292) to remove the political disabilities of John M. Haden, of Galveston, Texas.

Mr. CONGER. Do petitions accompany these bills?

The SPEAKER. The bills have been passed by the Senate; and the Chair is informed by the Clerk that the Senate makes it a rule to retain the petitions on file. If there be no objection, these bills will be regarded as passed.

There was no objection.

WILLIAM WHEELER HUBBELL.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I move to suspend the rules and pass Senate bill No. 667, which was read last night, there being then a single objection which is now withdrawn.

The motion to suspend the rules was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 667) for the relief of William Wheeler Hubbell, and to make just compensation for the past making, or use, or vending of his patent explosive shell fuses and percussion exploders by the United States, was passed.

WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. EDEN. I move to suspend the rules so as to concur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4433) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871. These amendments do not change the bill essentially in any particular.

The motion was agreed to; and the amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

LOUIS PETOSKI.

The SPEAKER. There are three bills the consideration of which was consented to last night, and which the Chair will lay before the House. The first is the bill (S. No. 920) to authorize Louis Petoski, of Michigan, to enter a certain tract of land which embraces his home and improvements.

Mr. SAYLER. It is not necessary to read the bill. It has been passed by the Senate and approved by the Committee on Public Lands of this House.

There being no objection, the bill was passed.

SALE OF TIMBER LANDS.

The SPEAKER. The next bill to the consideration of which consent was given last night is the bill (S. No. 6) for the sale of timber lands in the States of California and Oregon and in the Territories of the United States.

Mr. SAYLER. This bill has received the favorable consideration of the Committee on Public Lands and should be passed.

Mr. WALLING. I say that this bill has not received the approval of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SAYLER. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. GOODIN,] is here and will verify my statement. My colleague [Mr. WALLING] is mistaken. That is all.

Mr. WALLING. This bill was referred to a subcommittee of the Committee on Public Lands, of which I am chairman. It has no business to be here.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] moves to suspend the rules, so as to bring the bill before the House and pass it.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the surveyed public lands of the United States within the States of California and Oregon and in Washington Territory not included within military, Indian, or other reservations of the United States, valuable chiefly for timber, but unfit for cultivation, and which have not been offered at public sale according to law, may be sold to citizens of the United States or persons who have declared their intention to become such, in quantities not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres to any one person, corporation, or association of persons, and in all other territories of the United States not exceeding forty acres to any one person, corporation, or association of persons, at the minimum price of $2.50 per acre: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall defeat or impair any bona fide claim under any law of the United States, or authorize the sale of any mining claim or the improvements of any bona fide settler, or lands containing gold, silver, cinnabar, copper, or coal, or lands selected by the said States under any law of the United States donating lands for internal improvements, education, or other purposes: And provided further, That none of the rights conferred by the act approved July 26, 1866, entitled "An act granting the right of way to ditch and canal owners over the public lands, and for other purposes," shall be abrogated by this act, and all patents granted shall be subject to any vested and accrued water rights or rights to ditches or reservoirs used in connection with such water rights as may have been acquired under and by the provisions of said act; and such rights shall be expressly reserved in any patent issued under this act.

SEC. 2. That any person desiring to avail himself of the provisions of this act shall file with the register of the proper district a written statement in duplicate, one of which is to be transmitted to the General Land Office, designating by legal subdivisions the particular tract of land he desires to purchase, setting forth that the same is unfit for cultivation and valuable chiefly for its timber; that it is uninhabited, contains no mining or other improvements, except for ditch or canal purposes where any such do exist, save such as were made by or belonged to the applicant, nor, as deponent verily believes, any deposit of gold, silver, cinnabar copper, or coal; that deponent has made no other application under this act; that he does not apply to purchase the same on speculation, but in good faith, to appropriate it to his own exclusive use and benefit, and not for sale; and that he has not, directly or indirectly, made any agreement or contract in any way or manner with any person or persons whatsoever by which the title which he might acquire from the Government of the United States, or any right in said land or the timber thereon, should inure in whole or in part to the benefit of any person except himself; nor has deponent executed any mortgage or other instrument upon said land, or any part thereof, by or under which or any proceedings thereunder the title may be vested in any other person, which statement must be verified by the oath of the applicant before the register or receiver of the land office within the district where the land is situated; and if any person taking such oath shall swear falsely in the premises, he shall be subject to all the pains and penalties of perjury, and shall forfeit the money which he may have paid for said lands and all rights and title to the same, and any grant or conveyance which he may have made except in the hands of bona fide purchasers shall be null and void.

SEC. 3. That upon the filing of said statement, as provided in the second section of this act, the register of the land office shall post a notice in some conspicuous place of such application, embracing a description of the land by legal subdivisions in his office for a period of sixty days, and shall furnish the applicant a copy of the same for publication at the expense of such applicant in a newspaper published nearest the location of the premises for a like period of time, and after the expiration of said sixty days, if no adverse claim shall have been filed, the person desiring to purchase shall furnish to the register of the land office satisfactory evidence, first, that said notice of the application prepared by the register as aforesaid, was duly published in a newspaper as herein required; secondly, that the land is of the character contemplated in this act, unoccupied, and without improvements other than those excepted, either mining or agricultural, and that it apparently contains no valuable deposits of gold, silver, cinnabar, copper, or coal, and of the truth of the statement required to be made of the matter contained in the second section of this act, and upon payment to the proper officer of the purchase-money of said land, together with the fees of the register and the receiver as provided for in case of mining claims in the twelfth section of the act approved May 10, 1872, the applicant may be permitted to enter said tract, and on the transmission to the General Land Office of the papers and testimony in the case, a patent shall issue thereon: Provided, That any person having a valid claim to any portion of the land may object in writing to the issuance of a patent of lands so claimed by him, stating the nature of his claim thereto, and evidence shall be taken and the merits of said objection shall be determined by the officers of the Land Office, subject to appeal as in other land cases. Effect shall be given to the foregoing provisions of this act by regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. PAGE. I move to suspend the rules and pass that bill.

Mr. WALLING. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. PAGE. A similar bill was passed in the Forty-third Congress, and failed for want of time in the Senate.

Mr. MORRISON. It is a pernicious species of legislation, and ought not to pass.

Mr. PAGE. That is untrue. There are as honest men in this House as you are.

Mr. WALLING. That bill was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and by that committee referred to a subcommittee. It requires an appropriation of money to carry it out, and it is one of those bills which must be carried out——

The SPEAKER. The pending motion is the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. WALLING. Then the first motion must be to discharge the committee from its further consideration.

The SPEAKER. That is the motion, and pass the bill.

Mr. WALLING. I wish to move an amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules is not amendable.

Mr. WALLING. It has been already referred to a subcommittee and I have been instructed to report an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no right to move an amendment when the motion is to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. BUCKNER. Is it in order to lay the bill on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The pending motion is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to the bill.

The House refused to suspend the rules, two-thirds not voting in favor thereof.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the passage of a bill (H. R. No. 4313) to remove the political disabilities of Charles L. Scott, of Alabama.

It further announced the passage of a concurrent resolution that fifteen hundred copies of the report of the monetary commission created by joint resolution of August 15, 1876, together with accompanying evidence and documents, be printed for the use of the Senate, and thirty-five hundred be printed for the use of the House of Representatives; in which concurrence was requested.

It further announced that the Senate still further insisted on its amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 4691) making appropriation for the support of the Army, &c., disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and asked a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BLAINE, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. WITHERS as the managers of said conference on its part.

It further announced that the Senate further insisted on its amendments numbered 76 and 77 to the bill (H. R. No. 4472) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House, and agreed to the further conference asked for by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. WINDOM, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. DAVIS as managers of said conference on its part.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to submit the report of the conference of the two Houses on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee on conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4472) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, report that they are unable to agree thereon.

WM. S. HOLMAN,
HIESTER CLYMER,
CHAS. FOSTER,
Managers on the part of the House.

WM. B. ALLISON,
HENRY G. DAVIS,
WM. WINDOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is the third report made to the House and Senate of the inability of the conferees to agree on the question at issue between the two Houses on that bill, that is, as to the President's salary. The House, of course, understands that all the other provisions of this House have been agreed to by the two Houses except this one question of the salary of the President. The House still insists that the salary of the President shall be fixed at $25,000, while the Senate want it to remain at $50,000.

I take occasion to suggest there are but three modes of disposing of this question: One is a further conference on the bill, the adoption of this report, the discharge of the committee, and agreeing to the further conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes on the bill; or by our receding, which, of course, at once passes the bill; or by the House adhering to its disagreement, which results in the failure of the bill unless the Senate should recede. I take that to be the condition of the measure.

Mr. LAMAR. The question I wish to ask is this: Suppose the House adheres to its own provision, what will be the effect upon the salary of the President? Does it not stay as it is, and will not that produce the same result as if we recede?

Mr. HOLMAN. On the spur of the moment, as I have not had an opportunity to discuss the question specially, I should be compelled to say, if that bill passes now, it would reduce the salary of the President from the inauguration into the presidential office of its incoming incumbent. I take it to-day is not to be computed as any part of the incoming President's term of office.

Mr. GARFIELD. Suppose it does not pass; what will be the President's salary?

Mr. HOLMAN. If the law does not pass the President's salary is fixed at $50,000.

But, if the bill passes now, I hold it does affect the presidential salary from and after the 4th day of March. There is no possible question about that. The salary of the President would be reduced from and after the expiration of the present presidential term. And I hold, further, that if this Congress should remain in session until twelve o'clock to-morrow, Monday, the passing of the bill would have the same effect.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. That is not a supposable case.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to be allowed just a single sentence. Any bill that President Grant may sign will fix the future salary. That marks the boundary of the terms.

Mr. EDEN. Suppose the bill fails on account of a disagreement between the House and the Senate, and we have an extra session. I ask the gentleman from Indiana what will be the amount we will have to appropriate under the law as it will then exist?

Mr. HOLMAN. O, of course, if this bill fails the presidential salary remains at $50,000 per annum. That is very clear.

For the purpose of testing the sense of the House I again move that the House insist on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate touching the President's salary, and ask for a further conference. I do not call the previous question at this moment, in order to give an opportunity to any gentleman who may wish to make another motion, either that the House adhere or that the House recede, to submit it.

Mr. CLYMER. I wish to say one word, and I feel impelled to do so by a sense of duty as a member of the Committee on Appropriations. This is the third report from conference committees on this bill. It seems to be evident from our failures heretofore that we will meet with no better success in the future, considering the temper of the Senate as represented by its conferees. If by insisting we could obtain the legislation that this House seems to desire, I would continue to insist. But if we cannot obtain that legislation it would not be the part of wisdom for us to lose this bill and gain nothing by it, because if we lose the bill the salary of the incoming President inevitably becomes $50,000 per annum for his whole term.

Hence we can gain nothing by insisting, and I believe it would be the part of wisdom on the part of this House, considering all the circumstances, not to insist but to recede.

Mr. GARFIELD. Make that motion.

Mr. CLYMER. I say to my friends on this side of the House that that is the part of wisdom. We can do nothing better.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make that motion, that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate touching the President's salary.

Mr. HOLMAN. And now both motions being before the House I call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. There cannot be two motions of that character before the House at the same time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Both motions may be pending at the same time.

The SPEAKER. The motion to recede takes precedence of the motion to insist.

Mr. HOLMAN. But both motions are pending.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no.

The SPEAKER. That is not worth while contending about.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is not necessary to waste time by calling the previous question. There seems to be no objection to taking the vote immediately.

The question being taken on Mr. GARFIELD'S motion, on a division by sound, the Speaker stated that in the judgement of the Chair the "ayes" had it.

Mr. STENGER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 16, noes 131; the affirmative not being one-fifth of the whole vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for tellers on the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering tellers there were ayes 16, not one-fifth of a quorum.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then the House backs down.

So tellers on the yeas and nays were refused, the yeas and nays were refused, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the House receded from its disagreement to the Senate amendment; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

S. K. DONAVIN AND R. W. HUNTER.

Mr. CRAPO. I move that the rules be suspended and that the following resolution be adopted:

Resolved, That S. K. Donavin, deputy sergeant-at-arms, and R. W. Hunter, clerk of the House special committee to investigate the recent election in Louisiana, be allowed the sum of $360 each, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire whether this appropriation is recommended by the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. CRAPO. It has the approval of the special committee to investigate the Louisiana election.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that these parties have been paid already for all the services they rendered.

The question being taken, the rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the resolution was adopted.

ESTATE OF REAR-ADMIRAL DAHLGREN.

Mr. WILLIS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the bill (H. R. No. 4471) authorizing a settlement of the claim of the estate of the late Rear-Admiral John A. Dahlgren be passed.

The bill was read.

Mr. CONGER. I would ask that the report of the committee in this case be read, so that the House may understand it.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The late Rear-Admiral Dahlgren, having devoted the vigor of his manhood to scientific investigation for the perfection of naval ordnance, when not at sea in active service, had no opportunity for the accumulation of wealth, and left to his family but a small estate. Since his untimely decease his widow, who became the administratrix of his estate, has petitioned Congress to recognize in some measure his claims upon his country by allowing a reasonable compensation for the use and transfer of his patents for the casting, finish, and mounting of naval ordnance.

The justice of this claim has been passed upon and admitted by several committees of the Senate and House, who had the same under consideration, but every bill heretofore framed for relief of the petitioner, without encountering any considerable opposition, has failed, by some untoward event, to become a law.

The said Admiral Dahlgren, during his life-time, after many years of thought, labor, and experiment, took out three letters-patent for improvements in cast-iron ordnance and one for rifled projectiles. The great merit of these inventions as to ordnance is not only readily perceptible to an intelligent mind upon an inspection thereof, but has been vindicated by more than fifteen years of constant and almost exclusive use by the United States for the armament of vessels and shore defenses. During the late war every decisive naval victory achieved by the Union forces can be traced, in a great measure, to the superiority of the Dahlgren gun. Of these guns the United States have manufactured more than four thousand, and have now on hand, serviceable and in use, over three thousand, besides having permitted the governments of Italy, Russia, France, and Japan to make and use them without royalty to the inventor. Every officer of rank and distinction in our Navy has testified to the great value of these guns. Du Pont, Rodgers, Alden, Wise, Porter, and many others have give written certificates as to their excellency and superiority. Yet neither the inventor nor his widow and orphans have ever received at the hands of this Government any pecuniary remuneration therefor.

It is universally admitted that where a person, while in the public service, patents an invention, the utility of which has been demonstrated, it is proper for the Government, in case of need of such patent, to purchase the same at a reasonable price; but some deny that the Government should pay for the use thereof while the holder of the patent is in the employment of the State, receiving a fixed salary. If it is right for the Government to buy the patent itself held by a public employé, it is also right to pay for the use of such when it has never become such purchaser. The implied promise to pay in the latter has the same sanction in law and reason as the express promise in the former case. When a question of this kind was undergoing an investigation, the Judge-Advocate-General gave a well-considered opinion in favor of the patentee's right to receive a reasonable compensation for the use of his patent by the Government, notwithstanding he was, at the time of his invention, in the public service. Among other things, he said:

"In such a case, the Government, if desiring to secure a permanent property in the invention, should not be unwilling to remunerate the inventor in such a sum as—considering how far it may have itself contributed to the result—may be just and reasonable. If an opposite view, indeed, should prevail, the inventive talent of public operatives, instead of being stimulated, would be discouraged, or if exerted at all, would be placed, in the first instance, at the command of private individuals or companies, with whom, perhaps, in the end the Government would be forced to contract at a greatly advanced price."

But this is no longer an open question, as it has been passed upon by the courts in favor of such patentees in several cases; and the precedent for such compensation has been set by the Government in others.

The committee have reported a substitute for the original bill, and recommend the passage thereof.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the House will not pass a bill of this importance at this late hour of the session.

The SPEAKER. The House can always protect itself by voting down the motion to suspend the rules.

The question was taken on Mr. WILLIS's motion; and on a division there were ayes 23, noes not counted.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I submit a report from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Army appropriation bill.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4691) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, they are unable to agree.

J. D. C. ATKINS,
ERASTUS WELLS,
CHAS. FOSTER,
Managers on the part of the House.

JAS. G. BLAINE,
WM. A. WALLACE,
W. B. ALLISON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. ATKINS. It may be expected that I shall make an explanation of the result of the conference. There are two points of difference between the two Houses. The first is the reduction of the force and the other is the fifth section of the bill. I do not believe that the House and the Senate can agree upon the reduction of the force, nor do I believe that they can agree upon the fifth section. That, however, is a question for the House to determine.

Mr. O'BRIEN. What is the fifth section?

Mr. ATKINS. The fifth section imposes a restriction upon the appropriation for maintenance of the Army, so that it shall not be used in supporting either the Packard or the Nicholls government in Louisiana or in supporting the government of any State.

Mr. THORNBURGH. It is an amendment to the Constitution on an appropriation bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and ask a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. O'BRIEN. What is the use of another conference if they cannot agree?

Mr. ATKINS. I say that I do not believe that they can agree, but still I think that another conference should be had.

The question was taken on Mr. ATKINS's motion, and on a division there were ayes 100, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

SUIT AGAINST THE SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

Mr. KNOTT. I move to suspend the rules and pass the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House be hereby authorized to retain counsel in the cause in which Hallet Kilbourne is plaintiff and John G. Thompson and others are defendants, for the purpose of prosecuting or defending, as the case may be, the cause aforesaid in the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. The case has not gone to the Supreme Court. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will explain the matter. I am sure that the case has not gone to the Supreme Court.

Mr. KNOTT. I object to the gentleman from Indiana debating my motion, and call for a vote upon it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I trust that the House will not suspend the rules.

Mr. KNOTT. I object to debate by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CAULFIELD. The gentleman from Indiana is obstructing legislation.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is a piece of unwarrantable extravagance.

The question was taken on Mr. KNOTT's motion, and on a division there were ayes 98, noes not counted.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. MONEY obtained the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to what I believe to be a privileged motion, and it is that the House take a recess.

Mr. TUCKER. That is not a privileged motion unless the gentleman has obtained the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi.

PAY OF PAGES.

Mr. MONEY. I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House, in paying the pages for the month of March, as directed by resolution passed February 28, 1877, shall include all those employed and authorized to be paid for the months of December, 1876, and January and February, 1877.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does that come from the Committee of Accounts?

The SPEAKER. It does not. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] moves to suspend the rules and pass the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that the resolution will not be adopted.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 102, noes 16.

No further count being called for, (and two-thirds voting in the affirmative,) the rules were suspended and the resolution adopted.

REFUNDING COTTON TAX.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I move to suspend the rules so as to pass House bill No. 1341, to refund certain taxes collected by the United States on raw cotton during the years 1863, 1864, 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1868, and to create a perpetual common free-school fund, and for other purposes.

The bill was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much is involved in that bill?

A MEMBER. Over $68,000,000.

Mr. MILLS. There are millions in it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. That is entirely too modest.

The question was taken upon the motion to suspend the rules and passing the bill, and it was not agreed to; two-thirds not voting in the affirmative.

EMPLOYÉS UNDER DOORKEEPER OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. MILLS. I move to suspend the rules and pass the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and I ask for it the vote of every gentleman in this House. It is to prevent the Doorkeeper from removing employés under him during vacation, as he has done heretofore.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That employés now under the Doorkeeper of the House shall not be removed from their places before the commencement of the Forty-fifth Congress, and the Doorkeeper of the House is hereby prohibited from removing any of said employés.

The rules were not suspended, two-thirds not voting in favor thereof.

Mr. MILLS said subsequently: I do not think the House understood my resolution; I think that gentlemen voted under a misapprehension. I move to reconsider the vote on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to reconsider a vote on a motion to suspend the rules.

WILLIAM H. SMITH.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I move to supend the rules and pass the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That William H Smith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the sum of $3.00 per day as messenger in the library of the House, from and including the 4th of March 1877, and until otherwise ordered.

The motion to suspend the rules and pass the resolution was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to move that the House now take a recess. The Chair certainly can see that legislation is not conducted with any great degree of intelligence at this hour of the night.

Mr. TUCKER. The gentleman is out of order in casting such an imputation upon this House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House take a recess until eight o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. WADDELL. I move to amend that motion so as to make it ten o'clock.

The SPEAKER. If the House now takes a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow morning it will not be possible for the necessary business of the session to be concluded between ten and twelve o'clock.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to take a recess until six o'clock.

Mr. WADDELL. I ask the Chair to submit my motion to the House.

The motion of Mr. WADDELL, to take a recess until ten o'clock, was not agreed to.

A. M. GAROUTTE.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to suspend the rules so as to pass Senate bill No. 949, for the relief A. M. Garoutte, late captain and assistant quartermaster in the United States Army.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to A. M. Garoutte, late captain and assistant quartermaster United States Army, $1,544.15, in full for the amount refunded by said Garoutte to H. Hurdle, by order of General Boyd, in the year 1865, and of hotel bills paid by him for clerks and auctioneer while making sale of personal property of the United States at various places in the State of North Carolina in 1865 and 1866, and for amount of fine wrongfully imposed upon him by a court-martial in August, 1866, and paid by him; and for all sums which would have been due to him for military services in his said capacity if he had been honorably discharged on the 14th of August, 1866.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to cause to be issued to the said Garoutte, late captain and assistant quartermaster, an honorable discharge to take effect from the 14th day of August, 1866.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. WILSON; and upon a division there were—ayes 86, noes 32.

Mr. MILLS. Let us have the yeas and nays on that.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were 26 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Before the yeas and nays are called, I move that the House now take a recess until nine o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. WILSON. That motion certainly is not in order.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 127, nays 35, not voting 128; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adams, Ainsworth, Ballou, Banks, Blackburn, Blair, Bland, Bliss, Bradley, Bright, William R. Brown, Buckner, Horatio C. Burchard, Burleigh, John H. Caldwell, Campbell, Caswell, Chittenden, Cochrane, Conger, Danford, Denison, Dunnell, Durham, Eames, Eden, Ellis, Flye, Forney, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Gause, Goodin, Haralson, Benjamin W. Harris, Hartzell, Hathorn, Haymond, Hendee, Henderson, Henkle, Hoge, Hooker, House, Hubbell, Hyman, Thomas L. Jones, Kasson, Kehr, Kimball, Lamar, Lane, Lawrence, Leavenworth, Le Moyne, Lynch, Lynde, Mackey, MacDougall, McCrary, McDill, Meade, Miller, Mills, Morrison, Mutchler, Nash, Neal, New, Norton, Oliver, O'Neill, Packer, Page, Payne, Pierce, Pratt, Rainey, James B. So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

During the vote,

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, stated that his colleague, Mr. FAULKNER, had left the House an hour or two ago on account of indisposition.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

MESSENGERS OF HOUSE POST-OFFICE.

Mr. TERRY. I move to suspend the rules and pass the following resolution, which simply proposes to place the messengers in the House post-office on the same footing as those in the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the sum of $250 to each of the eight messengers employed during the present session in the House post-office, the same being for the months of April, May, and June, 1877, at the rate of $1,000 per annum each.

Mr. FORT. That has not been considered by the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. WHITE. Has that been referred to any committee? It seems to me we are paying a great many employés of this House, especially as this is a House so much for reform.

Mr. TERRY. It simply places the messengers of the House post-office on the same footing with those in the Senate.

The House refused to suspend the rules, two-thirds not voting in favor thereof.

COMPILATION OF QUESTIONS OF ORDER.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Rules for present consideration the following resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the questions of order decided in the House of Representatives, compiled by the journal clerk, under the resolution of August 15, 1876, be printed and indexed under the direction of the journal clerk for the use of the Committee on Rules.

There being no objection the resolution was adopted.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER announced as conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Army appropriation bill, Mr. ATKINS, Mr. ABBOTT, and Mr. FOSTER.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, at two o'clock and thirty-five minutes a. m., (March 4th,) the House took a recess until eight o'clock a. m.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired the House re-assembled at eight o'clock a. m., (Sunday, March 4.)

JULIUS S. BOHRER.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask that by unanimous consent the bill (S. No. 1010) for the relief of Julius S. Bohrer, master in the United States Navy, be taken from the Speaker's table and be put upon its passage. This bill has passed the Senate unanimously, and has the approval of the committees of both Houses.

Mr. ROBERTS. I hope the bill will pass.

The bill was read. The preamble recites that Julius S. Bohrer, master in the naval service of the United States, after twenty-five years' faithful service, during which time he received the most terrible bodily injuries while in the discharge of his duties, was illegally dismissed the service by the Secretary of the Navy, December 30, 1865. It further recites that the said Julius S. Bohrer, after the said illegal dismissal by the said Secretary of the Navy, did make most frequent and persistent application to the then President and honorable Secretary of the Navy, as required by law, to obtain a court-martial, the which was always denied him until May 23, 1876, when a general court-martial was ordered for him by the President of the United States and honorable Secretary of the Navy, which general court-martial declared, after a most rigid and exhaustive trial, on June 2, 1876, that the said Julius S. Bohrer was innocent of all and every charge and specification of court of inquiry of 1865; and the Secretary of the Navy, by General Order No. 210, on June 5, 1876, so declared, and that the action of the Secretary of the Navy was in consequence null and void.

The bill therefore authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the said Julius S. Bohrer, his executors or assigns, the full amount of his yearly salary, with interest on same for each and every year from December 30, 1865, to June 5, 1876, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated; the act to take effect from the date of its passage.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT POLICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. LE MOYNE, by unanimous consent, from the committee to investigate the police department of the District of Columbia, submitted a report in writing, and moved that the committee be discharged and that the report be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered. The report is as follows:

This committee was directed by the resolution authorizing its appointment to inquire whether the members of the board of police commissioners for the District of Columbia had used or attempted to use any members of said police force for corrupt or improper purposes connected with any investigation of Congress or with a view of injuring or disgracing any member of Congress, or had attempted to interfere with the administration of law in the courts of the District, and whether said police organization had been used for any improper or corrupt purpose.

Under this resolution they have considered it within the proper limits of their authority to inquire whether the police organization has been used for any improper purposes by any one; and under this direction your committee has taken whatever testimony they could get showing the management and uses of said police by the police commissioners or by any one.

On the same day when this resolution was adopted a bill was passed by the House unanimously, and it was also passed by the Senate, abolishing the board of police commissioners. As the testimony which could be given was probably to be had from members of the force it was hoped that this bill would speedily become a law, and the subordinates might testify without fear of discharge, but for some reason this was prevented and some of the witnesses refused to testify, claiming that their testimony would be used against them.

So far as this testimony affects the character and conduct of the members of the board of police commissioners it is proper to say that it only affects the character and conduct of one of said commissioners; that one is Mr. William J. Murtagh, who it appears has for many years been the president of said board.

The testimony shows that in March, 1872, an investigation into the management of the Navy Department was being made by a committee appointed by this House. That Mr. Charles A. Dana, of New York, appeared before said committee as a witness. His intention to come to Washington appears to have been known to Mr. Murtagh, who was then the president of the board of police commissioners, and in advance of Mr. Dana's arrival Murtagh sent a written request to the superintendent of police asking that two policemen be detailed, to act in citizens' clothes, under the direction of Mr. Murtagh. These policemen went to the office of the National Republican newspaper for their orders. They were told to meet Mr. Dana at the depot, and, as they express it, to "shadow" him while he was in Washington City, and to report to Mr. Murtagh at the Republican office. Two of the detectives were also engaged at the same time at the same work. One of them went as far as Philadelphia with Mr. Dana, pointing him out to officers to whom they had telegraphed, and who arrested Mr. Dana on an information for libel. Mr. Dana was closely watched like a criminal for several days while he was in Washington and reports made to Mr. Murtagh of his movements. The object alleged for shadowing Mr. Dana here was that inasmuch as Mr. Dana was assailing the Navy Department in his newspaper, it was considered desirable to know from whom he was getting information, or, as the witnesses expressed it, "with whom he connected in Washington."

There is no testimony tending to show that the Secretary of the Navy was interested in this prosecution of Mr. Dana. One of the witnesses, a policeman named Clarvoe, swears that Mr. Murtagh wished him to secure witnesses who could prove at Philadelphia Mr. Dana's proprietorship of the New York Sun. He secured a man named Sargent, then an employé in the Treasury Department. Sargent says that the same day he went to Philadelphia for this purpose "I strolled along with Mr. Murtagh and went up to the Navy Department with him. I was never there but the one time with Mr. Murtagh. We then saw the Secretary of Navy." But when the witness is asked whether he received any instructions from the Secretary of Navy, or what conversations took place in the presence of the Secretary, he declines to answer.

His instructions, however, were to go to Philadelphia and see Mr. Cattell or Mr. Kemble, which he did, and he was sent to an attorney, &c. This refusal to answer may be prompted by a disposition, as the witness supposes, to protect the Secretary, or it may be from exactly the opposite motive and may be an attempt to insinuate what he could not prove. The Secretary himself would know the truth of the matter, and testifies that he had no knowledge of it. (November 3.)

This use of the police was evidently not a public service, or made for any proper purpose. To the contrary it would seem not only proper but necessary that an examination or investigation into the management of any Department of the Government should at all times be facilitated, and it was highly improper in either the commissioner of police or any one else to use the police force, largely paid out of the funds of the General Government, for the purpose of preventing investigation, acting as spies upon witnesses or to bring to punishment any one furnishing information in regard to the management of the affairs of the people.

It was said by one of the detectives that he had been telegraphed to by the police at Philadelphia about Mr. Dana; that his arrest was desired. If there was any sufficient charge against him there, he could have been got at any time from New York, and some other time and occasion would have been more proper than when he was summoned to the national capital as a witness.

That this improper use of the police was made is not denied by Mr. Murtagh himself; he only says he had entirely forgotten that it was ever done, from which we might infer that such use was not unusual.

But the more serious charge is the attempt made by the president of the police board to influence or control the official conduct of a member of this House who was in charge of another investigation into the affairs of the Navy Department.

The superintendent of the police says:

"About the 1st of July last Mr. Murtagh came to my office and requested that some attention be paid to Mr. WHITTHORNE, who was chairman of the committee that was investigating the affairs of the Navy Department. Mr. Murtagh stated that that investigation was being pursued in a very severe manner; that there was an anxiety prevailing in regard to that investigation, and that he wished to have Mr. WHITTHORNE watched to see what his habits were, with whom he communicated, and he suggested that possibly he was visiting houses not proper for a person to visit. He wished me to put detectives at work; that if we should find Mr. WHITTHORNE visiting any houses of prostitution or such places we should raid the house and send an officer of the police with a posse to take charge of the house and arrest all parties there; a report by the Naval Committee was to be made in a few days; after the arrests were made the parties were to be taken to the police station and detained there and the reporters of the National Republican, of which Mr. Murtagh was editor and proprietor, were to be notified. They were to come to the station-house, see the parties, and write up the report or not as they deemed proper. In a week or ten days Murtagh came again to inquire what had been done; he pressed the matter quite strongly. He spoke of the anxiety which prevailed at the Naval Department in regard to the investigation, and he urged in very strong language to have something done to carry out his project. I think in a day or two Murtagh called to know what progress had been made. He stated that it was then anticipated that the Committee on Naval Affairs would report on the third day after that, and that something must be done before that report was made, that something must be accomplished or that it would be no use to carry the matter any further. He called three or four times more before the committee did finally report. At one or two of these interviews Murtagh desired that reports by the officer, in writing, should be made, which were to be shown at the Navy Department to show that something was being accomplished. It was suggested by Murtagh that if Mr. WHITTHORNE could not be found in such a house a woman should be employed by whom he could be taken to a house of that kind."

This is the testimony of the superintendent of police.

James A. McDevitt, one of the detectives, says:

"In July last he was informed by Richards that Murtagh wanted Mr. WHITTHORNE, chairman of House Committee on Naval Affairs, watched, and also if a woman could be employed to get him into a house of prostitution, and raid the premises and have him brought to the station, and while in that condition it might be observed by the reporters, with a view of holding it over his head that it might influence his action in said committee. Sometime afterward I was brought into the presence of Mr. Murtagh by Richards. Murtagh was urging that something should be done in this matter; he was anxious that it should be hurried up, and he said he would be responsible for whatever money was expended."

George O. Miller, another of the detectives, says:

"In July last, during the investigation of the Navy Department, Major Richards told me that Murtagh wanted me to shadow Mr. WHITTHORNE to see if he went into any improper place and to have him arrested. I declined to engage in that business. The next afternoon Richards was standing on the stoop with Murtagh; as I passed out Murtagh said, 'I want you to attend to that matter.'"

These witnesses confirm the statement of Richards, but on the main charge, that the plan for influencing a member of this House in the discharge of his official duty was devised and attempted by Murtagh, there is really no conflict of testimony or even denial of the charge, unless Murtagh's own testimony might be considered a denial. This can scarcely be claimed, as it more nearly resembles a confession. When he was called as a witness to give his version of the matter, he says:

"During the naval investigation I was informed that certain statements had been made in reference to myself to be reported on by the committee. I asked Major Richards if he knew a member of Congress named WHITTHORNE. I said I had heard a great many stories about him and about his visiting houses of prostitution, and I would like to know something about him. At the second interview I asked him if he would not get all the information he could for me. At the next interview—I think I had four interviews with him—I think McDevitt was present and the matter was talked over in a general way. During the conversation I said if this man [WHITTHORNE] was attacking other people, and at the head of an investigation like this, and visited these places nightly, he ought to be raided."

This is the best statement on his own behalf that Mr. Murtagh can make after the charge had been made by the other witnesses whose testimony has been mentioned, and he does not claim to have any very accurate recollection on the subject; for example, he says:

Question. Is that all you can remember about it?

Answer. If you ask me questions I might remember something.

Q. Was anything said of making reports of what was found out?

A. I think not.

Q. Anything said about making written reports?

A. I think not, sir.

Q. Was anything said at that time about the method of Mr. WHITTHORNE's attack on the Navy Department?

A. No, sir; I do not remember anything of the kind.

Q. What is your best recollection about it?

A. I have told you it passed out of my mind, and it requires considerable effort for me to remember anything about it.

* * * * * * *

Q. Did you inform Major Richards that it was desired on the part of Secretary Robeson or any person connected with the Navy Department?

A. No, sir; on the contrary, I was in the Secretary's office one day and had a casual conversation with him and I asked him if he knew what sort of a man Mr. WHITTHORNE was? He smiled, as much as to say he had some impressions about him. "Well," said I, "he ought to be shown up." "Well," said he, "I do not want it to be done while I am here, because they will say I did it."

Secretary Robeson having been called as a witness, says that he does not recollect such a conversation, though it may have been had. As Mr. Murtagh swears that it did take place it is to be presumed that he testified truly, and the Secretary appears not to have denounced the plan or suggestion, but only to have expressed anxiety that it should not be charged to him; he was anxious, not to prevent this thing from being done, but to avoid any responsibility for it. But whether Murtagh engaged in this enterprise solely for his own gratification or was influenced by a desire or expectation of pleasing the Secretary of the Navy—and he seems to have resented investigation into the Navy Department—it is certain that, regardless of the obligations of his official position and of his dignity of a man, he urged upon the men whose positions he controlled to commit an outrage for the purpose of influencing or controlling the official conduct of the chairman of an important committee of the House.

If anything had been done as requested, your committee is of opinion that it would have been a gross breach of the privileges of the House of Representatives. That nothing was attempted is due solely to the fact that the sense of decency and propriety was stronger in the superintendent and subordinates than in the president of the board. If the subordinates had been as unscrupulous as the president, any member of Congress could be disgraced and punished without fault; for men who would consider this use of the police legitimate would not hesitate to manufacture a scandal. From the evidence taken by your committee, it appears that the office of police commissioner is useless. Mr. Murtagh, who has been the president of this board for many years, says this police board selected the officers and controlled the force. Yet he claims that the police force is unreliable, inefficient, and dishonest, and that his newspaper articles were more efficient in suppressing crime in the District than his acts as police commissioner. If this be true, it only shows either that the office of commissioner was badly filled or that it is useless; perhaps both. As for the reasons stated no crime or breach of privilege has been committed, your committee only recommend the adoption of the following resolution, and that the committee be discharged:

Resolved, That as the Federal Government is required to pay a considerable portion of the expenses of the police force of the District, it should only be used for public service. That William J. Murtagh, late president of the board of police, in attempting to use the police force to disgrace or influence the official conduct of a member of Congress, has shown himself unworthy to hold any office under the Government.

J. V. LE MOYNE.
C. W. MILLIKEN.
MILTON A. CANDLER.

THOMAS DUGAN.

Mr. HENKLE. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to pay to Thomas Dugan, out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, two months' pay, at the rate of $60 per month, for services rendered as laborer in the Doorkeeper's department.

Mr. WHITE. Has this resolution received the approval of the Committee of Accounts?

Mr. HENKLE. It has not been formally before the Committee of Accounts; but I wish to say that this old man has rendered service; there is no provision for his pay, and if this resolution be not adopted he will receive nothing for two months' service which he has rendered.

Mr. WHITE. I did not hear the gentleman's reply to my question whether this resolution has been considered by the Committee of Accounts?

The SPEAKER. Does the chairman of the Committee of Accounts approve of this resolution?

Mr. ROBERTS. I do. I have no doubt it is correct.

The resolution was adopted.

HENRY S. FRENCH.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I ask that by unanimous consent the bill (H. R. No. 473) for the relief of Henry S. French, of Nashville, Tennessee, be now considered and passed.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read for information, after which objections, if any, will be in order.

The bill was read. It provides that the claim of Henry S. French, of Nashville, Tennessee, against the United States, for re-imbursement for certain cotton alleged by him to have been taken by agents of the United States in the year 1864, at or near Jonesborough, in the State of Georgia, be referred to the Court of Claims under the rules and regulations of said court; which court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine and render judgment upon said claim for such amount as shall be found to have been the actual value of the cotton so taken.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if he can give us an estimate of the value of the cotton taken.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I cannot state precisely the value. The amount is small. This bill was considered by the Committee on War Claims in the Forty-third Congress and is reported favorably by the same committee in this Congress.

Mr. SPRINGER. Since the gentleman informs me that but a small amount is involved and the bill has the approval of the committee, I make no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

PAY OF EMPLOYÉS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. ROBERTS. I am instructed by the Committee of Accounts to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be paid to William Tudge, out of the contingent fund of the House, $300, in addition to what he has received, for his services in the post-office of the House of Representatives, the same making his compensation equal to the other employés in the same service.

Mr. WHITE. Has this received the approval of the Committee of Accounts?

Mr. ROBERTS. It is reported unanimously by that committee.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. ROBERTS. I am also instructed by the Committee of Accounts to report the following resolution. It is for the payment of the colored boys who have served us all faithfully during the session of Congress.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund, to John Douglas, Jereßiah Smith, William H. Hall, Lewis Russell, Charles Carter, James A. Savoy, John H. Shaw, J. Cook Mickens, Washington Powell, Wilson Grice, John Berry, James Hall, Robert Coates, Henry Lewis, D. L. Bruce, and Richard Shaw, each, laborers' pay, at the rate of $720 per annum, during this session, deducting such sums as may have already been paid them.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. ROBERTS also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Accounts, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to pay out of the contingent fund the sum of $240 to William Deegan, a disabled Union soldier, for services under the Doorkeeper for the period of three months ending March 10, 1877, at the rate of $1,000 per year.

Mr. ROBERTS also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Accounts, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That any deficiency in the regular appropriation to pay the employés of this House be paid out of the contingent fund.

Mr. ROBERTS also, by unanimous consent, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House pay, and he is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund, to George C. Ellison, chief engineer of the House of Representatives, to indemnify him for moneys expended by him and incurred by him in and about certain legal proceedings in defending the title and retaining the possession of certain property belonging to the National Government in his custody as an officer of this House, under and by direction of the officers of this House.

Mr. ROBERTS also, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee of Accounts the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That Henry A. Olcott be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the sum of $3.60 per day for services as messenger in the office of the Clerk of the House, from and including the 1st day of January ultimo, until otherwise ordered by the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. The chairman of the Committee of Accounts allows also to be offered the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Frank S. Donnelly the sum of $193.60, out of the contingent fund of the House, for his services as messenger during the present session.

The resolution was adopted.

TAX UPON SAVINGS-BANK DEPOSITS.

Mr. HAYMOND. I ask that by unanimous consent the bill (H. R. No. 3877) relating to the tax on deposits in savings-banks be now put upon its passage. It has the unanimous indorsement of the Committee on Banking and Currency. They have given the bill careful consideration and believe it ought to be passed.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read for information.

The bill was read.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I object.

HANS C. PETERSEN.

Mr. STRAIT. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Calendar the bill of the Senate (S. No. 709) for the relief of Hans. C. Petersen, and that the same be put upon its passage.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana. I object.

The SPEAKER. As the objection comes from a member of the Committee on Enrolled Bills, the Chair desires to say that this bill has already been engrossed by the Senate.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana. I object, at this stage of the session, to all bills that I know nothing about.

Mr. STRAIT. I move, then, to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. HOOKER. O, no, you cannot do that; for there is no quorum present.

Mr. STRAIT. I withdraw the motion.

Subsequently Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, withdrew his objection, and, no further objection being made, the bill was passed.

ERASTUS T. BUSSELL.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 917) to enable Erastus T. Bussell, of Indianapolis, Indiana, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for extension of letters-patent for a "combined rubber and spiral steel spring" be passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. We do not know whether it is proper to object to that bill or not. I would like to know what the patent is for.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. It is for a "combined rubber and spiral steel spring." It is a meritorious case.

No objection being made, the bill was passed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 4472) making appropriation for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes.

PEREZ DICKINSON.

Mr. HOUSE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 811) for the relief of Perez Dickinson, the surviving partner of James Cowan, deceased, heretofore trading and doing business under the firm name and style of Cowan & Dickinson, of Knoxville, Tennessee.

The bill has passed the Senate, and is recommended by the committee of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House take a recess until nine o'clock.

Mr. HOUSE. Is that motion in order while the House is considering this bill?

The SPEAKER. The House cannot take a recess until a quorum is present.

Mr. SAVAGE. I object to the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to legislation of this kind on Sunday morning after the vast body of legislation which was passed last night.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I do not understand that this is Sunday morning. It is yesterday.

Mr. HOLMAN. We should only pass those bills which are indispensable for the public service on this day.

Mr. DAVIS. That is right.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object imperatively to any bill which is not required by the public service.

Mr. HOUSE. A bill requiring the Government to pay to a man money that it owes him is indispensable to the public service

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not know anything in favor of that bill.

Mr. HOUSE. You do not know anything against it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

Mr. HOUSE. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there is not a quorum present, and it will be useless to put that motion.

Mr. HOUSE. Then I do not insist upon it.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FENN. I desire to take up a Senate bill.

Mr. POPPLETON. I object.

Mr. FENN. If the gentleman will yield to me a moment to state the facts, I am sure he will allow the bill referred to to be taken up.

Mr. POPPLETON. No, sir; I object to all bills.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 2043) in relation to dower in the District of Columbia.

The message further announced that the Senate further insisted upon the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 4671) making appropriations for the support of the Army and asked a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. BLAINE, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. WITHERS as conferees on the part of the Senate.

CREEK ORPHAN FUND.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Committee on Indian Affairs, in relation to the Creek orphan fund, recommending the passage of the accompanying bill; which was recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF MONETARY COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following concurrent resolution from the Senate, passed March 3, 1877:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That 1,500 copies of the report of the monetary commission created by joint resolution of August 15, 1876, together with the accompanying evidence and documents, be printed for the use of the Senate, and 3,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I move to concur in the resolution of the Senate.

The resolution of the Senate was concurred in.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

Mr. FINLEY, by unanimous consent, presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Florida, embodying a memorial to Congress relative to the counting of the electoral vote; which was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution is as follows:

Concurrent resolution embodying a memorial to Congress relative to the counting of the electoral vote.

Resolved by the assembly, (the Senate concurring,) That Hon. CHARLES W. JONES be requested to present the following memorial to the Senate of the United States, and that Hon. JESSE J. FINLEY be requested to present the same to the House of Representatives of the United States:

The people of the State of Florida, represented in the senate and assembly, memorializing the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, respectfully represent that the final counting of the four electoral votes of Florida for Rutherford B. Hayes and William A. Wheeler, when the said votes had been actually and honestly cast for Samuel J. Tilden and Thomas A. Hendricks is a grievance of such magnitude to your memorialists that in their view this appeal is not only fully warranted, but cogently demanded by the voice of duty. Your memorialists hold themselves to be justified in treating as established and unquestionable the fact that the said electoral votes were diverted from their true course and employed to defeat the end which they had been set forth to accomplish, because the knowledge of this fact has been communicated to your honorable bodies by solemn acts of all departments of the government of Florida. While it is true that the executive branch of said government had previously averred the contrary, it has been made known to your honorable bodies, and is rapidly becoming known throughout the civilized world, that according to the highest judicial authority of the State that averment is false.

Your memorialists may be forced to admit that there is no remedy for the specific wrong of which they herein complain, but they implore the early and earnest attention of your honorable bodies to the vices or defects in the Constitution or laws of the United States by reason of which such a wrong became possible. If it is true that under the Federal Constitution an exigency may arise in which one fraudulent act performed, or one mistake committed by a majority of a canvassing board, must necessarily defeat the will of the American people and determine the occupancy of the highest position open to human ambition, your memorialists fear that the great instrument which they have been accustomed to regard as the unapproachable masterpiece of statesmanship will become an object of derision and scorn.

Your memorialists venture to express the hope that the wisdom which characterizes your honorable bodies will be speedily applied to the devising of some expedient whereby it shall be made certain that the nation will never again prove utterly impotent to protect itself against the illegal action of a board of canvassers. And your memorialists will ever pray, &c.

Adopted by the assembly, February 12, 1877.

Adopted by the senate, February 13, 1877.

STATE OF FLORIDA,
Office Secretary of State, ss:

I, William D. Bloxham, secretary of state, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a correct transcript of the original now on file in this office.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Florida, at Tallahassee, the capital, this 26th day of February, A. D. 1877.

[SEAL.] W. D. BLOXHAM,
Secretary of State.

PAY OF A COMMITTEE CLERK.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to the clerk of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Forty-fourth Congress, out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, the same compensation which is now allowed by law, for the term of sixty days after the adjournment of the Forty-fourth Congress.

Mr. HUNTON. I object.

COMPENSATION TO CERTAIN LAND-OWNERS.

Mr. TARBOX. I move to take from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 186) to provide for compensation to the owners of certain lands ceded by the United States to Great Britain in and by the treaty of Washington of July 9, 1842. This bill has passed both branches. The amendments of the Senate are merely technical, and I ask that they be concurred in.

There being no objection, the amendments were concurred in.

EMPLOYÉS IN DOORKEEPER'S DEPARTMENT.

Mr. BOONE. I ask unanimous consent to have adopted at the present time the resolution which I send to the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Robert Coats be paid out of the contingent fund of the House the sum of $210 for services rendered as a laborer in the Doorkeeper's department from August 15, 1876, to the 1st day of December, 1876; and that James Hall be paid out of the contingent ——

Mr. EDEN, (interrupting.) On behalf of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who has been called out to sign a conference report, I object.

RECESS.

Mr. HOLMAN, (having returned to the Hall.) I move that the House take a recess for half an hour, to enable the clerks to get up with the public business. They must have this time or we cannot get our bills through.

Mr. WHITE. Would it not be in order to pass an additional appropriation to hire some new clerks so as to catch up with the business?

Mr. HOOKER. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Indiana so as to take a recess till ten o'clock.

Mr. HOLMAN. That will be too late. But we may as well take a recess till nine o'clock. We can do nothing until that hour.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HOOKER, it was not agreed to.

Mr. KNOTT. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Indiana so as to say half past nine o'clock instead of nine.

Mr. HOLMAN. That will do no harm.

The amendment of Mr. KNOTT was agreed to; and the motion of Mr. HOLMAN, as amended, was adopted.

The House accordingly (at eight o'clock and thirty-five minutes a. m.) took a recess till half past nine o'clock.

The recess having expired, the House re-assembled at half past nine o'clock a. m., and was called to order by Mr. COX, as Speaker pro tempore.

THANKS TO THE SPEAKER.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, the business of the House presses upon us; its sessions are long and laborious; the air we breathe is unwholesome, and gentlemen are anxious—how well I know it—to throw off the burden of official position and escape to the clearer and sweeter atmosphere of home. But there is one duty to which I am sure the House can give its attention for a moment with satisfaction. It is the appropriate and customary acknowledgment of our obligations to the honorable Speaker for the assistance he has rendered us in the discharge of the important and arduous legislative labors of this session.

Few of us, I think, estimate justly the difficulties inseparably connected with this high office. Its duties seem light and easy as they are rapidly performed from day to day in our presence; but when, occasionally, we make an experiment for ourselves, we realize how very far short of the truth is our estimate of its perplexities and cares. In no office of the Government are official duties more responsible or difficult, in none are greater rectitude and attention required, and in none is there more of that imperceptible mingling of routine and regulation, of ministerial and judicial functions, of which we have recently heard so much, than is constantly demanded of the Speaker of this House in the supervision and direction of its daily business.

The close of the last session brought us to a sad and solemn though not unexpected event which called for an expression of our appreciation of the national importance of this position and of the indissoluble bonds of respect and affection that connect the members of the House with its presiding officer, and it became later a pleasant duty on two subsequent occasions to attest our confidence and make our acknowledgments in this regard to others than the present occupant of the chair, [Messrs. COX and SAYLER,] who succeeded temporarily the estimable and honored officer whose name will be honored among the eminent men who preceded him and whose untimely decease the House does not and will not cease to mourn. And as we are now about to return to separate and distant homes—bearing with us, I trust, the good wishes of all for all—it is an act not less of duty than of grace to make our official and final acknowledgments to him who is now the presiding officer of the assembly.

I send to the Chair a resolution expressing my own and the views of my associates on this side of the Chamber, trusting that it may receive the approval of all members of the House and be placed upon its Journals as an expression of respect, made with unanimity and sincerity, for the honorable Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be, and hereby are, tendered to Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, Speaker, for the prompt, efficient, and impartial discharge of the duties of his office during the present arduous and important session of the Forty-fourth Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to second the resolution which has been submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] and to add a single word to what he has so well said. I have for some years occupied a seat upon this floor. Considering the new, unusual, and embarrassing questions that have arisen during the present session of Congress, the trying position which our Speaker has occupied, I think it is proper for me to say that the resolution which has been read expresses more nearly than has ordinarily been the case, however proper on former occasions, the just compliments which the House should pay to a faithful and efficient presiding officer whose duties have been performed impartially and well. The value of the services of a public officer occupying so important a position, can be judged somewhat by the embarrassments which surround the public service in times of great excitement and perhaps of great public peril. I therefore, with very great satisfaction, second the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. We have heard from the older members of this House. I would like to say one word, being one of the youngest members of this House.

A new Speaker begins with understood equality between him and members on the floor. Respect is won as aptness to administer the rules is manifested. When ordinary business is being transacted no special tact is necessary; but when great pecuniary or political interests are being discussed, the mettle of a presiding officer is tested.

No Speaker of the American Congress has ever been required to guide in deliberations where such interests were at stake as those which have agitated us for the past month, during which the greatest parliamentary contest of the century has taken place. If gentlemen of the majority have been restive under restraint, they must remember that rules are for the protection of the minority; and if gentlemen of the minority expected greater privileges, they must conclude that no Speaker can supplement the want of votes.

Mr. Speaker RANDALL has been compelled to decide during the last month on questions where the rules gave no light; and now, after a survey of the intensely exciting debates, we must admit that the Speaker has done his part exceedingly well; and in future, when we calmly consider the fearful storms through which we have been safely guided, we will again in our hearts thank Mr. RANDALL, who arose to sublime heights when occasion required.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the resolution be entered upon the Journal of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

THOMAS E. MALEY.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 1111 for the relief of Thomas E. Maley be taken from the Speaker's table, and passed at this time.

The bill provides that Thomas E. Maley, who was on December 15, 1870, duly retired from the active service and placed upon the list of retired officers of the Army, with the full rank and pay of lieutenant-colonel, on account of wounds received in battle while performing the duties of lieutenant-colonel in the command of eight companies of his regiment, shall be excepted and relieved from the operation of the act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief of General Samuel W. Crawford, and to fix the rank and pay of retired officers of the Army," approved March 3, 1875, solely because the injuries received by him in battle were more severe, dangerous, and disabling, and more fully incapacitating and disqualifying him for any service than the loss of an arm or a leg, or the permanent disability of an arm or a leg by resection; and he is hereby restored upon the list of the retired officers of the Army with the full rank of lieutenant-colonel held by him at the date of his retirement, March 3, 1875, with the pay of such rank from the date of the passage of this act, and that he shall hold and receive the rank and pay of a lieutenant-colonel upon the list of retired officers of the Army.

Mr. WALLING. I object to that bill; we have had too much military already.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill is not before the House.

Mr. WALLING subsequently said: I objected, not from any captious spirit, but because I thought the bill was objectionable. I have since examined it, and I am satisfied that it is a meritorious bill and should be passed; accordingly, I withdraw my objection.

No further objection being made, the bill was passed.

GEORGE A. ARMES.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to withdraw the objection I made last evening to the bill (S. No. 407) to authorize the restoration of George A. Armes, to the rank of captain.

There being no further objection, the bill was read three times and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the passage of the following bills and joint resolution, without amendment:

An act (H. R. No. 183) granting an increase of pension to John E. Wunderlin, late private in the Thirty-third Regiment, New York Volunteer Infantry;

An act (H. R. No. 545) for the relief of James A. Jackson and others, securities of G. R. Horton, late postmaster at Monticello, Arkansas;

An act (H. R. No. 1244) granting a pension to James W. Thompson, late of Company H, Forty-seventh Illinois Volunteers;

An act (H. R. No. 1288) granting a pension to Jonathan Roberts, of Marietta, Iowa;

An act (H. R. No. 1566) granting a pension to Elizabeth D. Stoner;

An act (H. R. No. 3277) granting a pension to Kate Louise Roy; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 161) authorizing the Secretary of State to publish the history of the several surveys and scientific expeditions by the United States during the present century.

It further announced the passage of the following bills, in which concurrence was requested:

An act (S. No. 1289) for the relief of E. N. Horsford; and

An act (S. No. 844) for the relief of Nathaniel P. Harbin, of Georgia.

It further announced that Mr. HEREFORD had been appointed a manager on the part of the Senate on the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 472) changing the time of holding the terms of the district court for the district of West Virginia, in place of Mr. CAPERTON.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 35) equalizing pensions of certain officers in the Navy;

An act (S. No. 210) granting a pension to Austin R. Mills;

An act (S. No. 407) to authorize the restoration of George A. Armes to the rank of captain;

An act (S. No. 535) granting a pension to Armstead Goodlow;

An act (S. No. 539) to provide for an increase of pension in favor of Martin Kelly;

An act (S. No. 599) granting a pension to Catharine A. Winslow, widow of the late Rear-Admiral John A. Winslow;

An act (S. No. 735) granting a pension to Martha Irwin, widow of John Irwin;

An act (S. No. 737) granting a pension to Harrison H. Dodds;

An act (S. No. 750) granting a pension to T. B. Murdock;

An act (S. No. 767) granting a pension to Theodore Gardner;

An act (S. No. 792) granting a pension to Peter Harder;

An act (S. No. 803) to repeal an act granting a pension to Mary H. Bartlett, approved January 28, 1873;

An act (S. No. 813) granting an increase of pension to Laurence P. N. Landrum;

An act (S. No. 816) granting a pension to Laura M. Knowlton;

An act (S. No. 832) to increase the pension of Helen M. Stansbury;

An act (S. No. 882) granting a pension to Stillman E. Dix, of Hampton, Virginia;

An act (S. No. 883) granting a pension to William H. Oliver, of Sweetwater, Tennessee;

An act (S. No. 980) granting a pension to Irena Garrett;

An act (S. No. 1118) granting a pension to Mrs. Amy King;

An act (S. No. 1123) granting a pension to Marsilvia F. Woodard, mother of George R. Woodard; and

An act (S. No. 1152) granting a pension to Amasa J. Finch.

Mr. POPPLETON also, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 3628) establishing post-roads, and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 4433) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I send to the Clerk's desk a report from the committee of conference.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to bill (H. R. No. 4691) making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have to report to their respective Houses as follows:

That they are unable to agree.

JOHN D. C. ATKINS,
J. G. ABBOTT,
CHARLES FOSTER,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. G. BLAINE,
WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
R. E. WITHERS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, it is proper for me to say the committee of conference, as the report indicates, have made no progress whatever. We could not even agree on the minor matter of the reduction of the salary of the General of the Army. We were not able to agree upon a small matter like that, while upon the great question of the reduction of force we were utterly unable to agree. Although, sir, (if it be not improper for me to make such a remark, and if it is I hope I will be checked in the progress of making it,) although the House conferees were willing to concede something on the subject of force, yet no indication of concession whatever was made on the part of the Senate conferees on that subject; none whatever.

As to the restrictive clause contained in the fifth section of the bill, they were still more implacable. I have to say, so far as I am concerned, that I have taken my position, and I shall not yield on the subject of the reduction of the force; that is, I will not yield to any increase of the Army over 20,000 men. Nor will I yield the fifth section at all.

Now, if this House chooses to have another conference committee and if it thinks this restrictive clause should be stricken from the bill and we should yield, I hope some indication will be given in some manner by which I at least will be relieved from further service on this conference committee. For myself, I want to say here and now (and gentlemen will pardon me for it) that I am somewhat incredulous. I am not ready to take as solemn pledges the little rumors floating through this Hall, through this Federal capital, and around through the country of the intended peace policy of the gentleman who is about to assume the reins of government. I for one, sir——

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the adoption by that body of the report of the conference committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. There is nothing in this fifth section of the bill which in my judgment militates against the Constitution of the country in any way whatever. There is nothing in it which prevents the preservation of the peace. Why, sir, is not the Army to-day in Louisiana? Have we not dual governments in the State of Louisiana? Does anybody suppose the non-use of the Army in the State of Louisiana would not be in the way of peace? This proposition simply proposes that the Army shall not be used for the purpose of setting up a rotten-borough government in the State of Louisiana over the wishes and sentiments of the masses and the sovereignty of that State. That is all this section amounts to. It means nothing more.

I shall not detain the House further, Mr. Speaker. There is but a single issue, and that is whether the Army shall be kept in this country as a political engine. That is all the issue there is in it: whether or not the Army shall turn out State governments and erect rotten-borough governments; whether it shall control elections. I think the Army was designed by the framers of the Constitution to repel foreign invasion and suppress insurrection. I did not know the offices of the Army were to build up political power in this country for one party or the other.

There is but a single issue, and I for one am in favor of this House doing as the House of Commons does in England—hold its hands upon the Army. The House has got its hands upon the purse-strings, and the House should hold the Army, as the House of Commons in England holds the army now.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. ATKINS. I decline to yield. The army in England is a yearly establishment. It is within the province of the House of Commons of England to withhold the appropriations and let the army fall at the end of any fiscal year.

Now I want to say so far as I am concerned that I am in favor of retaining the Army of this country for legitimate purposes. I would not cut this Army down one man below what is necessary for those purposes. But if we cannot have an Army bill without appropriating money to support an army for the purpose of keeping up carpet-bag governments over the will of the people, I, for one, must enter my demurrer here and now; and if it fall on that account it matters not to me. There is but a single issue involved here, and I hope gentlemen will at once make up their minds on this question. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JENKS.]

Mr. JENKS. This fifth section, which seems to be the main cause of quarrel between the two Houses, it seems to me to be not only our privilege but our duty to pass and to insist on, although it should cause such a disagreement between the two Houses as would prevent the passage of the Army appropriation bill altogether. The facts as they now exist are known to Congress. This provision applies only to the facts as they now exist, while Congress is in session. It refers to the rival governments of Francis T. Nicholls and S. B. Packard in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. The confusion is so great that we cannot hear the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. This is a subject of great importance, of as great importance, perhaps, as any that has yet engaged the attention of the House. Order must be maintained.

Mr. CLYMER. I make the suggestion that in the closing hours of this Congress, when it is very important that we should intelligently transact our business, the rule with reference to admissions to the floor be rigidly and strictly enforced.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman might accomplish that object by moving to suspend the rules so that the Chair could revoke all privileges of the floor.

Mr. JAMES B. REILLY. I move that the rules be suspended so that the Speaker may enforce order in the way suggested.

Mr. ATKINS. If that motion takes me from the floor I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will not be taken from the floor; but it is very essential that order be maintained during the remaining minutes of this Congress. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the rule be suspended which authorizes admission to the floor of others than members, members-elect, and ex-members.

Mr. CONGER. I hope that for the first time that rule will not be suspended. It is the first time in eight years that I have known such a resolution to be offered here. I think we can get through the session without suspending that rule.

The SPEAKER. Perhaps the suggestion will be sufficient to enable the Chair to preserve order.

Mr. CLYMER. I suggest that it be left in the discretion of the Speaker. Let the Chair have this power if in his judgment it be necessary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no power to suspend a rule.

Mr. BANKS. If members of the House will remain in their seats and not talk I think there will be no trouble.

Mr. JENKS. I was proceeding to say that the state of facts to which we proposed to apply this provision of the act exists now, while Congress is in session. Congress is fully cognizant of the facts, and when Congress is in session and is cognizant of any given state of facts it is declared, by the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution, to be its privilege, and its privilege alone, to determine what shall be done with reference to those facts. I call the attention of the House to the language of that section:

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.

Now, sir, it is not the President of the United States that shall guarantee to every State in the Union a republican form of government, but it is "the United States"—the United States represented by its whole legislative department. And it is the same power which is intrusted with the protecting of each State against invasion. In case of a foreign war, Congress, if it can be convened, is invariably convened to determine what shall be done; and if Congress is in session, it has always the potent voice as to what action shall be taken in reference to that. Then the next clause, without any change as to the power which shall decide, declares it to be the duty of the United States, on application of the Legislature, or of the executive when the Legislature cannot be convened, to protect each State against domestic violence; showing that even an executive of a State, if it be possible to convene the Legislature, shall not ask the United States to sustain himself or any one else in power; showing that the Legislature or rather the sovereignty, whoever represents it, shall exercise and control this power.

This being so, if Congress can be convened, the President has no right to send troops into any State either to sustain or overthrow a government. If an emergency should occur in which Congress could not convene, then the President might be justified in taking action in the matter. But when Congress can be convened, it is not only our duty but our privilege to decide the question. If it be objected that this is interjecting new matter into the appropriation bill it is our right and duty to insist, because upon this principle are founded all the liberties of all the people of the Anglo-Saxon race.

Mr. ATKINS. I now yield a few moments to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

A bill (S. No. 1250) for the relief of Willis L. Foulke.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSTER. The difference between the two Houses in regard to the Army appropriation bill is this: the Senate presents to the House precisely the bill of last session; I believe, in all respects the bill of last year. I believe, sir, that it is not only possible but probable that if this fifth section was out of the way, if there could be some agreement about that, we should have no difficulty in coming to an agreement as to the size of the Army. So that the simple question for the House now to consider is the fifth section, which relates to the use of troops in South Carolina, Louisiana, and other States.

Now, I want to say this to gentlemen on the other side of the House, that it must be plain to them that the march of events is such as to be convincing that the policy of the future Administration is in the line that they so much desire.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FOSTER. I decline to be interrupted just now.

Mr. ATKINS. I was courteous enough to yield the floor to the gentleman, and I supposed that he would be courteous enough to allow me to ask a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio was a member of the conference and is entitled to be heard.

Mr. FOSTER. While I do not stand here to represent anybody or to speak for anybody, yet I want to ask gentlemen on the other side of the House, is it wise at this time, when all indications point to a change of administration in respect to the use made of troops in the States, now to force upon the Senate and upon this side of the House a proposition like that contained in the fifth section of the bill? I believe that there need be no apprehension on the part of gentlemen on the other side of the House on this subject.

Mr. COX. Then why not pass this section?

Mr. FOSTER. No gentleman on the other side of the House under ordinary circumstance would ask for the ingrafting on an appropriation bill a clause like this. In 1854, when the republicans undertook to do this thing in relation to the State of Kansas, if you will read the debates you will find that the democrats at that time had the advantage of the republicans in the argument on the constitutionality of this question.

The question is now presented to this House whether or not it will insist upon this provision and thus precipitate an extra session of Congress. That is just where we stand at this moment. We have left but about two hours of the session, or less than that, and that is the question presented for our consideration.

Mr. ATKINS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio if he favors the policy of withdrawing the troops from South Carolina and Louisiana and allowing the people of those States to regulate their own affairs in their own way, subject to the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. FOSTER. I believe in the doctrine which I enunciated here the other day, that the flag should float over States, and not provinces; over freemen, not subjects.

Mr. ATKINS. I now yield for a few minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.]

Mr. BANKS. It is too late, sir, for argument. I believe with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] that the pledges of men in office or out are of no account. But there are some suggestions which will certainly weigh with the House in the careful consideration of the report and bill before us.

In regard to what we should do upon the subject presented to the House by the gentleman from Tennessee, the first question should be: what is in our power? Now, I agree with him that the strength of the Army, the number of men and its equipment are within the control of Congress. If it chooses to say that the Army shall consist of twenty thousand men, or more or less, it can make it so. It can organize such an army as it pleases, and whatever the judgment of the committee of conference may be upon that subject, I am willing to receive it and accept it, as upon any other subject which is within the discretion and power of Congress. But there are some things which are not within the power of the two Houses of Congress, and among those is the command of the Army.

> The President shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States.

That is the language of the Constitution. (Section 2, article 2.) Congress has power to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States. (Section 8, article 1.) Undoubtedly it has the same power in regard to the Regular Army of the United States; but its command is given to the President. It is the duty of the United States to "guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government," and "on application of the Legislature, or of the executive when the Legislature cannot be convened," to protect each of them against invasion and domestic violence. Whatever power is given in the Constitution for this purpose is given to Congress and the President, but the command of the Army is nevertheless in the President. That part of the Constitution cannot be changed by an act of Congress. And the fifth section of the bill is inoperative and of no account without the concurrence of the President or its approval by two-thirds of both Houses of Congress. This cannot now be obtained for the purposes proposed by this section of the Army bill, and therefore, whether the President be a democratic President or a republican President, or a democratic-republican President, if a State government by its Legislature or executive officers should apply for protection against invasion or domestic violence, whoever should be at the head of the Government would be bound by his oath to furnish it. Any legislation in contravention of these principles would be like the grinding of a hand-organ on the streets.

What is the use of legislation of this kind, then, which is impossible of execution at our order? It will involve the necessity of an extra session of Congress if the bill fails to pass the two Houses, or if it passes with the fifth section, and subject the members of the House to an expense of from $500 to $1,000, without effecting any good results whatever. I do not object to the House doing anything that is within the power of Congress.

If there be in the State of South Carolina or Louisiana or in any other State of the Republic an organized armed resistance to the government of the State, and that government calls upon the President of the United States, whoever he may be or whatever may be his politics or his partisan relations, he will use the Army for its protection. And whether the Army be paid or not, if there be a necessity to maintain in any State a republican form of government, or to protect it against invasion or domestic violence, the Army will be used for that purpose whoever may hold the office of President, and he will hold himself responsible to the examination afterward of Congress for his acts.

Now let me ask the members of the conference committee and the gentlemen of this House to consider this proposition; if we make the appropriations for the Army depend upon its use in conformity with the Constitution and the laws of the country, so far as the subject is within the control of the law-making power, what more can we do? I am sure that every member of the House, at least on this side, will be willing to accord to Congress so much power as that, and to sustain any report of the committee of conference based upon this view of the subject. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy.

Mr. ATKINS. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the attention of the House for a moment, and first on the question of the very right of this matter, without regard to any man or any administration. The chief, if not the summary, power with which the Executive of the nation is clothed for the purpose of preserving the public peace is the power of the Army and the Navy, of which he is commander-in-chief. No man can know in advance whether by foreign war, by domestic broils, or by insurrection in cities or States, that right arm of the Government will be needed, or where it will be needed to preserve the peace. But the Constitution makes it the sworn duty of the President of the United States to preserve the peace.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me to get through. It is proposed now to say, in advance, that in certain States of this Union there shall be no use of the Army under any conceivable circumstances connected with existing real or pretended State governments. Now, I desire to say that there never has been a law upon the national statute-book that assumes to prevent the President from performing his constitutional duty to preserve the public peace. Yet such a law it now is proposed to append to the appropriation bill for the support of the Army. Certainly there is no pending menace of usurpation which requires such a measure. It would dishonor any Congress to undertake to shackle any President by such a provision. It will especially dishonor this. So much for the law of the case.

In the next place, if gentlemen believe that they can accomplish any purpose in the direction of peace, in the direction of moderation, by putting a clog upon the incoming administration, they neither understand human nature nor the spirit of generosity that dwells in the hearts of men.

Mr. TUCKER. The gentleman utters a threat.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not at all; I am pointing out the unwisdom of your putting a threat into the law.

Let me say another thing in all frankness to gentlemen on the other side of this House. Ever since the close of the war both sections of the country have been to a great extent filled with mutual distrust. No doubt much of it is unjust, doubtless unjust on our part toward you, and in some measure unjust on your part toward us. But now when we are closing the life of this Congress, when we see evidences of a better understanding, of renewed efforts to bury the bitterness of the past, is it wise for you to insist upon a measure which, if adopted, will greatly increase the distrust which many of our people have felt toward you. It is wise to take such a course that men of suspicious minds will say that the men who were once in rebellion against the Government are determined to shackle the Executive, to shackle the Army, and to prevent them from keeping peace in case disturbances shall occur? Do you not run the risk of leading people to think you wish to break the public peace, and that by this measure you are preparing for disturbance?

I ask gentlemen who represent the Southern States whether they think that is a wise and prudent and magnanimous course, even if it were constitutional?

Mr. ELLIS. I do, certainly.

Mr. GARFIELD. But, coming back to the constitutional question, the passage of this clause in the Army bill is absolutely impossible. We cannot under any circumstances consent to do what we know to be unconstitutional and believe to be dishonorable.

An extra session of Congress, in the present excited state of the public mind, is greatly to be deplored. It will not be conducive to a restoration of good feeling; it will prolong the paralysis of business.

But the responsibility for all its evils must rest upon those who insist upon a departure from the Constitution and the traditions of the Government.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 667) for the relief of William Wheeler Hubbell, and to make just compensation for the past making, or use, or vending of his patent explosive shell-fuses and percussion-exploders by the United States;

An act (S. No. 709) for the relief of Hans C. Petersen;

An act (S. No. 917) to enable Erastus T. Bussell, of Indianapolis, Indiana, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for extension of letters-patent for a "combined rubber and spiral steel spring;"

An act (S. No. 920) to authorize Louis Petosky, of Michigan, to enter a certain tract of land which embraces his home and improvements;

An act (S. No. 949) for the relief of A. M. Garoutte, late captain and assistant quartermaster United States Army;

An act (S. No. 1010) for the relief of Julius S. Bohrer, master in the United States Navy;

An act (S. No. 1127) for the relief of J. B. McCullough;

An act (S. No. 1292) to remove the political disabilities of John M. Haden, of Galveston, Texas; and

An act (S. No. 1293) to remove the political disabilities of Theophilus H. Holmes, of North Carolina.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FIELD.]

Mr. FIELD. Mr. Speaker, this is a question of principle. We have now arrived at the supreme moment when this House must show whether or no it will exercise its constitutional rights. To gentlemen of the South I say, now is your time to stand up; for if you do, your friends can say to you, "Lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh."

Is this the time to give way, when our political opponents are about to set a falsehood in the forehead of this nation? No. It is our right to insist upon this provision. The constitutional argument against it is utterly untenable. The Constitution provides that "the United States," not the President, "shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive when the Legislature cannot be convened, against domestic violence." Do gentlemen believe that the President is the one to exercise this power? I would ask my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] whether he thinks that the President can march an army into Massachusetts to-morrow and declare that it has not a republican form of government, and therefore takes control of it? If he cannot, then we have a right to pass this proviso, because the two cases are in the same category. The President has no more right under the Constitution, without legislation by Congress, to interfere with the administration of a State government or to decide which is the rightfully chosen governor than he has to decide whether a State has a republican form of government.

Why, sir, gentlemen forget the constitutional history of this country. The Government was established under the Constitution in 1789, and no law to permit the President to interfere by armed force in a State was passed until 1795. President Washington went on for six years without the power to interfere with a State government. The law of 1795 was passed, if I mistake not, in consequence of the whisky insurrection in Pennsylvania. The power under consideration was then given to President Washington so far as to use the militia; the power to use the Army was not given till years afterward. If there was no such power granted to the President during the first six years of the Government can we not take it away now?

We ought to take it away. What do we see? We see State governments set up and pulled down by our soldiers. We see, (for it is idle to attempt concealment of the truth)—we see the Army used to put down one party and to put up another. We have seen the Army used to elect a President. Everybody knows—in this Hall, at least, there is not a man so blind as not to see—that but for the use of the Federal troops in Florida and Louisiana you would not see the inauguration of the President who is to take the oath in an hour and a half from now.

Mr. Speaker, I appeal again to every member on this side of the House to stamp his condemnation once for all upon the monstrous doctrine that the President can use your Army as he pleases. It is your right, not his, to make rules for its government and regulation. We hold the purse-strings; control of them was given to us for this very purpose. Else why the provision that no appropriation for the Army shall be for a longer term than two years. No act of Congress can be passed that shall tie up the hands of this House.

Let us stand firm. [Here a burst of sunlight flashed over the ceiling.] Behold, the light cometh and the sun shines out gloriously; I accept the auspicious omen. [Applause.] Let us stand firm. The responsibility of an extra session will not rest with us. If the Senate choose to say to this House "The Army bill shall not be passed unless you give the President power to keep Packard and Chamberlain in office," then let us answer back, "Take that responsibility, if you dare." [Applause.]

Mr. ATKINS. I have just one remark to make. I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that the southern members on this floor are in my opinion the peers of the gentleman in patriotism.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly; I do not deny it.

Mr. BANKS. Nobody questions it.

Mr. ATKINS. The language of the gentleman from Ohio, I think, was intended to convey the idea (although he did not say so distinctly) that there is lurking in the hearts of southern members on this floor a want of fealty to the Government.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will allow me to disclaim any such implication.

Mr. ATKINS. I am glad the gentleman makes the disclaimer, because I want to say here and now that I am for the flag——

Mr. GARFIELD. So am I.

Mr. ATKINS. I am for the Union; I am for the Constitution. Is the gentleman for the Constitution?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly I am.

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, according to his construction of it. The difference between us, however, is that I put upon it the construction that the Supreme Court of the United States has usually put upon it; but these late decisions of a part of the Supreme Court I do not know that I can subscribe to.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement and ask a new conference with the Senate.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment? [Cries of "O, no!"]

Several MEMBERS. Let us adhere, not insist.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House adhere to its disagreement.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] will not insist upon that motion.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to move that the House recede?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. KASSON. Then I make that motion, and wish five minutes to be heard on it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves the House insist and ask for a further conference; and the gentleman from Iowa moves the House recede.

Mr. KASSON. I ask if, having made that motion, I am entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has demanded the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. Then I withdraw the motion to recede, and leave it to be decided on the gentleman's motion.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof, Mr. ATKINS's motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced as the conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Army appropriation bill, Mr. ATKINS, Mr. MORRISON, and Mr. FOSTER.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to submit a privileged report. I submit the report of the conference committee of the two Houses on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4680) making appropriation for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1878, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 5, 8, 9, 10, 13, 17, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 36, 41, 43, 46, 47, 48, 49, 51, 53, 56, 59, 68, 73, 75, 79, 84, 85, 96, 110, and 118.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 4, 6, 12, 14, 15, 16, 24, 25, 26, 27, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 37, 40, 44, 57, 65, 69, 70, 71, 76, 78, 80, 81, 82, 83, 86, 87, 89, 90, 91, 93, 94, 95, 97, 99, 100, 104, 113, 114, 116, 120, 125, 127, 128, and 129, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 1, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 7, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$2,650,000," and in line 22, page 4 of the bill, after the word "engineers" insert "cadets," and in line 1, page 5, after the word "departments" insert "instruction of cadets."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 11, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

Strike out all after the paragraph proposed to be inserted, and insert in lieu thereof, "For the general purposes of the District of Columbia, to be expended by the commissioners of said District, $250,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 18, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

Strike out "19" and insert in lieu thereof "18;" and strike out "500."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 29 and 30, and agree to the same, with amendments respectively as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed by 29, insert "$300,000;" and in amendment numbered 30, strike out in line 9, page 11, of the bill the word "13," and insert in lieu thereof the word "16;" and in the same line after the word "timbered," insert "and mountainous;" and after the word "mile," in line 10, add "and for township lines not exceeding $14, and for section lines not exceeding $10."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 38, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

Strike out all inserted by said amendment, and strike out the amended paragraph and substitute therefor the following:

"For the Freedmen's Hospital and Asylum in Washington, District of Columbia, namely: For subsistence, $18,000; salaries and compensation as follows: surgeon, $1,400; one surgeon and dispensary clerk, $1,200; engineer, $720; matron, $216; nurses and cooks, $1,800; fuel and light, $3,000; clothing, $3,500; rent of hospital building, $2,000; medicines and medical supplies, $2,500; and miscellaneous expenses, $5,164; in all, $40,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 39, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

Strike out "25" and insert "18."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 42, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "2" and insert in lieu thereof "1," and strike out "500;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 45, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "100" and insert in lieu thereof "50;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 150, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "100" and insert in lieu thereof "75;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 52, 54, 55, and 58, and agree to the same, with amendments respectively as follows: In 52, strike out "50" and insert "30;"

In 54, strike out "50" and insert "30;"

In 55, strike out "100" and insert "50;"

In 58, strike out "100" and insert "50."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 60, 61, 62, and 63, and agree to the same, with amendments respectively as follows:

In 60 strike out "50" and insert "30;"

In 61 strike out "80" and insert "60;"

In 62 strike out "50" and insert "40;"

In 63 add at the end of the paragraph, "to be immediately available."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 64, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Restore that portion of the paragraph proposed to be stricken out; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 66 and 67, and agree to the same, with amendments in effect respectively as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by 66 insert "$250,000," and in lieu of the sum proposed by 67 insert "$150,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 72 and 74, and agree to the same, with amendments respectively as follows: In 72 strike out the word "two" and insert "500," and in 74, strike out "100" and insert "75;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 77, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "Daniel" and insert "Darrall;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 88, 92, and 98, and agree to the same, with amendments respectively as follows: Strike out in 88, line 5, "1877," and insert in lieu thereof "at the present session of Congress;" in 92, in line 1, strike out "5" and insert "3;" and in lines 8 and 9 strike out "25" and insert "18;" and in 98 strike out in line 7, "2," and insert "1;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 101 and 102, and agree to the same, with amendments respectively as follows: In 101, add at the end of the amendment "and the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad Company is required to refund to the Treasury of the United States one-half of the said sum, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to enforce this condition;" and in lieu of the sum proposed by 102 insert "$65,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 103, 105, and 106, and agree to the same, with amendments respectively as follows:

In 103 strike out "80" and insert "50;"

In 105 strike out "25" and insert "10;"

In 106 strike out in line 3 "hereafter;" and at the end of the paragraph insert "prior to the 1st of February, 1878."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 107 108, 109, 111, and 112, and agree to the same, with amendments respectively as follows:

In 107 strike out "5" and insert "4;"

In 108, in lieu of the sum proposed, substitute "1,500;"

In 109 in lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,500;"

In 111 strike out "3" and insert "2;"
In 112 strike out "6" and insert "4."
And the Senate agree to the same.
That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 115, 117, and 119, and agree to the same, with amendments respectively as follows:
In 115 strike out "30" and insert "20;"
In 117 strike out "five" and insert "four;"
In lieu of the sum proposed in 119 substitute "22,500."
And the Senate agree to the same.
That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 121 and 122, and agree to the same, with amendments respectively as follows:
In 121 strike out "20" and insert "15;"
In 122 strike out "40" and insert "20."
And the Senate agree to the same.
That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 123, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "300" and insert "200," and strike out "200" and insert "100;" and the Senate agree to the same.
That the House recede from its disagreement to amendment 126, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "2,500;" and the Senate agree to the same.

WILLIAM S. HOLMAN,
JOHN R. EDEN,
HENRY WALDRON,
Managers on the part of the House.
WILLIAM WINDOM,
WILLIAM A. WALLACE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to submit a few remarks explanatory of the concessions which have been made by the House upon this bill, but owing to the lateness of the hour I find it impossible to do so, and I therefore ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, as a part of the debates, some remarks upon the subject of this bill and of the expenditures generally.

There was no objection, and leave was granted.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 1200) for the relief of Almont Barnes;

A bill (H. R. No. 1479) granting a pension to Dalton Hinchman;

A bill (H. R. No. 1995) granting a pension to Charles H. Bugbee, late private in Company A, Third Vermont Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 2237) granting a pension to Anson K. Young;

A bill (H. R. No. 3282) granting a pension to Sarah McCooey; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3989) for the relief of Catharine and Sophia Germain.

SIGNAL SERVICE.

Mr. SINGLETON. I submit a report from a committee of conference.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 731) to limit and fix the Signal Service, having met, after full and free conference, report that they are unable to agree.

OTHO R. SINGLETON,
JAMES H. BLOUNT,
JAMES WILSON,
Managers on the part of the House.
GEO. E. SPENCER,
JAMES CLAYTON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move that the conference committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MUTCHLER obtained the floor.

Mr. HOOKER. At the time when the business of the House was interrupted by the reports of the privileged committee of conference on the sundry civil bill the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] had the floor, and his bill was in progress of being read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman hereafter.

EXTRA PAY TO CLERKS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House to the several clerks of the House committees who are paid during the session only, a sum equal to one month's salary as extra compensation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to that.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I move to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division there were ayes 105, noes not counted.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call attention to the fact that no quorum voted, but if this is the last of the long series of these measures I will not insist upon a further count.

EXTRA PAY TO DOORKEEPERS.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I move that the rules be suspended and that the following resolution be adopted:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to the laborers on the roll of the Doorkeeper of the House their salary in full for the month of March out of the fund already appropriated for that purpose.

The question being taken and two-thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the resolution was agreed to.

PATRICK DORAN.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I move that the rules be suspended and that the following resolution be adopted:

Resolved, That the sum of $3.60 per day during the present session be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to Patrick Doran for services rendered by him as messenger to the Committee on Agriculture and other committees that have occupied the room of the said committee.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the resolution was adopted.

CLERK OF THE COMMITTEE OF ACCOUNTS.

Mr. FORT, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the Committee of Accounts, for clerical services to be rendered during the coming recess, a sum equal to one month's salary, in addition to what may now be provided by law for committee clerks, the same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

NATHANIEL S. CLARK.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to Nathaniel S. Clark, for services rendered as messenger under the Doorkeeper of the House, from September 1 to December 4, 1876, a sum at the rate of $3.60 per day.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate further insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. No. 4691) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes, had agreed to the further conference requested by the House, and had appointed as the managers of the conference on the part of the Senate, Mr. BLAINE, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. WALLACE.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 2386) for the relief of Moses F. Carleton, late second lieutenant of Company I, Fourth Michigan Infantry Volunteers.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 1082) for the relief of Henry H. Meade, late paymaster United States Army; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3483) to restore John Palford, lieutenant-colonel United States Army, (retired,) to his former rank on the retired list.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1200) for the relief of Almont Barnes.

PEREZ DICKINSON.

Mr. HOUSE. I move to suspend the rules so as to take from the Speaker's table and pass at this time Senate bill No. 811, for the relief of Perez Dickinson, the surviving partner of James Cowan, deceased, heretofore trading and doing business under the firm name and style of Cowan & Dickinson, of Knoxville, Tennessee.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there be, and hereby is, appropriated from the Treasury of the United States the sum of $38,476.80; and that the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to pay that sum to Perez Dickinson, the surviving partner of the firm of Cowan & Dickinson, of Knoxville, East Tennessee, in full compensation for two hundred and fifty-six bales of cotton belonging to them, and which was by them furnished and delivered to Major-General BURNSIDE, at his request, on the 17th and 18th days of November, 1863, and by him used in the fortifications for the defense of Knoxville, and the army under his command at the time of the assault by the forces under the command of General Longstreet, and the subsequent attack by him upon that city, and for other subsequent purposes it was used; and for which cotton they have never been paid anything, or received compensation, directly or indirectly, for any part thereof.

Mr. HOLMAN. That bill has been voted on once already and rejected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HOUSE] moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. HOUSE. It has passed the Senate three times.

Mr. THORNBURGH. And it has never been reported against by any committee of this House.

The question was taken upon suspending the rules, and passing the bill; and upon a division there were—ayes 88, noes 22.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall have to insist on a quorum to act on such a bill as this.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. HOUSE were appointed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill be again reported; I do not think it was understood.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. THORNBURGH and Mr. HOUSE objected.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 128, noes 21, two-thirds in the affirmative.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. HOLMAN said: I shall have to ask for the yeas and nays on this question.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division, there were—ayes 34, noes 120.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. TUCKER said: I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. TUCKER and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 43, noes 132.

So (one-fifth voting in favor thereof) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered. The calling of the roll will probably carry us beyond twelve o'clock.

Mr. HOLMAN. Gentleman are very anxious to pass this bill without examination.

Mr. BLOUNT. It has been examined time and again.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not in this House.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman knows all about it, and everybody else does.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the roll-call can be completed in twenty minutes, and the shortest way will be to call it.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 142, nays 66, not voting 82; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., Ballou, Banks, Blackburn, Bland, Bliss Blount, Boone, Bright, Buckner, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 1111) for the relief of Thomas E. Maley.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, from the same committee, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 4397) for the relief of Francis M. Strong and Thomas Ross.

REVISED STATUTES FOR MEMBERS.

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That members of the Forty-Fourth Congress be entitled to one copy each of the Revised Statutes of the United States, the same as members of the Forty-Third Congress.

COMMISSION ON GOLD AND SILVER, ETC.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, from the Committee on Printing, reported back with a favorable recommendation the following resolution; which was read, considered, and concurred in.

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the commission to inquire into the change which has taken place in the relative value of gold and silver and the causes thereof, the policy of restoring the double standard in this country and of continuing greenbacks concurrently with the metallic standard, may report on or before the 15th of February, 1877, instead of on or before the 15th of January, 1876.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, moved to suspend the rules and pass the following resolution:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring therein,) That there be printed 10,000 copies of the proceedings of the electoral commission, embracing all of said proceedings and briefs of counsel, together with proceedings of the joint convention regarding the State returns which were submitted to said joint convention; 7,500 copies for the use of the House, and 2,500 copies for the use of the Senate.

The rules were suspended (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) and the resolution passed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise in reference to a privileged report and will yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MORRISON,] one of the conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. MORRISON. I desire to report from the committee of conference on the Army appropriation bill that they have been unable to agree. There were several subjects on which they disagreed, but all might have been accommodated but one, and that the subject embraced in the fifth section of the bill, which relates to the use of the Army in Louisiana and South Carolina. That the House may know exactly the position of the House conferees I have written down the substance of what they insisted on and ask that it be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The conferees on the part of the House, while not insisting on the letter of the fifth section of the Army bill, firmly maintain they will consent to the passage of no Army appropriation bill that shall not contain such restriction upon the President in regard to the use of the United States troops in Louisiana as will prevent him from installing and maintaining the Packard government.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois why is South Carolina omitted from that proposition?

Mr. MORRISON. The same principle obtains in refererence to South Carolina as in reference to Louisiana. We intended to include both.

The SPEAKER. It is not an official paper.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. It was understood then to apply to both.

Mr. MORRISON. Yes, sir. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that the difference on this section of the bill was so radical as to make it impossible, in my opinion, to admit of any agreement on the subject. The Senate conferees insist that no restriction shall be placed upon the discretion of the President in the matter of the use of troops in Louisiana and South Carolina.

Mr. FOSTER. Or anywhere.

Mr. MORRISON. And with this statement I leave the question to the House.

Mr. FOSTER rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORRISON. I yield first to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Cox.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, this is not new legislation. I have only one word to say. In the Kansas matter, years ago, the republicans made the precedent. In the famous difficulty as to the Army bill, led by Henry Winter Davis, there was a proviso which destroyed that bill, prohibiting the use of troops in Kansas because personal and and public liberty seemed to require it. But the time for argument is past. This bill has failed because force and fraud have made it impossible——

Mr. GARFIELD. O, bah!

Mr. COX. Yes, sir; force and fraud. And when I said fraud I did not point to you, as the country understands your relations. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FOSTER. I offer the following——

The SPEAKER. Nothing can be offered except under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. MORRISON. I make the motion that the House adhere to its disagreement, and on that demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now hear the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FOSTER. I send up to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read as part of my speech the following:

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That one-half of the sum appropriated by an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes," approved July 24, 1876, being the sum of $12,993,583.95, is hereby appropriated for one-half of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, which sum shall be distributed among the various branches of said service as provided by this act.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a part of my remarks. I should like to be permitted to close them.

Mr. WALLING. I hope the gentleman will have the opportunity to do so, and not be interrupted.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 2867) to amend section 2958 of the Revised Statutes, and

A bill (H. R. No. 4702) granting a pension to Apolime A. Blair.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSTER. I will make the suggestion that the House agree to make the appropriation for three months—a quarter of a year.

Mr. MORRISON. No, sir.

Mr. BLACKBURN. No, sir; not for three days.

Mr. FOSTER. Then the responsibility must rest on you.

Mr. O'BRIEN. We will take the responsibility.

The SPEAKER. The question is on seconding the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MORRISON,] that the House adhere to its disagreement with the Senate on the Army appropriation bill.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 151, noes 101.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. HURLBUT. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois that the House adhere to its disagreement.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

PAY OF COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I move to suspend the rules and pass the following resolution heretofore reported favorably from the Committee on the Judiciary by Mr. KNOTT, namely:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $6 per day from July 1 to August 31, 1876, inclusive, to the clerks of the twenty-one committees designated by the Committee of Accounts as the committees for payment of clerks to which provision was made in the act of Congress approved August 15, 1876, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes," deducting therefrom any amount which the clerks of said committees respectively may have heretofore received during the time named.

The rules were suspended (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) and the resolution was adopted.

RELIEF OF SETTLERS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. CROUNSE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3002) for the relief of settlers on certain lands in the State of California, reported the same, accompanied by a report in writing; which report was ordered to be printed, and with the bill laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles: when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 186) to provide for compensation to the owners of certain lands ceded by the United States to Great Britain in and by the treaty of Washington July 9, 1872; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4702) granting a pension to Apolime A. Blair.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. WALLING, by unanimous consent, obtained, leave to have printed in the RECORD some remarks on the bill (H. R. No. 1191) to regulate the survey and sale of timber lands of the United States.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CASON. I ask consent to withdraw papers in the case of Emil Lloyd, there being no adverse report thereon.

Mr. CONGER. I object to any business except the call of the roll.

The Clerk (at thirteen minutes before twelve o'clock) proceeded to call the roll.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

While the roll was being called a message from the Senate was communicated by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informing the House that the Senate had passed the following bill, without amendment:

A bill (H. R. No. 473) for the relief of Henry L. French, of Nashville, Tennessee.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 4680) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Under the previous order of the House, authorizing adverse reports upon bills and petitions to be handed in at the Clerk's desk, reports were made as follows:

By Mr. JOHN REILLY, from the Committee on Military Affairs: A petition of the heirs of Benjamin Moore.

Also, a bill (H. R. No. 976) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the city of Port Huron, Michigan, certain condemned cannon and balls for a soldiers' monument in Lakside Cemetery.

The said bills were ordered to lie on the table.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Clerk proceeded with the call of the roll as far as the name of Mr. THOMAS L. JONES, of Kentucky. The votes recorded were—yeas 65, nays 43; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Atkins, John H. Bagley, jr., Banning, Beebe, Blackburn, Bland, Bliss, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Campbell, Candler, Caulfield, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Clymer, Cochrane, Cook, Cox, Culberson, Davis, De Bolt, Durand, Durham, Eden, Ellis, Felton, Field, Finley, Forney, Franklin, Gause, Gibson, Glover, Goode, Goodin, Gunter, Andrew H. Hamilton, Robert Hamilton, Hardenbergh, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hartridge, Hartzell, Hatcher, Henkle, Abram S. Hewitt, Hill, Hooker, Hopkins, House, Humphreys, Hunton, Jenks, Thomas L. Jones—65.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, George A. Bagley, William H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Belford, Blair, Bradley, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Burleigh, Buttz, Cannon, Cason, Caswell, Chittenden, Collins, Conger, Crapo, Crounse, Danford, Darrall, Davy, Denison, Dunnell, Eames, Flye, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Hale, Haralson, Hendee, Henderson, Hoar, Hoge, Hoskins, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyman—43.

VISITORS TO WEST POINT.

The call of the roll proceeded until five minutes before twelve o'clock, when

The SPEAKER said: The Chair desires to say it is a physical impossibility for the Clerk to complete the roll-call. The Chair desires to announce the appointment of the following gentlemen as visitors to West Point under the law: Mr. BANNING of Ohio, Mr. WALKER of Virginia, and Mr. PLATT of New York.

VALEDICTORY OF THE SPEAKER.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, the Speakership, always responsible, onerous, and full of embarrassments, has at this session imposed unusual and vexatious burdens. I have discharged the duties of the high position with unfaltering confidence in the candor and fairness of the House and a resolute purpose to do the right at every hazard.

For the first time in many years a democratic House of Representatives has occupied this Hall and responded with untiring industry to the universal sentiment for reform in Government and the re-establishment of peace throughout the Republic. Fraud and corruption have been exposed and made odious; the expenditures of administration have been enormously reduced; no new taxes have been levied, and every description of undue appropriation of the public money has been prevented. In this regard this House has met the public demand and expectation.

In respect to political events, the session has been one of the most critical in our history. The majority in this House, representing a majority of all the voters in the Union and a majority of the electors duly chosen at the recent election for President and Vice-President, has been made to choose between acquiescence in what we believe to be usurpation or reaching the right through civil commotion. The democratic party yielded temporary possession of the Administration, rather than entail upon the people civil war with all its attendant horrors. There are some who will condemn the permission we have given to the results of a law which was not administered in the spirit of its creation, nor, as we believe, according to the letter of its provisions. We have done all this in preference to the danger of anarchy and bloodshed. Time will surely remedy these wrongs, for there is in the American mind a desire to do justice. We must await that remedy. It must come, impatient as we shall be for its arrival. Until then we demand, as we have the right to demand, the reign of equal justice; that the sword shall cease to strike prostrate the governments of States; that the civil shall be superior to the military rule, and that the people shall be freed now and forever from the shackles of recent misgovernment. [Applause.]

I sincerely thank you one and all for your parting words of approval and shall ever cherish the same with the deepest sensibility. And now, with the wish that each and every member may safely return to his home, it only remains for me to declare that the constitutional limitation of the Forty-fourth Congress has been reached, and that this House stands adjourned without day. [Great applause.]

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BAKER, of Indiana: Joint resolution of the Indiana Legislature, for the equalization of pensions granted to soldiers of the war of 1861, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

APPENDIX

TO THE

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. J. W. STEVENSON,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

December 6, 1876.

The Senate having under consideration the motion to print the message of the President transmitting a letter, accompanied by testimony, addressed to him by Hon. JOHN SHERMAN and others, in relation to the canvass of the vote for electors in the State of Louisiana—

Mr. STEVENSON said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I feel constrained to vote against the pending motion to print the report and accompanying documents just communicated by the President to the Senate. In doing so I mean no personal disrespect to the Executive, and still less to the distinguished gentlemen who have signed that report.

These papers have not been read. I do not know what they contain. They are clearly not official state papers, and emanate from no department of the Government. I insist that they should go to the Committee on Printing, and I shall presently move that reference.

The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] informs us, that the paper communicated by the President, is a report from himself and certain other distinguished republicans, detailing the proceedings of the returning board of Louisiana in their recent canvass of the vote for the appointment of electors for President and Vice-President in that State. These gentlemen, we learn, were invited by the President of the United States to proceed to New Orleans, and witness that count. We know, from what has just fallen from the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] that this paper is ex parte. Besides, it is partial. It contains only that portion of the testimony offered by the republicans, but contains no proof offered by the democrats, and read before this returning board. Certain prominent democrats, at the request of the chairman of the national democratic committee, went likewise to New Orleans, some of whom witnessed the proceedings of the returning board.

We shall probably receive, in a day or two at furthest, from these gentlemen their version of the official proceedings before that board, accompanied by the entire testimony upon which its conclusions rest. I should prefer, therefore, that both reports, with the accompanying documents, and all the testimony taken before the returning board, should go to the Committee on Printing and be printed together. Such a course seems to me to be one eminently in the interest of truth, justice, and fair dealing. The printing of both reports could only lead to a delay of a few days, and I am satisfied that such action would be much more satisfactory to the country at large than the printing of an ex parte one now.

The present hour, Mr. President, is too full of real peril to the entire country for leaders, on either side, to attempt to seek any party advantage by inflammatory appeals in advance to the partisan passions and prejudices of the people.

I am, sir, as you know, a life-long democrat of the straitest sect. I acknowledge a ready allegiance to the just behests of legitimate party discipline; but I solemnly declare, that, if I know myself, I will go as far in the support of all lawful and constitutional measures for the prompt inauguration of that man as President of the United States, who has legally received in the late election a majority of the votes cast by all the electoral colleges in the several states, whether that man be Rutherford B. Hayes, or Samuel J. Tilden.

The elevation of either of these eminent citizens to the exalted and responsible position of Chief Magistrate of the United States, deservedly great as I concede such an honor to be, sinks into paltry insignificance compared with the higher duty of preserving, intact, the free suffrage of the American people; of seeing to it that when the people of all the States entitled to vote for the appointment of electors for President and Vice-President have exercised that right under the form and sanctions of law, the voice of the majority when thus expressed and clearly ascertained, shall become effective and potential against fraud or usurpation, whether Federal or State.

Our fathers one hundred years ago sought the preservation of their liberties under a new and novel form of government which found its support upon the consent of the governed. It sprang from the people as the acknowledged source of all political power.

To this extent, it differed from the older representation of the British House of Commons. The latter found its origin not so much in the popular supremacy of the people, as in the stern requirements of the Crown.

Knights and burgesses were at first summoned, often against their will, to a parliament called by the king, and frequently, amid murmurs of popular discontent, and popular remonstrances against the increased expenditure which such representation entailed.

But the king sought their aid and advice, in his contest against the power of the feudal barons in the upper and hereditary branch of the English Parliament.

Time gave a more popular impress to this system of representation in England, until the knights and burgesses were looked to as the guardians of popular rights, and ultimately, became the bulwark of safety against the usurpations and encroachments both of the Crown and the lords.

But our American representation was always popular, and emanated directly from the people. Representation rests on suffrage; suffrage is the delegation of power from a freeman to his selected agent. This right to choose representatives, is the portion of political power belonging to every qualified elector, and through this channel, representatives become invested by the people with executive, legislative, judicial, and delegated power.

Free suffrage, is, therefore, the vital breath of American representative government. Its exercise to be effective must be guarded, protected, and secured against violence, force, and fraud. The manner, time, and place of its exercise are all ordained, and prescribed by previous law. The right of every qualified elector to vote involves the correlative right to have that vote counted. The transcript of all the votes cast must be certified in certain and definite form, prescribed by law, to the public officer charged officially with the high trust of proclaiming the true result of the total vote cast. It follows therefore that any interference with the right of an elector entitled to the right of suffrage to vote, or any falsification of the returns of the vote as cast or any false and fraudulent certificate of the verity of the result of the entire ballot is an utter and absolute overthrow of the fundamental principle on which our system of American self-government rests. For nearly a century, the will of the American people, as ascertained and expressed, in the mode and manner prescribed by law, has been always acquiesced in, and the rulers chosen by a majority of the qualified electors, have been peaceably installed. It has been the distinguishing characteristic, and chief excellence of American constitutional government in the past, that the people irrespective of party, have lent a ready obedience to the self-imposed limitations upon their own power as electors placed in the Constitution as a barrier against the sudden impulses of frenzy or passion. It is this conservative principle which has distinguished the regular action of American popular power from the temporary and violent convulsions for liberty in the Old World—"a liberty created by arms to-day, and crushed by arms to-morrow." For the first time in our history, we are threatened with a popular struggle as to the result in the appointment of presidential electors in the several States on the 7th of November last.

I shall not anticipate that issue, or seek by anything I shall say, to forestall popular opinion, or increase the public excitement which its consideration involves. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." It will come soon enough. I regret that the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] should have deemed it proper, before all the reports and accompanying documents had been printed, to have precipitated a debate upon Louisiana affairs, and by singling out a few isolated cases of individual outrage, and wrong, to have indulged in so impassioned an appeal to the prejudices and partisan feelings of the country. Let me tell that Senator that such appeals can be productive of nothing but mischief.

If ever there was a time when party excitement and partisan zeal should be restrained within the walls of the Capitol, it is at this very hour. It is useless to deny that already a very considerable portion of the American people are impressed with the belief, that the votes for the appointment of electors in two or more of the Southern States, have not been fairly counted, and that an effort has been made by fraudulent and improper means through the agency of returning boards to change the true result of that vote.

I shall not stop to inquire at this moment, whether this popular suspicion is ill or well founded. The facts have not yet been presented on which a definite and final opinion can safely rest. I have a well-founded impression, which might be removed by proof. Committees of Congress have already been sent to Louisiana, Florida, and South Carolina, with full power to investigate thoroughly all the circumstances and facts connected with the appointment of electors in these three States. Other committees appointed by the Senate will probably soon follow. All these committees will, no doubt, institute a full and thorough examination of the officers and soldiers stationed in the several parishes of Louisiana during the election, and will ascertain and report with reasonable certainty what was the true and exact vote and whether violence or intimidation existed or not. Within a few weeks these reports, with all the testimony, will be laid before Congress and the country. Statesmanship and prudence alike demand that Congress, upon whom the duty of determining the result may ultimately rest, should quietly await that period. It was in this aspect that the speech of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] caused me so much surprise and such deep regret. No party should desire to see a President elected or inaugurated except upon clear evidence, that he has received a majority of all the electors appointed in the several States. Still less, should any American citizen, be elevated to that exalted position with the slightest taint of fraud, or of just suspicion upon his presidential garments.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has been pleased to tell us what he saw of the operations of the returning board. He has dwelt in terms of burning and eloquent denunciation of special acts of violence, wrong, and intimidation which he insists marked the action of the democratic party in the late election in Louisiana, and which justifies, as he says, the returning board in setting aside the entire vote at various precincts in many parishes of Louisiana, thereby disfranchising thousands of the white and colored citizens alike in that down-trodden State. The Senator not only tells us of his approval of the action of the returning board of Louisiana, but he becomes eloquent in his compliments and commendation of both the high personal and official character of the individuals who constitute that tribunal. I confess I was astonished at the eulogium pronounced by the Senator on this board. I was myself in New Orleans for a week, upon a mission similar to that which carried the Senator from Ohio to that city. I enjoyed the pleasure of meeting and sojourning at the same hotel with him and his republican confrères. I was not before the returning board. I witnessed none of its proceedings and heard none of the testimony offered before it. I left the day after it commenced its sessions. While I should prefer to await the return of the congressional committees and the publication of their reports before I said one word on Louisiana affairs, I cannot permit the impassioned speech of the Senator from Ohio to go to the country without taking issue with him on his facts, and entering as I do, my earnest and strong dissent to the conclusions put forth by him that the late appointment of electors in Louisiana was carried by force and intimidation practiced by the democratic party on the colored vote. I utterly deny that the returning board were in any way justified in their action.

I do not believe that the conclusions of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] touching that election can be maintained and supported by legal and impartial proof. During my sojourn in New Orleans, I was in daily intercourse with influential men of Louisiana of all parties, both white and colored. I sought through every channel proof and information touching the true character of that election. I saw and talked with electors from various portions of the State, many of them officials, who conducted the election, and many others who were candidates for both executive and legislative offices during that canvass. I talked to republicans as well as to democrats. The conclusion which I reached, from all I saw or heard was that the election in Louisiana was in all respects quiet and peaceable, and that its people appointed presidential electors for Tilden and Hendricks by a majority of 8,957 for the highest Tilden elector over the lowest Hayes elector, and a majority of 6,300 for the lowest Tilden elector over the highest Hayes elector. This conviction was honestly formed and is sincerely entertained by me at the present hour. Should testimony be hereafter brought to satisfy me that I am in error, or even to raise a doubt as to the fairness of the Louisiana vote, I shall gladly surrender that opinion and make my official action accord with the result disclosed. My conviction of the peaceable and fair character of that election rests upon a few facts which I proceed to state.

First, it is admitted by all, that upon the face of the poll-books Tilden and Hendricks carried Louisiana by a majority of from seven to nine thousand votes. The returning board of Governor Kellogg will scarcely deny that fact. The country will take notice that this majority was obtained in a State where the republican supremacy has been absolute for the past ten years and where all State and Federal patronage and power have been enjoyed and exercised exclusively by republicans. In addition, at and long prior to the election, Federal soldiers were stationed in the various parishes throughout the State. It seems absolutely unnatural and improbable to me that any system of ruthless, wholesale, intimidation, and violence could have been exercised by the whites over the colored voters without the knowledge of officers and soldiers, and without instant exposure and suppression. How could violence and intimidation exist without detection? Would not prompt application have been made by the republican supervisors of election to the military for the protection of the colored electors in the parishes where such lawlessness existed? No officer or soldier has been introduced to prove that he was called upon, either before or during the election, to suppress violence or intimidation in any solitary precinct in Louisiana or to prove that any such violence or intimidation existed or occurred. On the contrary, Major Bascom, an officer of high character in the Army of the United States, a republican in politics and an avowed supporter of Hayes and Wheeler, who had been stationed for many months before the election in one of the democratic parishes rejected by the returning board, and who was present at the time of the election in this excluded parish—West Feliciana, I believe—stated publicly to the democratic, and I believe also to the republican committee, that he witnessed no intimidation, at or before the election, over any elector, but that a more quiet and peaceful election was never held in any State than was held in that parish. His soldiers if called upon would, I doubt not, fully support their commander in all his statements touching the peaceful character of the election there. The very failure of the republicans to prove before the returning board, by Federal officers and soldiers stationed in all the excluded parishes of Louisiana, the existence of a solitary act of violence or intimidation is strong and persuasive testimony that no such violence or intimidation existed.

Mr. President, I put it to the candor of republican Senators to explain this remarkable omission. Federal soldiers, at the solicitation of Governor Kellogg, were stationed before and during the election in Louisiana in almost every parish in that State to protect the colored electors from force, violence, and intimidation. I challenge the Senator from Ohio to find an officer or soldier stationed in either East or West Feliciana, in Morehouse, in Ouachita, or in Monroe Parishes, who will support him in his fierce denunciations of the outrages against colored electors in those parishes. Does that honorable Senator hope to persuade the country that intimidation could have been practiced in the excluded parishes without the knowledge or cognizance of the officers and soldiers stationed there? I submit to the honorable Senator that the testimony of officers and soldiers of the United States Army would receive higher credibility by the entire country as to the existence of violence and intimidation than the varying and diverse statements of that poor old negro woman Pinkston, on whose testimony the Senator dwells with so much pathos and feeling.

I was not before the returning board and I have not read her testimony. I have been informed that she was contradicted by at least two credible witnesses in her statement that the killing of her husband and child grew out of, or was in any way connected with politics. Allow me further to say that the testimony of Major Bascom, as to the character of the election in Feliciana Parish, was fully corroborated by the Episcopal bishop in Louisiana, known everywhere throughout the length and breadth of our land as an eminently pious and learned prelate, conservative and just in his feelings, wholly unconnected with politics, a messenger of peace, truth, and love, incapable of intentional injustice to any sect or party. This gentleman stated to me that he was making his episcopal visitation through the State of Louisiana during the late election and was present in one or more of the parishes excluded by the returning board, perhaps East and West Feliciana. He told me that he not only did not see the slightest intimidation, force, or violence by the white over the colored electors, but that he was well satisfied from what he saw, heard, and knew in these parishes that none existed. He said that a large number of colored voters in West Feliciana informed him that they were tired of republican rule and rejoiced in the privilege afforded them by the presence of the soldiers of voting the democratic ticket.

Similar statements were made to me by gentlemen of the highest credit and character, among whom I will name Governor Nichols and Attorney-General Ogden. These gentlemen canvassed and went through every portion of Louisiana during the late election. They assured me that there was no system of violence and intimidation, but that the election throughout the State was in the main quiet and peaceable. They both knew and met in their canvass large numbers of colored voters in many parishes of Louisiana who stated to them that, though formerly republicans, voting for years the republican ticket, that in consequence of the incompetency of the dominant officials in Louisiana to afford their children the advantages of education, for which the scanty earnings of their hard labor had been so severely taxed, and in consequence of the corruption and inefficiency of the republican State government in Louisiana, they desired a change and intended to vote the democratic ticket. This information was fully corroborated by a large number of colored electors who came frequently to the democratic committee-room, both from rural parishes and from the city of New Orleans, stating that they themselves had freely and voluntarily voted the democratic ticket at the last election, and that they knew of many others who had done the same thing.

I might cite, too, the written and I believe sworn statement of a colored elector in one of the excluded parishes, Morehouse perhaps, setting out that he was the president of a democratic club in his precinct, composed of forty-five colored members, all of whom voted the democratic ticket, and that he knew personally of changes enough of colored voters from the republican to the democratic party in that parish fully to account for the reduced republican majority at the late election as compared with the vote cast there two years ago.

And yet, the change of the colored vote from republican to democratic, whenever it occurs in Louisiana, is seized upon by the republican party as the strongest evidence of intimidation.

I cannot believe, from all I saw and heard while in New Orleans, that any such wholesale system of violence and intimidation as that described by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] prevailed at the late election in Louisiana.

Whenever such violence is made apparent by reliable and impartial testimony, I shall be ready to go as far for the protection of free suffrage, irrespective of color, as any Senator upon this floor.

That there have been crimes and wrongs committed in Louisiana which shock our humanity I do not doubt. I deplore their occurrence as much as the honorable Senator from Ohio possibly can. But crimes are not confined to Louisiana. They exist everywhere. They may occur more frequently in the Southern than in Northern and Western States. They probably do. And the reason for this is to be traced to the sudden and fundamental change in the social and political condition of the people of the South, growing out of the late war.

I do not, however, believe that these outrages in the main have anything to do with politics; still less, that there is any organized system of intimidation practiced by the whites over the colored voters in the South. The quiet condition of Georgia, Alabama, and Texas abundantly attests the utter groundlessness of such a charge. Like causes produce like effects. If the white electors sought by a system of violence to control the suffrage of colored electors, some evidence of it would undoubtedly appear in these last-named States.

And yet we know that a few years ago this same stale, threadbare cry of intimidation and oppression was urged by the republicans in Alabama and Georgia for setting aside the elections there.

My honest and deliberate conviction is—and I think the fact will be demonstrated, if the true condition of Louisiana affairs could become known—that whenever political intimidation and force have occurred in that State it will be found that such outrages have been practiced by colored republicans over men of their own race, who sought a change in their political relations, rather than by white over colored electors.

Mr. President, will the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] tell the country why the republican party in Louisiana have not suppressed the system of violence and internal disorder so gloomily described by him as existing in that State? They have had absolute and entire control of that State for ten years past. Every office, from the highest to the lowest—executive, legislative, and judicial—has been filled exclusively by republicans of the most extreme party views.

Why has not the republican party in Louisiana suppressed disorders, crimes, and intimidation by a rigid enforcement of the law? In addition to the absolute supremacy of republican rule in the State government, we know that Governor Kellogg has received the constant support of the Federal Government. United States troops have for six years past been sent, without stint, to that unfortunate State.

The one hundred and third article of the constitution of Louisiana declares:

> The privilege of free suffrage shall be supported by laws regulating elections, and prohibiting under adequate penalties all undue influence thereon from power, bribery, tumult, or other improper practices.

Why has not Governor Kellogg, backed by a republican Legislature, enforced this constitutional provision, and restored peace and good government, by a prompt and rigid enforcement of the statutes against force and violence?

Have they done so? What says my honorable friend from Ohio? Why, Mr. President, I appeal to republican testimony to prove that for six or eight years past nothing but wrong, anarchy, and disorder have marked the administration of public affairs in that State. For nearly six years Louisiana has had but one representative in this Chamber. The right of the people in that State to vote, or to have their votes counted, has been openly disregarded and trampled upon by republican returning boards in that down-trodden State.

So far from supporting the individual elector in his constitutional right to vote, these returning boards have, in utter defiance of the constitution and laws of Louisiana, absolutely ignored the right of free suffrage. Within six years past the country has seen the State government of Louisiana subverted by a United States district judge, supported by the military power of the United States; and still later, the American people have seen representatives of the Louisiana Legislature, legally chosen by the people of that State, ejected from their chamber in the capitol by Federal soldiers, and representatives, not elected, put in their places by the arbitrary, unjust, and illegal action of the present returning board in Louisiana. And all this successful usurpation upon the constitutional rights of the free people of Louisiana has been accomplished by the republican rulers in that State.

I doubt not that in the failure of Governor Kellogg and in his utter incapacity, even with the free use of the Army of the United States, to restore order, to execute the laws, and to establish and maintain good government will be found the true explanation for the change of the colored vote from the republican to the democratic party in the late appointment of presidential electors in Louisiana. But the same cry of intimidation by the white over the colored voters, which has successfully sustained the past usurpations of returning boards in Louisiana, in their ribald and open disregard of the constitutional rights of the people of Louisiana, is sought again to be made potential in the late presidential contest.

The people of Louisiana have quietly submitted to their deprivation of suffrage in the choice of their rulers under the State government for years. The problem which now confronts the people, not of Louisiana alone, but of the United States, is, shall the usurpations of this same returning board, successful as it has been in the past find a wider theater for its action in the illegal suppression of the vote of the people of Louisiana on the 7th of November, 1876, in the appointment of presidential electors? This is a question far above party. It goes directly to the constitutional right of the people of every State in the American Confederacy to select in manner and form prescribed by law their rulers, both Federal and State.

If it be constitutional for this returning board, perpetual in its organization and unlimited in its power, to pass absolutely upon the suffrages of the entire electors of Louisiana, rejecting as many or as few of the votes of the State as they may in their discretion determine, and changing at their will the true return of the vote, is not that an end of free government? If such action be constitutional in Louisiana, would it not be equally so in New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio? Could not any one of those States create returning boards through their Legislatures, and obtain such returns of the election as the party character of the Legislature and of the returning board might deem expedient?

The vote of a State for President and Vice-President would then depend, not on the vote of a majority of the people, but upon the will or judgment of the returning board—whether honest or upright, does not lessen the danger—as to what that vote should be declared to be. Mr. President, what State in the American Union would tolerate such an exercise of power as the returning board of Louisiana has exercised for years? How long could it be permitted and our liberty be preserved?

But I insist that the returning board of Louisiana had no jurisdiction whatever, to canvass or pass upon the vote for the appointment of electors in Louisiana.

I persuade myself that I can make this entirely clear to my republican brethren in this Chamber who are lawyers. The question of jurisdiction rests upon the true construction of the election laws of Louisiana. No one denies, that the appointment of electors is exclusively a matter of State jurisdiction, and that presidential electors are State officers. The Constitution of the United States declares:

> Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

It devolves upon those who claim, like the Senator from Ohio, that the returning board of Louisiana was clothed with jurisdiction to canvass the vote of that State for the appointment of electors to produce the legislative act of that Commonwealth which confers it. The Legislature of Louisiana has either directed the manner in which electors in that State shall be appointed, or there is no authority to appoint them. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] claims that the election law of 1872 and amendments confer jurisdiction upon the returning board to canvass these returns for the appointment of electors.

Let us look, then, to the act of November 20, 1872, the first section of which declares—

> That all elections for State, parish, and judicial officers, for members of the General Assembly, and for members of Congress shall be held on the first Monday in November, and said elections shall be styled the general elections. They shall be held in the manner and form and subject to the regulations hereafter prescribed, and no other.

The second section of the same act provides—

> That five persons, to be elected by the senate from all political parties, shall be the returning officers for all elections in the State, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum and have power to make return of all elections.

The twenty-ninth section declares—

> That in every year in which an election shall be held for electors of President and Vice-President, such election shall be held at the time fixed by act of Congress.

By the seventy-first section it is provided—

> That this act shall take effect from and after its passage, and that all others on the subject of election laws be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The foregoing sections of the act of 1872, which I have quoted, contain all the provisions that I deem material to the determination of the question of the jurisdiction of the returning board.

It will be perceived that the seventy-first section of this act directly repeals all other election laws in Louisiana.

At the time of the passage of the act of 1872 two acts had been in force in the State of Louisiana touching the appointment of presidential electors: The act of 1868, which was re-enacted by the revised statutes of Louisiana adopted in 1870. I will quote two or three of the provisions of this latter act:

SEC. 2824. Every qualified voter in the State shall vote for electors as follows: Two persons shall be selected from the State at large and one person shall be chosen from each congressional district in this State; and in case any ticket shall contain two or more names of persons residing in the same district, (except the two chosen from the State at large,) the first of such names only shall be considered as duly voted for.

SEC. 2826. Immediately after the receipt of a return from each parish, or on the fourth Monday of November, if the returns should not sooner arrive, the governor, in presence of the secretary of state, the attorney-general, a district judge of the district in which the seat of government may be established, or any two of them, shall examine the returns and ascertain therefrom the persons who have been duly elected electors.

SEC. 2829. The electors shall meet at the seat of government on the day appointed for their meeting by the act of Congress, the first Wednesday in December, and shall then and there proceed to execute the duties and services enjoined upon them by the Constitution of the United States, in the manner therein prescribed.

SEC. 2830. If any one or more of the electors chosen by the people shall fail from any cause whatever to attend at the appointed place at the hour of four p. m. of the day prescribed for their meeting, it shall be the duty of the other electors immediately to proceed by ballot to fill such vacancy or vacancies.

The first question which occurs is: Did the act of 1872 repeal the act of 1868 re-enacted in the revised statutes of Louisiana in 1870? The words in the seventy-first section of the act of 1872 are broad and direct. They expressly declare, "that this act shall take effect from and after its passage, and that all others on the subject of election laws be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

If the act of 1868, re-enacted in the revised statutes of Louisiana in 1870, was repealed by the seventy-first section of the act of 1872, then there was no legislative authority whatever empowering the State of Louisiana to appoint electors on the 7th of November, 1876, and the vote of that State must be rejected.

Mr. WEST. If I do not interrupt the Senator——

Mr. STEVENSON. Not at all. I desire information and seek light in all quarters.

Mr. WEST. I want to be informed, and that is the reason I rise now. What election law does the Senator refer to as a substitute for the law authorizing the appointment of presidential electors and filling vacancies in the electoral college?

Mr. STEVENSON. The inquiry which I was pressing at the moment the Senator from Louisiana interrupted me, was whether the repealing clause of the act of 1872 did in fact actually repeal the act of 1868 authorizing the appointment of presidential electors, which was re-enacted in the revised statutes of Louisiana adopted in 1870? If such repeal became effective, and the act of 1872 and amendments, were the only election laws in force in Louisiana, then there was no legal authority in that State for the appointment of electors, and the election on the 7th of November was void, and the returning board could have had no jurisdiction to canvass the votes cast for electors. The act of 1872 no where authorizes the appointment of presidential electors; it makes no provision as to the mode and manner of their appointment; whether by the people of Louisiana or by their Legislature; whether by congressional districts or general ticket; and the act makes no provision for the filling of vacancies in the electoral college. If, therefore, the act of 1872 was the only election law in force in Louisiana on 7th November, 1876, the election for electors was null and void.

Mr. WEST. Now will the Senator permit me to state my knowledge of the case?

Mr. STEVENSON. With pleasure.

Mr. WEST. There is a general law of Louisiana——

Mr. STEVENSON. I have already referred to that.

Mr. WEST. Relating to electors.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is the law of 1868.

Mr. WEST. There is a stipulation in the revised statutes of Louisiana that all elections for presidential electors shall be conducted in the same manner as those for State officers. There is also a provision in the revised statutes that on the meeting of the electoral college if from any cause whatever any elector fails to be present his colleagues shall have the power and authority to supply that vacancy. The reasoning of the Senator is that the repealing clause regulating the conduct and the manner of elections and the method of making the returns also repealed the power of the State to appoint electors under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States and also repealed the power of those electors when appointed to fill any vacancy. That is the Senator's proposition. I leave it to the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have already referred to the act of 1868—re-enacted in the revised statutes of 1870—and quoted the provisions touching the appointment of electors in Louisiana. The Senator from Louisiana does not understand the inquiry I was pressing. That inquiry was, whether the act of 1868 and of 1870 touching the appointment of electors was or was not repealed by the act of 1872, which the Senator himself must admit makes no provision for the appointment of electors whatever. If that act of 1872 did repeal all other election laws in Louisiana, then I insist there was no legislative authority to appoint electors, and the term "all elections" did not include presidential electors. But suppose I admit, ex gratia, what the Senator from Louisiana so strongly insists upon, that the act of 1872 did not repeal the act for the appointment of presidential electors, passed in 1868 and re-enacted in the revised statutes of 1870; how does that help the jurisdiction of the returning board to canvass the returns for the appointment of presidential electors?

If the Senator will turn to the provisions of the Revised Statutes of 1870, which he seems to insist have not been repealed by the act of 1872, but are still in force, he will find that by section 2826 of that act, which I have already quoted, it is provided that—

Immediately after the receipt of a return from each parish, or on the fourth Monday of November, if the returns should not sooner arrive, the governor, in the presence of the secretary of state, the attorney-general, a district judge of the district in which the seat of government may be established, or any two of them, shall examine the returns and ascertain therefrom the persons who have been duly elected electors.

Therefore I submit that, if the act of 1872 repealed all other election laws, and that act was the only act in force on the 7th November, 1876, there was no authority to appoint electors in that State on that day. If the act of 1872 did not repeal the act of 1868, re-adopted in the revised statutes of Louisiana in 1870, and the latter is still in force; in that event the governor of Louisiana is to examine the returns of the election and make the return. On either horn of the dilemma, there is clearly no jurisdiction in this returning board.

It is not necessary that I shall express at this time any opinion whether the act of 1868, re-enacted in the revised statutes of Louisiana of 1870, was repealed or not. The general rule of law on the effect of the repeal of a former law by subsequent legislation is that a general statute, without negative words, will not repeal the particular provisions of a former act unless the two acts are irreconcilably inconsistent.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] quotes the words of the second section of the act of 1872 creating the returning board and providing that they "shall be the returning officers for all elections in the State," and triumphantly asks if those words are not broad enough to include the elections for the appointment of presidential electors? I think not. My construction of the words "all elections" is that they are limited and confined by the words of the first section of the same act to "elections for State, parish, and judicial officers, members of the General Assembly, and for members of Congress."

This construction is supported by the further fact that the act of 1872 makes no allusion to the appointment of presidential electors. But if the position of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WEST] be true, that the revised statutes of Louisiana, adopted in 1870, which re-enacted the statute of 1868, providing for the appointment of presidential electors, be not repealed by the act of 1872, then the governor, and not the returning board, is, in the presence of witnesses, to ascertain the result, with no judicial power to exclude or in any manner to interfere with the vote as cast—if that act was repealed by the act of 1872, then there was no power conferred, as already stated, to appoint electors.

I shall not stop to inquire now what tribunal has power to decide upon these questions, or the mode in which it is to be done. My purpose is accomplished in attempting to show that the returning board of Louisiana was clothed with no power, judicial or ministerial, to canvass the returns for the appointment of electors in Louisiana.

Mr. President, the judicial power claimed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN] and by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST] for this returning board to canvass and exclude the votes cast for the appointment of electors, is wholly inconsistent with and in direct contravention of the express requirements and limitations of the act of 1872, for securing the free suffrage of the whole people.

Why prescribe duties for the commissioners of elections, or the supervisor of registration, as to the mode, manner, and time in which votes are to be counted, or compiled statements of the true result of the votes cast at every precinct in Louisiana are to be made up and returned, if the returning board can judicially disregard them, and reject as many or retain as many of the votes actually cast as they may in their discretion determine?

In a word does not the judicial power claimed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] for this returning board of Louisiana to canvass the returns for the appointment of electors in that State, rejecting and admitting as many or as few of the votes cast by the people as that board may determine, virtually invest them with the arbitrary power of deciding the presidential election, should the result of that election depend on the vote of Louisiana?

Mr. President, what a problem to confront the American people at the beginning of the second century of our free institutions!

Who can measure the momentous issues which the safe solution of such a question directly involves? Who shall measure the responsibility of those who, under the Constitution and laws, must shortly be called upon to determine it? I will by no act or word anticipate the excitement of that hour. I can only invoke the divine Ruler of the universe, whose blessings have been so plenteously vouchsafed to our country during the first century of its existence, when that hour comes to inspire the hearts of our entire people with wisdom, courage, and calmness enough to see that its settlement rests not on any narrow plane of party expediency or individual political success, but the higher and nobler one of an enlightened and enlarged American patriotism.

Manufacture and Sale of Intoxicating Liquors.

SPEECH OF HON. HENRY W. BLAIR.

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

December 27, 1876,

On the joint reso'ution introduced by him proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States in regard to the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the public good requires the protection of the American people from the evils of alcohol by an amendment of the Constitution.

I will read the joint resolution which I have prepared, and have had the honor to present for that purpose by the unanimous consent of the House:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein,) That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, as provided in the Constitution:

ARTICLE —.

SECTION 1. From and after the year of our Lord 1900 the manufacture and sale of distilled alcoholic intoxicating liquors, or alcoholic liquors any part of which is obtained by distillation or process equivalent thereto, or any intoxicating liquors mixed or adulterated with ardent spirits or with any poison whatever, except for medicinal, mechanical, chemical, and scientific purposes, and for use in the arts, anywhere within the United States and the Territories thereof, shall cease; and the importation of such liquors from foreign states and countries to the United States and Territories, and the exportation of such liquors from and the transportation thereof within and through any part of this country, except for the use and purposes aforesaid, shall be, and hereby is, forever thereafter prohibited.

SEC. 2. Nothing in this article shall be construed to waive or abridge any existing power of Congress, nor the right, which is hereby recognized, of the people of any State or Territory to enact laws to prevent the increase and for the suppression or regulation of the manufacture, sale, and use of liquors, and the ingredients thereof, any part of which is alcoholic, intoxicating, or poisonous, within its own limits, and for the exclusion of such liquors and ingredients therefrom at any time, as well before as after the close of the year of our Lord 1900; but until then, and until ten years after the ratification hereof, as provided in the next section, no State or Territory shall interfere with the transportation of said liquors or ingredients, in packages safely secured, over the usual lines of traffic to other States and Territories wherein the manufacture, sale, and use thereof for other purposes and use than those excepted in the first section, shall be lawful: Provided, That the true destination of such packages be plainly marked thereon.

SEC. 3. Should this article not be ratified by three-fourths of the States on or before the last day of December, 1890, then the first section hereof shall take effect and be in force at the expiration of ten years from such ratification; and the assent of any State to this article shall not be rescinded nor reversed.

SEC. 4. Congress shall enforce this article by all needful legislation.

In order to justify legislation of any kind restricting the manufacture and use of alcoholic liquors, I believe it to be necessary to maintain these propositions:

First. That it is the duty of society, through the agency of government, which is the creature of society, to enact and enforce all laws which, while protecting the individual in the full possession and enjoyment of his inalienable rights, tend to promote the general welfare, and especially whenever that welfare is impaired or threatened by any existing or impending evil it is the duty of society to enact and enforce laws to restrict or destroy that evil. It may be proper to observe that no law can promote the general welfare which deprives an individual of an inalienable right, when that right is properly defined, or which impairs the enjoyment thereof, whether of life, liberty, property, or the pursuit of happiness. But society has inalienable rights as well as individuals, and the right to such legislation as will promote the general welfare, in its true sense, is one of them; and the inalienable rights of individuals and the inalienable rights of society at large are limited by, and must be construed and enjoyed with reference to each other.

Second. While society has no right to prevent or restrict the use of an article by individuals for purposes which are beneficial only, yet if that use, beneficial to some, is found by experience to be naturally and inevitably greatly injurious in its effects upon others and upon society in general, then it becomes the duty of society, in the exercise of its inalienable right to promote the general welfare and in self-defense to social life, just as the individual may defend his natural life, to prohibit regulate, or restrict the use of that article, as the case may require. This principle is daily applied in laws which control the manufacture and use of gunpowder, nitro-glycerine, dynamite, and other things of great and dangerous potency, the unrestrained use of which, even for useful purposes, has been shown by experience to be destructive to the inalienable rights of others. This results from the common principle of law that every man must so enjoy his own rights as neither to destroy or impair those of another, and it is the great end for which government is instituted among men to compel him so to do.

Third. No person has a right to do that to himself which impairs or perverts his own powers; and when he does so by means of that which society can reach and remove by law, to such extent as to become a burden or a source of danger to others, either by his example or by his liability to commit acts of crime, or to be essentially incapacitated to discharge his duties to himself, his family, and society, the law, that is, society, should protect both him and itself. A man has no more right to destroy his inalienable rights than those of another, or than another has to deprive him of his own. The laws restraining the spendthrift in the destruction of his inalienable right in property and punishing suicide, (as the common law did, by forfeiture of estate, &c.,) or attempted self-murder, (as the law does now,) are familiar examples of the application of this principle.

These are elementary principles of law and of common sense. They are corner-stones of all just government. To these principles every member of society is held to have given his assent. They are unquestioned, so far as I know, by any one who believes in any law. They are axiomatic and indestructible as the social organization itself.

Fourth. The use (unless medicinally) of alcoholic liquors to the extent of intoxication or poisoning—which, as will hereafter be seen, is the same thing as intoxication—is an injury to the individual; it inflicts great evils upon society at large; it is destructive to the general welfare; it is of a nature which may be greatly restricted if not destroyed by the enforcement of appropriate laws; consequently such laws should be enacted and enforced; and this should be done in our country, either by the States, or by the General Government, or by both, if such laws can be made more efficient thereby.

I believe this proposition to be true, and respectfully ask candid attention to the facts and observations which follow.

DEFINITION OF TERMS, ETC.

The substance known as alcohol is thus defined by Webster:

Pure or highly rectified spirit, extracted by simple distillation from various vegetable juices and infusions of a saccharine nature, which have undergone vinous fermentation; the spirituous or intoxicating element of fermented liquors.

Fermentation, the process by which alcohol is first obtained from organic substances, but combined with much larger quantity of other matter, is thus defined by the same authority:

That change of organic substances by which their starch, sugar, gluten, &c., under the influence of water, air, and warmth, are decomposed, usually with evolution of gas and heat, and their elements are recombined in new compounds. Vinous fermentation converts sugar into alchohol.

Brewing is the preparation of alcoholic liquor from malt, and hops, and from other materials, by steeping, boiling, and fermentation.

Distillation, or rectification, (to make straight or pure,) is a process subsequent to fermentation, by which alcohol in a highly refined and most powerful form is obtained from fermented or brewed liquors. It is thus defined by the eminent lexicographer before cited:

The act of falling in drops, or the act of pouring or throwing down in drops. The volatilization of a liquid in a closed vessel by heat, and its subsequent condensation in a separate vessel by cold, as by means of an alembic, or still and refrigeratory, or of a retort and receiver; the operation of extracting spirit from a substance by evaporation and condensation; rectification.

Distiller: One whose occupation is to extract spirit by distillation.

Alcohol for commercial purposes is obtained by distilling wine and other liquors that have undergone vinous fermentation; carbonate of soda is sometimes added to keep back acetic acid, and fusel-oil is removed by charcoal. The alcohol of the London pharmacopœia contains about 82 per cent. of alcohol and 18 of water. Its specific gravity is required to be 838, water being 1,000. It has great affinity for water, absorbing it from the atmosphere.

Professor Brande found from 1 to 2 per cent. of alcohol in small-beer; 4 in porter; 6 to 9 in ales; about 12 in the light wines of France and Germany; from 19 to 25 in port and sherry and other strong wines; from 40 to 50 and occasionally more in brandy, gin, and whisky. The strength of these liquors is ascertained by various expedients; but the process is sometimes complicated by reason of the different ingredients intermixed to color, sweeten, or flavor the liquor, or fraudulently added to alter the specific gravity, or to substitute a cheaper material.

See the New American Cyclopædia, Alcohol.

The discovery of distillation of wine has been attributed to Albucasis, or Casa, an Arabian chemist and physician of the eleventh century, but many centuries elapsed before the process of distillation was applied to produce those stronger drinks which under the name of "spirits" are now in such common use in daily life. Brandy is a late term in European literature. Gin was unknown two hundred years ago. Rum is an American term applied to an American invention; and whisky, a Celtic word—uisge—water—has not been anglicized more than a century and a half. Neither rum, brandy, gin, or whisky have been in common use as spirituous drinks, nor any alcoholic drinks of anything like similar destructive power, until comparatively recent modern times.

See first lecture in "Course of six Cantor lectures delivered before the Society of Arts on alcohol by Benjamin W. Richardson, M. A., M. D., F. R. S." Dr. Richardson is known as one of the ablest scientific men of the age, and these lectures are the most recent and valuable contributions to the subject of "alcohol" that I have been able to obtain.

Distilled alcoholic liquors, the forms now in common use embraced by the first section of the proposed amendment, comprise brandy, rum, gin, and whisky.

Fermented liquors in common use are wine, cider, ale, and beer. The latter are alcoholic, but are not mixed with alcohol obtained by distillation, and are far less powerful and destructive to mankind. These are not included in the first section, but are left to the action of local laws, as is now the case, by section 2 of the amendment proposed.

In treating the subject I wish first to invite attention to the nature of alcohol and its effects upon the human system, as established by chemical and medical science. I shall then cite facts and statistics from other sources tending to show the necessity of legislation upon the subject. Then I shall explain the adaptation of the proposed amendment to the removal of the alleged evil, and endeavor to show that the powers of government are inherent and ample, and should be exercised in the premises.

THE TESTIMONY OF SCIENCE AND OF THE MEDICAL PROFESSION.

An English writer, who is declared by Governor Andrew in his remarkable argument in favor of a license law, before a committee of the Massachusetts Legislature, April 4, 1867, probably the ablest and most eloquent presentation of the views of those opposed to prohibitory laws ever made in the world, to be "one of the most able English scientific critics," &c, and who is opposed to teetotalism, says in the Cornhill Magazine of September, 1862:

And first as to the effect of long continued habits of alcoholic excess upon the general health of the body, these may be summed up in brief by one word—degeneration. Degeneration of structure and chemical composition is the inevitable fate of the tissues of the drunkard. Apart from moral influences all that we see of physical misery, of weakened intellect, of shortened life in the habitual drunkard, is due to this degeneration of tissue, which is gradually but infallibly brought about by alcoholic excess. Even the very blood, the beginning of all tissues, is affected in a similar way, as we might expect.

There is no doubt that in excessive doses alcohol if it be a food at all is a very bad one, and we must remember that the drunkard does in fact test its capacity to act as food; for by his habits he so impairs his appetite that he can take very little, if any, ordinary food.

This writer represents that class of medical gentlemen whose scientific views are most friendly to alcohol, and he states his conclusions thus:

On the part of alcohol, then, I venture to claim that though we all acknowledge it to be a poison, if taken during health in any but quite restricted doses, it is also a most valuable medicine-food.

It will be observed that I make no attack upon it as a medicine. This is the most favorable statement of the nature of alcohol in its effects upon the human organism which can be found, based upon respectable medical authority. It is that adduced by Governor Andrew in his great argument against prohibition, and I venture to say that there is not a particle of dispute in the medical world that it is true so far as it goes. I am not aware of the existence of any medical authority which admits that the use of distilled alcoholic liquors, as a common daily drink, does not inevitably tend to destroy the human system. True, there are a few exceptional instances recorded where men after having destroyed the normal functions of their organism, so that all healthy and natural foods are rejected by it, have lived for a time almost wholly upon alcohol itself. But in all cases where its action is favorable, it finds a diseased or unnatural condition to which it adapts itself, like the surgeon's knife to the tumor or to the shattered limb. There are exceptional organisms which prove the rule. But from this circumstance to argue that it is beneficial to the healthy normal state of child or man is like feeding a man upon the drugs of the apothecary, because, as medicines, they have been instrumental in restoring healthy digestion to the dyspeptic. I cheerfully grant that there is a large though lessening array of eminent medical authorities, which, while vigorously condemning the use of distilled liquor, as a beverage, declares its belief that the fermented wines and other mild forms of alcoholic liquor are on the whole beneficial when used in moderate quantities; but I am not dealing with these at all, and reiterate the statement that the medical world is a unit in declaring that the common use of distilled liquors operates as a poison, and not as a food, and destroys the mind and body of man.

While conceding that many chemists and physicians are advocates of the moderate use of light wines and fermented drinks, it is only fair, however, to say that I think that the weight of medical opinion based upon the latest scientific investigation and observation is against the position that alcohol, even in fermented forms, ever operates otherwise than as a poison. But this is not important to the argument, for that rests upon the undisputed verdict of the medical world, that "alcohol except when taken in quite restricted doses is poisonous to a person in health."

Dr. Willard Parker, a very eminent name among the physicians of America, writes the present year:

Alcohol has no place in the healthy system, but is an "irritant poison," producing a diseased condition of body and mind.

The International Medical Congress, the highest medical body in the world, held its last session at Philadelphia, in September, 1876, and I find the following in the official report of its proceedings on the 16th of that month:

The following is the report from the section on medicine, on the paper of Dr. E. M Hunt, on "Alcohol in its therapeutic relations as a food and a medicine."

First. Alcohol is not shown to have a definite food value by any of the usual methods of chemical analysis or physiological investigation.

Second. Its use as a medicine is chiefly as a cardiac (relating to the heart) stimulant, and often admits of substitution.

Third. As a medicine it is not well fitted for self prescription by the laity, and the medical profession is not accountable for such administration or for the enormous evils resulting therefrom.

Fourth. The purity of alcoholic liquors is in general not as well assured as that of articles used for medicine should be. The various mixtures when used as medicine should have definite and known composition, and should not be interchanged promiscuously.

Please note that this supreme authority says that alcohol is not known to have food value and that its principal use as a medicine is to stimulate the heart, not to create power by nutrition, but to use up the capital of the body with unnatural rapidity, and even for this purpose something else might generally be substituted.

I have already cited the Cartor lectures by Dr. Richardson, published this year, by far the most profound publication upon this subject which I have seen. Upon page 86 he gives the details of careful observation and experiment, and says:

Adopting the lowest estimate which has been given of the daily work of the heart, namely, as equal to one hundred and twenty-two tons lifted one foot, the heart during the alcoholic period did daily work in excess equal to lifting fifteen and eight-tenths tons one foot, and in the last two days did extra work to the amount of twenty-four tons lifted as far. * * * It will seem at first sight almost incredible that such an excess of work could be put upon the heart, but it is perfectly credible when all the facts are known. The heart of an adult man makes, as we see above, seventy-three and fifty-seven-tenths strokes per minute. This number multiplied by sixty for the hour and again by twenty-four for the day would give nearly 106,000 as the number of strokes per day. * * * And speaking generally we may put the average at 100,000 in the entire day. With each of these strokes the two ventricles of the heart, as they contract, lift up into their respective vessels three ounces of blood each, that is to say six ounces with the combined stroke, or 600,000 in the twenty-four hours. The equivalent of work rendered by this simple calculation would be one hundred and sixteen foot-tons, and if we estimate the increase of work induced by alcohol we shall find that four ounces of spirit (daily) increase it one-eighth part, six ounces one-sixth part, and eight ounces one-fourth part.

Upon the "food" question he says, page 100:

Alcohol contains no nitrogen; it has none of the qualities of these structure-building foods; it is incapable of being transformed into any of them; it is therefore not a food in the sense of its being a constructive agent in the building up of the body. In this respect I believe there is now no difference of opinion among those who have most carefully observed the action of alcohol.

Further on he disproves the common notion that alcohol developes an increase of animal heat. In the first stage of its operation it drives the blood to the surface by temporary stimulation of the heart, creating a flush, while the internal heat is being actually diminished, and demonstrates that though in the "first and third stages of alcoholic disturbance there is often muscular excitement which passes for increased muscular power, the muscles being rapidly stimulated into motion by the nervous tumult, yet the muscular power is actually enfeebled."

Discussing the adulteration of alcoholic liquors he says, page 124:

A bona fide wine, derived from the fermentation of grapes purely, cannot contain more than 17 per cent. of alcohol; yet our staple wines by an artificial process of fortifying and brandying, which means the adding of spirit, are brought up in sherries to 20 and in ports to even 25 per cent.

But the most startling fact of all given in this connection is this:

The admitted addition of some actively poisonous substances to alcohol, in order to produce a new luxury, is the evil most disastrous. The drink sold under the name of absinthe is peculiarly formidable. In this liquor five drachms of the essence of absinthe, or wormwood, are added to one hundred parts of alcohol * * * which has been discovered to exert the most powerful and dangerous action upon the nervous functions. Indeed such are the terrible consequences incident to this agent, that I agree with Dr. Decoisne in maintaining that it ought by legal provisions to be forbidden as an article of human consumption in all civilized communities. Until recently absinthe has not been publicly offered for sale in this country on a large scale. But now, unhappily, the poison is openly announced even here and the consumption is on the increase. (Pages 125, 126.)

After demonstrating the effects of alcohol in producing structural disorganization of the body, inflicting fatal disease of every important organ of the body and the overthrow of the mental powers, Professor Richardson proceeds thus; and I call attention to it as bearing upon this proposed amendment, which has special care for generations to come:

The most solemn fact of all bearing upon these mental aberrations produced by alcohol, and upon the physical not less than the mental, is that the mischief inflicted on man by his own act and deed cannot fail to be transferred to those who descend from him and who are thus irresponsibly afflicted. Among the many inscrutable designs of nature none is more manifest than this: that physical vice, like physical feature and physical virtue, descends in line. It is, I say, a solemn reflection for every man and every woman, that whatever we do to ourselves so as to modify our own physical conformation and mental type, for good or for evil, is transmitted to generations that have yet to be. Not one of the transmitted wrongs, physical or mental, is more certainly passed on to those yet unborn than the wrongs which are inflicted by alcohol. We, therefore, who live to reform the present age, in this respect are stretching forth our powers to the next, to purify it, to beautify it, and to lead it toward that millennial happiness and blessedness which in the fullness of time shall visit even the earth, making it, under an increasing light of knowledge, a garden of human delight, a paradise regained.

I trust such an object will not be deemed unworthy of the profound attention of the Congress and people of the United States. He closes thus:

This chemical substance, alcohol, an artificial product, devised by man for his purposes, and in many things that lie outside his organism a useful substance, is neither a food nor a drink suitable for his natural demands. Its application as an agent that shall enter the living organization is properly limited by the learning and skill possessed by the physician—a learning that itself admits of being recast and revised in many important details, and perhaps in principles. If this agent do really for the moment cheer the weary and impart a flush of transient pleasure to the unwearied who crave for mirth, its influence (doubtful even in these modest and moderate degrees) is an infinitesimal advantage by the side of an infinity of evil for which there is no compensation and no human cure.

It is easy to multiply the highest medical authorities and well attested facts in support of the views of these eminent gentlemen. Perhaps it is unnecessary, but I will further trespass upon the indulgence of the House to a limited extent in this direction. I shall do this without much attention to classification, as the bearing of each fact upon the various points of discussion will be sufficiently apparent, and the same fact often bears upon the truth of several propositions. The celebrated Dr. Carpenter, in his work on the use and abuse of alcoholic liquor, says:

The following statement of the result of a whole year's experiment at brickmaking, made by two sets of men—the one working on the abstinent, the other on the moderate system—is given by a gentleman of Uxbridge, England. Out of upward of 23,000,000 of bricks made in 1841, by the largest maker in the neighborhood, the average per man, made by the beer-drinkers in the season, was 760,269, while the average of the teetotalers was 795,400; which is 35,131 in favor of the latter, per man. The highest number made by a beer-drinker was 880,000; by a teetotaler, 890,000. The lowest number made by a beer-drinker was 659,500; the lowest number by a teetotaler was 746,000; leaving 87,000 in favor of the latter. Satisfactory as this account appears, I believe it would have been much more so if the teetotalers could have obtained the whole gang of abstainers, as they were frequently hindered by the drinking of some of the gang; and when the order is thus broken the work cannot go on.

I am informed that the experience of the armies and navies of England and America demonstrate that the soldier or sailor who abstains from the use of alcohol is, as a rule, more vigorous and healthy than the user, braver and more reliable in action, and far more capable of enduring the hardships of war.

Dr. Storer, of Boston, says, alluding to the statements of Dr. Day, superintendent of the Washingtonian Home of Boston:

Reference has been made by the doctor to the dire effects so often seen by medical men in the persons of the children of those addicted to habits of intoxication—epilepsy, idiocy, and insanity, congenital or subsequently developing themselves, with or without any apparent exciting cause. He has not, however, I think, sufficiently held up to the victims of this baleful thirst the terrible curse they thus deliberately entail upon their descendants.

It is hardly necessary to remark that Dr. Storer, the distinguished professor of obstetrics and diseases of women in Berkshire Medical College, is inferior to no other authority upon whatever relates to his own specialty in the practice of the healing art.

The report of the Massachusetts board of State charities for 1866 was prepared by seven gentlemen, three of them physicians, all of them appointed by Governor Andrew, and therefore not likely to be a board of crazy teetotalers. Speaking of "one prolific cause of the vitiation of the human stock," they say:

That prolific cause is the common habit of taking alcohol into the system, usually as the basis of spirits, wine, or beer. * * * The basis being the same in all, the constitutional effects are about the same. The use of alcohol materially modifies a man's bodily condition; and, so far as it affects him individually, it is his own affair; but if it affects also the number and condition of his offspring, that affects society. If its general use does materially influence the number and condition of the dependent and criminal classes, it is the duty of all who have thought and care about social improvement to consider the matter carefully, and it is the special duty of those having official relations with those classes to furnish facts and materials for public consideration. It is well known that alcohol acts unequally upon man's nature; that it stimulates the lower propensities and weakens the higher faculties, * * * and represses the functions which manifest themselves in the higher or human sentiments which result in will. If the blood, highly alcoholized, goes to the brain, its functions become subverted; the man does not know and does not care what he says or does. If this process is often repeated * * * the man is no longer under control of his voluntary power, but has come under the dominion of automatic functions, which are almost as much beyond his control as the beating of his heart. Any morbid condition of body frequently repeated becomes established by habit * * * and makes him more liable to certain diseases, as gout, scrofula, insanity, and the like. This liability or tendency he transmits to his children just as surely as he transmits likeness in form or feature. * * * Now the use of alcohol certainly does induce a morbid condition of body. It is morally certain that the frequent or the habitual overthrow of the conscience and will, or the habitual weakening of them, soon establishes a morbid condition, with morbid appetites and tendencies, and that those appetites and tendencies are surely transmitted to the offspring.

Again, it is admitted that an intemperate mother nurses her babe with alcoholized milk; but it is not enough considered that a father gives to his offspring certain tendencies which lead surely to craving for stimulants. These cravings once indulged grow to a passion, the vehemence of which passes the comprehension of common men.

Among the Greeks the prohibition of intoxicating wines (distilled liquors were unknown) was enforced by the severest penalties. "Plato Aristotle, Plutarch, and others have noticed the hereditary transmission of intemperate propensities, and the legislation that imposed abstinence upon women had unquestionably in view the greater vigor of the offspring, 'healthy minds in a healthy body.' That indulgence in the use of strong drink by expectant mothers would be injurious to them and their offspring was known to the learned and wise among the ancients." "The Romans had a prohibitory law which forbade intoxicating wine, while it allowed the pure juice." (See the very learned treatise of Rev. Dr. William Patton, of New York City, upon Bible wines, published in 1874, for a great mass of valuable information upon this subject.)

Willard Parker, M. D., of New York, in an address to the American Association for the Cure of Inebriates, asks:

What is alcohol? The answer is, a poison. It is so regarded by the best writers and teachers on toxicology. I refer to Orfila, Christisson, and the like, who class it with arsenic, corrosive sublimate, and prussic acid. Like these poisons when introduced into the system, it is capable of destroying life without acting mechanically. Introduced into the system it induces a general disease, as well marked as intermittent fever, small-pox, or lead poison.

And in a public address the same distinguished gentleman declares "that one-third of all the deaths in the city of New York are the result, directly or indirectly, of the use of alcohol; and that within the last thirty-eight years 100,000 persons in that city have died of its use, either by themselves or their parents."

And in a letter to Rev. Dr. Patton, which the latter cites in his "Bible Wines" above referred to, Dr. Parker says:

Alcohol is the one evil genius, whether in wine or ale or whisky, and is killing the race of men. Stay the ravages of this one poison, alcohol, that king of poisons, the mightiest weapon of the devil, and the millennium will soon dawn.

Attributing the fact largely to intoxicating liquors primarily and indirectly, the board of State charities of Pennsylvania state that "in careful breeding of cattle at least 95 per cent. come to maturity, and of horses 95 per cent. in our northern climate, while of the infinitely more precious race of men at least 33 per cent. perish in the bud of infancy or blossom of early youth."

Great God! I stagger in the effort to grasp these statistics of death. Are these the dreams of scientific madmen? Truth is not only stranger than fiction but infinitely more horrible. And the tide of testimony rolls on.

In 1874 Dr. James Edmunds, a very distinguished English physician, delivered a course of lectures upon the medical use of alcohol and stimulants for women, in New York City, which were published. He says, page 9:

It is admitted by every one that alcohol is the cause of more than half the insanity we have. I am not so familiar with the facts on this subject here as I should naturally be at the other side of the Atlantic. * * * I know this: that Lord Shaftesbury, the chairman of our commission on lunacy in England, has said in a parliamentary report on the subject, that six out of ten lunatics in our asylums are made lunatic by the use of alcohol. It is a fact which cannot be disputed that diseases of the liver, diseases of the lungs, diseases of the tissues of the body, are induced directly by the use of alcohol, and that as a general rule you may say that where you have alcohol used most largely and most frequently, there these diseases and degenerations in the tissues of the body become most marked. I could give you very authoritative facts bearing upon this matter from sources which are not open to the imputation of any kind of moral bias, as the utterances of some of our temperance friends may be open to.

Now recollect that food is that which puts strength into a man and stimulant is that which gets strength out of a man; so that when you want to use stimulant, recollect that you are using that which will exhaust the last particles of strength, with a facility with which your body would not otherwise part with them. If a man takes a pint of brandy what do we see? It intoxicates, it poisons him. Of course you know intoxicant is a modification of the Greek word toxicon. The man who is intoxicated is poisoned; we simply use a Greek instead of a Saxon word for it. We see a man intoxicated. What are the phenomena we see then? A man lies on his back snoring, helpless, senseless. If you set him up he falls down again like a sack of potatoes. If you try to rouse him, you get nothing out of him but a grunt. Is that the effect of a stimulant, do you think? I should think it is the effect of a paralyzer that you have—mind, and body, and nerve, and muscle all equally and uniformly paralyzed right through. * * * Alcohol in a large dose is a narcotic poison, which paralyzes the body and stupefies the mind. If a man takes a somewhat larger dose, what do you see then? You see that snoring and breathing come to an end—you see that the soft flabby pulsation of the heart ceases; that the spark of life goes out, and the man cannot be resuscitated. In fact there are more men killed, so far as I know English statistics, more men poisoned in that way by alcohol than are poisoned by all other poisons put together. We have a great horror of arsenic and fifty other things; the fact is that all these other things are a mere bagatelle in relation to the most direct, absolute, immediate, and certain poisonings which are caused by alcohol.

Colonel J. G. Dudley, of New York City, has published a valuable pamphlet reviewing this subject and carefully collating the opinions of the leading medical writers of the last fifty or seventy-five years, such as Orfila, Christisson, Dr. Taylor, Pereira, Professor Binz, Dr. Lallemand, Perrin, Dr. Willard Parker, Professor Edmund A. Parkes, Professor Duroy, Dumorel, Magnus, Dunglison, Dr. James Edmunds, Powell, Professor N. S. Davis, Dermarquay, Wetherbee, Burns, Dickinson, and others, all of whom agree in deciding that alcohol is an acrid poison.

Take now the following table from Neison's Vital Statistics, which Professor Parkes adopts and indorses in his great work on hygiene, page 270. These deductions were drawn from observations upon the lives of three hundred and fifty-seven persons:

A temperate person's chance of living is—		An intemperate person's chance of living is—
At 20	44.2 years.	At 20	15.6 years.
30	36.5 years.	30	13.8 years.
40	28 8 years.	40	11.6 years.
50	21.25 years.	50	10.8 years.
60	14.285 years.	60	8.9 years.

Whatever else the American Congress and people may disagree upon I think it will generally be conceded that life-insurance companies know what they are about.

Take now the following tables upon the basis of which they do business, and which are unquestionably as reliable as the keenest observation continued for many years can construct. The first table is prepared by Dr. Edward Jarvis, a distinguished American statist.

Ages of persons.	Deaths in 100,000.		Comparative rate of mortality.
	Intemperate.	Temperate.	Intemperate.	Others.
15 to 20 years	1,342	730	18	10
20 to 30 years	4,953	974	51	10
30 to 40 years	4,620	1,110	42	10
40 to 50 years	5,992	1,452	41	10
50 to 60 years	6,418	2,254	29	10
60 to 90 years	46,174	33,260	13	10
Comparative rate of deaths in equal numbers of intemperate and temperate persons of all ages, the same year			32	10

The following is from Carpenter on Physiology. It compares four general insurance companies with one temperance provident institution. And it should be noted that this is a comparison of teetotalers on the one hand with teetotalers and moderate or temperate drinkers combined on the other:

	Policies issued.	Number of deaths.	Equal to—
Company A	944	14	15 per thousand.
Company B	1,901	27	14 per thousand.
Company C	838	11	13 per thousand.
Company D	2,470	65	26 per thousand.
Temperance provident institution	1,596	12	7½ per thousand.

The first table shows an average mortality more than three times as large among the intemperate as among the temperate, and the other more than two and one-half times larger in the general companies than in the temperance institution.

Dr. Carpenter also indorses a certificate, of which the following is one paragraph, which he says was signed by more than two thousand physicians of all grades and degrees, from the court physicians and leading metropolitan surgeons to the humble country practitioner:

We the undersigned are of opinion—
First. That a very large proportion of human misery, including poverty, disease, and crime, is induced by the use of alcoholic or fermented liquors as beverages.

The evidence of this character is entirely inexhaustible, and I close it with the following "declaration" by the uncontradicted voice of the medical profession of New York City and vicinity:

MEDICAL DECLARATION.

1. In view of the alarming prevalence and ill-effects of intemperance, with which none are so familiar as members of the medical profession, and which have called forth from eminent English physicians the voice of warning to the people of Great Britain, concerning the use of alcoholic beverages, we, the undersigned, members of the medical profession of New York and vicinity, unite in the declaration that we believe alcohol should be classed with other powerful drugs; that, when prescribed medicinally, it should be with conscientious caution and a sense of grave responsibility.

2. We are of opinion that the use of alcoholic liquor as a beverage is productive of a large amount of physical disease; that it entails diseased appetites upon offspring; and that it is the cause of a large percentage of the crime and pauperism of our cities and country.

3. We would welcome any judicious and effective legislation—State and national—which should seek to confine the traffic in alcohol to the legitimate purposes of medical and other sciences, art, and mechanism.

While there is a large array of eminent medical authorities which incline to the belief that the moderate use of fermented liquors is not injurious and is often beneficial to health, yet the concurring sentiment of the medical world is against the use of distilled alcoholic beverages. But the weight of the latest and best medical and scientific opinion largely preponderates in favor of the position that alcohol is simply a poison, and should never be introduced to the human organism even in the forms of fermentation except as an antidote for disease, like arsenic, strychnine, prussic acid, or any other powerful but poisonous agency. I do not propose to enter this field of discussion so far as the light domestic wines and drinks of the people are concerned. It is not essential to the grounds of my argument in support of the proposed amendment. It is only just, however, that the position of the medical profession upon the influence of alcohol in any form of administration upon the human system should be fairly stated, and, if in so doing it shall have appeared that the preponderance of opinion is against the use of fermented as well as distilled liquors, it is no fault of mine. It will strengthen the argument against the stronger and more concentrated poison, if it shall be found or believed that fermented liquors contain enough of the pernicious spirit of wine, which one of Shakespeare's immortal characters stigmatizes as "devil," to endanger the physical, mental, and moral organism of those who indulge in their habitual use.

FACTS AND STATISTICS FROM THE CENSUS AND OTHER SOURCES, MOSTLY OFFICIAL.

I now desire to present in the best manner I can a statement of facts bearing upon the effect of the manufacture and use of intoxicating liquors on the wealth, industries, and productive powers of the nation; also upon its ignorance, pauperism, and crime. I have endeavored to authenticate every statement by careful inquiry. The information is drawn from the census returns, from records of the Departments of Government, reports of State authorities, declarations from prominent statisticians and responsible gentlemen in different parts of the country. Much of it is to be found, with a great deal more of similar matter, in a very valuable book published the present year. The author is William Hargreaves, M. D., of Philadelphia. No one who has not fought with figures, like old Paul with the beasts at Ephesus, knows how it taxes the utmost powers of man to classify, condense, and present intelligibly to the mind the mathematical or statistical demonstration of these tremendous social and economic facts. The truths they teach involve the fate of modern civilization.

In 1870 the tax collected by the Internal Revenue Department was upon 72,425,353 gallons of proof spirits and 6,081,520 barrels of fermented liquors. Commissioner Delano estimates the consumption of distilled spirits in 1869 at 80,000,000 gallons. By the census returns June 1, 1860, there were produced in the United States 90,412,581 gallons of domestic spirits—and of course this was consumed, with large amounts imported besides—but there are very large items which escape the official enumeration. These have been carefully estimated as follows:

	Gallons.
Domestic liquors evading tax and imported smuggled, at least	5,000,000
Domestic wines	10,000,000
Domestic wines made on farms	3,092,330
Domestic wines made and used in private families	1,000,000
Dilutions of liquors paying tax by dealers	7,500,000

This amount added to the total produced in 1860 would be 107,004,911; added to amount on which was collected tax in 1870 would be 99,017,683.

It is well known that the great mass of alcoholic liquor is consumed as a beverage, and it will fall below the fact to place the amount paid for it at retail by the American drinker at 75,000,000 gallons yearly. But take the very modest estimate of Dr. Young, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, who makes the following estimate of the sales of liquors in the fiscal year ending June 1, 1871:

Whisky, (alone)	60,000,000 gallons at $6, at retail	$360,000,000
Imported spirits	2,500,000 gallons at $10, at retail	25,000,000
Imported wine	10,700,000 gallons at $5, at retail	53,500,000
Ale, beer, and porter	6,500,000 gallons at $20 a bbl. at retail	130,000,000
Native wines, brandies, cordials, estimated		31,500,000
Total		600,000,000

I am satisfied that this is much below the real amount, but it is enough.

This is one-seventh the value of all our manufactures for that year, more than one-fourth that of farm productions, betterments, and stock, as shown by the census.

Dr. Hargreaves estimates the retail liquor bill of 1871 at $680,036,042. In 1872, as shown by the internal-revenue returns, there was a total of domestic and foreign liquors shown into the hands of the American people of 337,288,066 gallons, the retail cost of which at the estimated prices of Dr. Young is $735,720,048. The total of liquors paying tax from 1860 to 1872—thirteen years—was 2,762,926,066 gallons, costing the consumer $6,780,161,805. During several of these years the Government was largely swindled out of the tax, so that no mortal knows how far the truth lies beyond these startling aggregates.

Dr. Young estimates the cost of liquors in 1867 at the same as in 1871—$600,000,000—and exclaims: "It would pay for 100,000,000 barrels of flour, averaging two and one-half barrels to every man, woman, and child in the country.

Such facts might well transform the mathematician into an exclamation point. Dr. Hargreaves, who goes into all the minutiæ of the demonstration, dealing, however, only with bureau returns, declares that the annual consumption of distilled spirits in the United States is not less than 100,000,000 gallons annually, and this makes a very small allowance for "crooked whisky." Take now Dr. Young's moderate estimate of $600,000,000 annually, and relying upon the official records of the country, and in sixteen years we have destroyed in drink $9,600,000,000—more than four times the amount of the national debt, and once and a half times the whole cost of the war of the rebellion to all sections of the country, while the loss of life, health, spiritual force, and moral power to the people was beyond comparison greater. The lowest estimate I have seen of the annual loss of life directly from the use of intoxicating liquor is 60,000, or 960,000 during the period above mentioned; more than three times the whole loss of the North by battle and disease in the war, as shown by the official returns.

The assessed value of all the real estate in the United States is $9,914,780,825; of personal, $4,264,205,907. In twenty-five years we drink ourselves out of the value of our country, personal property and all.

The census shows that in 1870 the State of New York spent for liquors $106,590,000; more than two-fifths of the value of products of agriculture and nearly one-seventh the value of all the manufactures and nearly two-thirds of the wages paid for both agriculture and manufactures, the liquor bill being little less than twice the receipts of her railroads. The liquor bill of Pennsylvania in 1870 was $65,075,000; of Illinois, $42,825,000; Ohio, $58,845,000; Massachusetts, $25,195,000; New Hampshire, $5,800,000; Maine, where the prohibitory law is better enforced than anywhere else, $4,215,000, although Maine has twice the population of New Hampshire.

Dr. Hargreaves says that there was expended for intoxicating drinks in—

1869	$693,999,509
1870	619,425,110
1871	680,036,042
1872	735,726,048
Total	2,729,186,709
Annual average	682,296,677

And he says the average is larger since 1872, exceeding $700,000,000.

Each family by the census averages 5.09 persons, and we spend for liquor at the rate of $81.74 yearly for each. The loss to the nation in perverted labor is very great. In 1872 there were 7,276 licensed wholesale liquor establishments and 161,144 persons licensed to sell at retail. It is said that there are as many more unlicensed retail liquor shops. All these places of traffic must employ at least half a million of men. There were then 3,132 distilleries, which would employ certainly five men each—say, 15,660. The brewers' congress in 1874 said that there were employed in their business 11,698. There would be miscellaneously employed about breweries and distilleries 10,000; in selling, say, 500,000. In all, say, 550,000 able-bodied men, who, so far as distilled liquors are concerned at least, constitute a standing army constantly destroying the American people. They create more havoc than an opposing nation which should maintain a hostile force of half a million armed men constantly making war against us upon our own soil. The temple of this Janus is always open. Why should we thus persevere in self-destruction?

There are 600,000 habitual drunkards in the United States. If they lose half their time it would be a loss of $150,000,000 to the nation in productive power and in wages and wealth to both the nation and themselves every year.

Dr. Hargreaves has constructed the following table:

The yearly loss of time and industry of 545,624 men employed in liquor-making and selling	$272,812,000
Loss of time and industry of 600,000 drunkards	150,000,000
Loss of time of 1,404,323 male tipplers	146,849,592
Total	568,861,592

And he adds that investigation will show this large aggregate is far below the true loss.

By this same process 40,000,000 bushels of nutritious grain is annually destroyed, equal to 600,000,000 four-pound loaves; about 80 loaves for each family in the country.

Dr. Hitchcock, president of Michigan State board of health, estimates the annual loss of productive life by reason of premature deaths produced by alcohol at 1,127,000 years, and that there are constantly sick or disabled from its use 98,000 persons in this country.

Assuming the annual producing power of an able-bodied person to be $500 value, and this annual loss of life would otherwise be producing, the national loss is the immense sum of		$612,510,000 00
Add to this the losses by the misdirected industry of those engaged in the manufacture and sale; loss of one-half the time of the 600,000 drunkards and of the tipplers, as their number is estimated by Dr. Hargreaves		$568,861,592 00
And we have		1,181,371,592 00
The grain, &c., destroyed		36,000,000 00
		1,217,371,592 00
Dr. Hitchcock estimates the number of insane, made so annually, at 9,338, or loss in effective life of 98,259 years, at $500 per year		49,129,500 00
Number of idiots from same cause, an annual loss of 319,908 years		159,954,000 00
		1,426,455,092 00
Deduct receipts of internal-revenue tax, (year 1875)	$61,225,995 53
Receipts from about 500,000 State licenses, at $100	50,000,000 00
		111,225,995 53
Annual loss to the nation of production		1,315,229,096 47
Annual value of all labor in the United States, as per census of 1870		1,263,984,003 00
Losses from alcohol in excess of wages of labor yearly		51,245,093 47

This calculation includes nothing for interest upon capital invested, for care of the sick, insane, idiotic—it allows alcohol credit for revenue paid on all which is used for legitimate purposes. In England the capital invested in liquor business is $585,000,000, or £117,000,000. It was proved by the liquor dealers before the committee of the Massachusetts Legislature in 1867 that the capital invested in the business in Boston was at least $100,000,000, and in the whole country it cannot be less than $1,000,000,000, or ten times the amount invested in Boston. The annual value of imported liquors is about $80,000,000. It may be that the above estimate of losses yearly to the nation is too high. Perhaps $500 is more than the average gross earnings of an able-bodied man, and there may be other errors of less consequence. But any gentleman is at liberty to divide and subdivide the dreadful aggregate as often and as long as he pleases, and then I would ask him what good reason has he to give why the nation should lose anything from these causes.

PAUPERISM.

I cannot detain the House with full statistics from the various States in regard to the pauperism occasioned by alcohol, but not less than 130,000 widows and orphans are left such in our country annually by liquor-drinkers, and from two-thirds to four-fifths of the inmates of our poor-houses are sent there by drink.

CRIME.

The statistics of crime are even more astounding. In the report of the United States Commissioner of Education for 1871, page 541, I find this statement: "The fourth fact is, that from 80 to 90 per cent. of our criminals connect their courses of crime with intemperance. Of the 14,315 inmates of the Massachusetts prisons, 12,396 are reported to have been intemperate, or 84 per cent." Ninety-three per cent. of those confined in Deer Island house of industry are confined for crimes connected with liquor. "In the New Hampshire prison sixty-five out of ninety-one admit themselves to have been intemperate. Reports from every State, county, and municipal prison in Connecticut made in 1871 show that more than 90 per cent. had been in habits of drink by their own admission." The warden of the Rhode Island State prison estimates 90 per cent. of his prisoners as drinkers. These relate to those who have been guilty of the more serious offenses, not mere every-day arrests for drunkenness and disorderly conduct.

The report of the board of State charities of Pennsylvania for 1871 says, page 89:

> The most prolific source of disease, poverty, and crime observing men will acknowledge is intemperance.

Mr. William J. Mullen, the well-known and highly esteemed prison agent, in his report for 1870 says:

> An evidence of the bad effects of this unholy business may be seen in the fact that there have been thirty-four murders within this city (Philadelphia) during the last year alone, each one of which was traceable to intemperance, and one hundred and twenty-one assaults for murder proceeding from the same cause. Of over 38,000 arrests in our city within the year, 75 per cent. were caused by intemperance. Of 18,305 persons committed to our prison within the year, more than two-thirds were the consequence of intemperance.

Judge Allison, in a speech delivered in Philadelphia in 1872, says:

> In our criminal courts we can trace four-fifths of the crimes that are committed to the influence of rum. There is not one case in twenty where a man is tried for his life in which rum is not the direct or indirect cause of the murder.

is the city of brotherly love. She is excelled by no large city in the world in all the elements and evidences of enlightened Christian civilization. She has immortalized herself in our centennial year by a queenly majesty of municipal deportment and a magnificence of patriotic hospitality which are a source of love and pride to her countrymen and have won for her the cordial and unstinted admiration of mankind. And it is a delightful relief for my aching head, as I copy and compile these statistics of damnation, to record the illuminating and illustrative fact that on those centennial grounds, from which intoxicating liquors were rigidly excluded, and where the æsthetic and diviner cravings of humanity were fed as from the gardens of God, among all the millions who wandered through that world of the last and highest results of civilization on earth, not one arrest was made for intoxication during the whole term of the exhibition. The infinite significance of that philosophy which not only demands prohibitory laws to restrain evil, but also the provision of food for the mind and stimulants to all the innocent, enlarging, and ennobling tendencies of the soul, could not be more strikingly illustrated and enforced.

Mr. Speaker, the records of New York, with her more than ten thousand liquor shops, one-half of which are unlicensed, and which Mr. Oliver Dyer says would line both sides of a street running from the Battery out eight miles into Westchester County, having, by the report of Superintendent Kennedy, made some years since, an average of one hundred and thirty-four visits each daily, with 50,844 arrests for intoxication and disorderly conduct in the single year 1868, and with 98,861 arrests for crimes of every description, nine-tenths of which were the result of drink; all these I have examined, but I have no heart to dwell upon them. I cannot endure their longer contemplation. The mathematics of this infinite evil are only paralleled by the tremendous calculations of astronomy, and as I quit the appalling theme I feel as though I had been calculating eclipses on the firmament of the pit.

If we can do no more for this agonized land, groaning and travailing in despair, than to institute the commission of inquiry into the statistical evidences which are waiting everywhere for proper authentication, and a bill for which, having passed the Senate, reposes in the embrace of a committee of this House, we shall have accomplished something for which the ages to come will rise up to bless our memory; for I sincerely believe that nothing is required to work out our salvation from the great evil which we are considering but authentic knowledge, generally diffused among the people. In the pressure of the momentous affairs by which we are surrounded, I have not been able to summarize and classify as I would otherwise have done this statement of such facts as appear to me to be derived from reliable sources; but I have done the best I could, hoping that abler minds will turn their attention to the subject and that Congress will no longer neglect to institute official inquiries, with a view to such ultimate legal action as may arrest an evil which, if not arrested, will go far to destroy the American people.

BEARING OF THE SUBJECT UPON THE EDUCATION OF THE PEOPLE.

Some paper has sneeringly alluded to this proposed amendment as a measure of temperance reform for posterity. Chiefly so it is; and all the voices of humanity cry out for its adoption. All thinking men admit that the condition of posterity depends upon intelligence and virtue, and these are transmitted and developed by the educational institutions and processes of the country, of which by far the most important is the common school; and over that alone has the Government any control. Contrast for a moment the means of education in virtue and intelligence with those which exist for the promotion of vice and crime and misery in this country, and then let those sneer who will at a measure which aims to save posterity from the fate which, if there is no reform, will overtake us in national life, just as surely as the time finally comes when the individual inebriate, whether in the horrors of delirium or the stupidity of the consumed sot, drops into the tomb of despair.

The census of 1870 shows that there are in the United States 141,629 schools, with 221,042 teachers and 7,209,938 pupils who attend in the aggregate—the average is less—costing $95,402,826. Of these, 125,059 are public schools, with 183,198 teachers, 6,228,060 pupils, costing $64,030,673 yearly.

There are 12,955,443 between the ages of five and eighteen years who should be at school, leaving 4,845,505 who do not attend at all. About 740,000 of these are engaged in labor of some kind; but there must be more than 3,000,000 who do not go to school at all. Dr. Hargreaves says that ninety-nine hundredths of them are children of the intemperate, and he makes the following tabular statement showing the relative efficiency of the "two educational systems" as they are operated in Pennsylvania, whose condition is not discreditable in comparison with the country at large:

EDUCATION IN KNOWLEDGE AND VIRTUE.		EDUCATION IN IMMORALITY AND VICE.
Schools, colleges, &c., in Pennsylvania	16,090	Drinking-places in Pennsylvania	23,606
Professors and teachers	18,783	Persons employed in liquor shops	45,490
Pupils and students, &c., in regular attendance	542,076	Tipplers and drunkards	802,004
Cost for educational purposes in Pennsylvania	$8,399,723	Direct cost of liquors in Pennsylvania	$80,000,000

More than nine times as much money spent to destroy as there is to save "posterity" by these two systems. And again he says:

> Though within the last twenty years our teachers have increased from 25 to 30 per cent. and pupils attending school more than 50 per cent., yet crime has increased more than 60 per cent.

Rather a hard look for "posterity," and if there is no change "posterity" better not be there.

RIGHT AND NECESSITY OF LEGISLATION.

The right of Government to legislate upon the subject of intemperance has been strongly denied, but the absolute necessity of prohibition or regulation of the traffic in intoxicating drinks has been demonstrated in every civilized country where their use has unfortunately become prevalent, and the statute-books of England and America, for two centuries at least, bear constant witness to the exercise of that power. The question has been raised and settled in the Supreme Court of the United States and by the highest tribunals in almost every State of the Union, if not in all. It is too late to deny the power, the right, and the necessity of such legislation. It is only a question of the jurisdiction by which it shall be enacted and the extent to which it shall be carried.

In this connection I wish to call attention to a fallacy which exists in the minds of many. It is assumed by the advocates in the traffic of intoxicating liquors that there is a distinction between the right of Government to enact legislation totally and partially prohibitory. Government, it is said, may license and regulate but may not prohibit. But there is no such distinction in reason at all. The power to partially prohibit by license—which is prohibition so far as it restricts at all—is the same power and stands upon the same ground; that is, the obligation to promote the general welfare—as that to prohibit absolutely. A license to one man to make or sell ardent spirits is an absolute prohibition to all the rest of the community to do so at all. The advocates of the license and regulation of the traffic have no logical grounds upon which to object to absolute prohibition, if necessity requires. It is only a question of degree. The universal sense of mankind has passed that point where it is necessary to demonstrate the right to prohibit absolutely and totally. There is in fact no difference between license and prohibition as a principle. Prohibition is never held to extend beyond those uses which are demonstrably injurious to society. For all necessary and beneficial purposes prohibitory laws permit or license the traffic. I think this view of the subject important and a complete reply to those who claim that the evil should be licensed and regulated, at the same time that they hold the total prohibition to be a violation of inalienable right and the enactment of a sumptuary law. The one is as much a sumptuary law and a violation of inalienable right as the other, and no more so. If this is true, and I am not able to see wherein it is false, there is an end of the argument between the advocates of license and prohibition as to the right of such legislation, for they stand upon common ground, and there is no logical position for those who controvert the justice of prohibitory laws, so called, but that of those who advocate the unrestricted right to manufacture and sell intoxicating liquors to everybody for all purposes; and that ground has not been held by any court for generations to my knowledge.

Alcohol has its uses. It is a necessity in the arts. It is invaluable for many medicinal purposes, and as such is entitled to protection as property. But on the other hand it is armed with fatal capacity to destroy. It is a Pandora's-box of evils. In its peculiarly fatal form, that of distillation, which is a concentrated death, it was unknown for fifty-five hundred years of the world's history, and mankind were the better for their ignorance. The fruit of this tree of knowledge has been death. During the last three centuries what is known as ardent spirits with us, and the immense and dreadful curses which grow out of their use, have gradually arisen. They have the power of perverting the natural instincts and tastes of both body and mind, and to recreate man into the slave of perverted appetites, having insatiable, consuming, uncontrollable, devilish power. The image of God becomes dangerous to society as well as to himself, whether as a maniac or as a criminal, and it is this consequence of the use of intoxicating liquors which the laws have constantly, but imperfectly, undertaken to control for many years; nothing more.

This amendment proposes to extend over the national domain the protection of a constitutional inhibition of the destructive tendencies of liquors when made and used for purposes which have been proved to be detrimental to society, and which many of the States of the Union have endeavored vainly to restrict and destroy.

Nothing but a general law can be efficient. That has been demonstrated by experience. While one State prohibits, another manufactures and encourages. The appetite already exists. It increases and even becomes hereditary. More than one hundred and sixty thousand saloons and tippling-places educate the children of America in habits of intoxication, and the appetite will crush the imaginary lines which State legislation erects against the introduction of this evil merchandise, even as the billows of the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone might be supposed to bury and consume the paper on which that legislation is written. The manufacture and the appetite act and react upon each other. The demand creates the supply, and constantly cries out "Give! Give!" The supply or manufacture is thus stimulated and perpetuated. It will always continue unless stopped by the union of persuasion and compulsion, because of its lucrative nature, and because the appetite for strong drink when once established lives with an infernal immortality through successive generations of men. Thus it is that the necessity of legal enactment is apparent. True that behind legal enactments, as in all other cases where public evils and crimes are prohibited by law, must be public opinion, which is the basis of all law in a free country where the people rule, and public opinion is the creature of experience, argument, discussion, and personal appeal—in short, of "moral suasion," as these agencies are called in their application to the subject of intemperate vice in the use of spirituous liquors. "Moral suasion" must precede the law, and accompany and assist in its enforcement. They are allies. The one grows out of the other just as the law against theft grows out of the universal sentiment of mankind that theft is wrong and a public evil which must be prevented by the forces of society.

Laws to protect society against intoxication inevitably grow out of moral suasion, if there is enough of it to arouse the general conscience and the intelligent apprehension of the people to the enormous losses and wrongs inflicted by alcohol upon society at large. Thus it is that the call for more of moral suasion and less of law is a contradiction of terms. These forces are in harmony like a father and son in a partnership; the law steps in and enlarges and perpetuates the business which moral suasion has established after years of indefatigable industry upon the platform, through the press, and by private solicitation and appeal. And for any person to cry out against a law against the use of intoxicating liquors in society which can never have been enacted at all but in consequence of moral suasion, and say that it injures the cause because you cannot compel men to do right against their will, is to say that all crime and every public evil shall go free of the law; not only that, but that society shall abandon all conservative and preventive means for the protection of those who come after us; that not only shall the law abandon the present but the rising generation, and in fact consistency will require that in the end moral suasion itself must be abandoned, since its inevitable result is a formal embodiment of its teachings in general law, as soon as it has produced a strong public sentiment upon which law can rest—and which will enforce the law.

I have already asked attention to the facts which as I think demonstrate that the unrestricted use and effect of distilled spirits constitute public evils of such a nature as to not only justify but compel the interposition of the law; just now I wish to confine attention to the necessity of

if we would reach the evil effectively.

It is evident in the first place that the intense thirst or appetite of the country will lead to the manufacture and transportation of alcohol for the purpose of its gratification. If the production is suppressed everywhere else in the whole country, still in a single one of the smallest States where the manufacture might be allowed, (and the temptation to permit the manufacture in small and isolated localities would be greatly increased in the proportion that the concentration of the business made its existence profitable to the State for purposes of taxation and otherwise,) the materials being transported, as they would be from other States, the entire supply of all kinds of distilled spirits for the whole country could easily be furnished. The manufacture might be localized, but it would still exist, and all the efforts of State legislation elsewhere would thus be substantially thwarted.

Again, supposing that every State and Territory in the country should suppress the manufacture, and importation from abroad should continue, the evil would remain the same; and we should only have transferred the manufacture, with the immense capital engaged in it, to a foreign country to which we should first export our corn and rye and wheat to be returned in the form of imported liquors to the dry throats of American consumers. Thus we should retain the evil after depriving ourselves of the revennes derived from it. Now, since State legislation cannot interfere with the manufacture outside its own limits, nor perhaps within its own limits for exportation to other States, and as commerce, alike domestic and foreign, is controlled by the General Government, it is apparent that any legal enactment which goes to the root of the matter must be national in its scope and character. So far as the exportation to other countries is concerned, while I do not say that it could not be still carried on without great evil to our own people, aside from the waste of material and the perversion of capital and labor from useful purposes, yet to continue to poison mankind at large with what we had prohibited to ourselves would be like peddling off to our neighbors the contaminated and fatal garments which we might have had left after the small-pox or yellow fever had run through our own family.

As a means of suppression, the power to arrest the article in transitu is hardly less important than that to prevent the manufacture and sale; but this power can never be effectively exercised so long as the United States protects the transportation of ardent spirits to the same extent as other forms of property from one part of the country to another. Experience has demonstrated the impossibility of prevention when there is a chance to procure and while all the innumerable avenues of transportation are open.

Again, the power to control the manufacture and sale and use of distilled alcoholic liquors is to be found under the head of the police power of government, as it is called, which is vested primarily in the several States; and in order that this power be exercised by the nation at large, except in the District of Columbia and the Territories, the Constitution must first be amended so as to give the national Government the right to co-operate with the States in the enforcement of that power for the restriction of this traffic. There is no valid objection to the enlargement or change of national jurisdiction in this respect, as will appear from an inspection of the Constitution as it now stands. The power already exists over the internal police of the States so far as to protect alcohol as property for all purposes for which it can be manufactured and transported. The Constitution now interferes with the internal police of every State which may desire to banish liquor from its borders for the public good, by protecting every other State which sees fit to encourage the traffic in the production and transportation of this substance as a commodity of legitimate commerce, and compels each State to allow its importation in bulk from foreign countries and other States, and when once within the territorial limits of a State you can no more prevent its distribution through the dram-shop than you can arrest the progress of the storm by a geographical line. So it is that the Constitution already does interfere in the most potent and specific manner with the internal police of the States upon this all important subject.

Thus it appears, first, that the evil can only be effectually reached by national legislation, and, second, that such legislation must be of a constitutional character. It further appears that this is the assertion of no new power over the internal police of the States. It is only a modification for the general welfare of a power already possessed by the national Government, which is now being exercised to the destruction of the efforts of the States to extirpate a prolific source of pauperism, crime, and death. The Constitution of the United States, as it now is and has been from the beginning, is a law for the unrestricted manufacture, sale, importation, exportation, and internal transportation of intoxicating liquors. It is the great legal fortress of intemperance in this country to-day. It is not a blank upon this subject. It is not even a mere license law. But by its recognition of alcohol as property, which may be made and used and carried and protected for all purposes in the national domain; by its protection of alcohol as an imported article in the ports and in the Territories of the nation, and by its practical nullification of State laws, enabling the citizens of one State to erect a public bar protected by the supreme law of the land along every inch of the boundaries of a sister State which may be struggling to suppress the evil, by smuggling strong liquors with impunity across the boundaries of States, and even carrying them everywhere under the Stars and Stripes, protected if need be by the Army of the Union, in these ways the Constitution of the United States is now the great almighty obstacle in the way of the temperance reform in this country.

THAT CONSTITUTION OUGHT IN THIS RESPECT TO BE CHANGED.

Can it be changed? That is the question, and there is but one answer. It must be done. No such word as fail should be allowed in the vocabulary of patriotism. But how? It can only be done by public opinion. Intelligence, conscience, and common sense are the foundations of sound public opinion; and they are the agencies which must be relied upon to effect the proposed change in the Constitution of the nation. It must be based upon the intelligent demand of three-fourths of the States in this Union. How can that public sentiment be created? First, there must be an intelligent apprehension of the extent of the evil to be remedied, and that the nation as such is concerned in it. Second, there must be a practical measure proposed, wise and just and efficient, upon which the efforts of the people can be concentrated. That measure must be radical in its nature, but it must not ignore existing rights nor violate the public faith, nor assail the personal character of those who are engaged in what the nation recognizes, and has recognized from the beginning, as a legitimate business and source of revenue to the coffers of the country. If the nation has traded in its own destruction it must itself wear the hood of shame. That measure cannot destroy property rights vested in the public faith without compensation or without giving ample time for the diversion of capital to other and less pernicious industries.

THE SLAVE TRADE

was abolished by a constitutional provision, which, in form, gave it protection for nearly twenty years. If it had been proposed to make that provision operative at once the Constitution itself never would have been adopted by the American people. That measure must interfere as little as possible with the internal affairs of the States, leaving to them the enforcement of special laws within their own borders subject to the general constitutional restriction. And, finally, in order to have practical value, it must be one which, appealing to the intelligence and patriotism of all classes in the whole country, will have some rational chance of adoption by the widely diversified interests, prejudices, and sentiments of this vast nation, and of incorporation into the supreme law of the land. Such a measure I have endeavored to devise, and, although it may be full of imperfections, I have felt some hope that it would turn the attention of greater powers to the subject, and that the eminent gentlemen who have charge of it would mature some plan for the suppression of this national crime and shame, through a constitutional inhibition. I desire to call specific attention to those features of this proposed amendment to the Constitution which have commended themselves to my own judgment, and which I have thought would strike the public mind with some force.

LEADING FEATURES OF THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

First, it is a proposed constitutional amendment, and not a measure of proposed legislation by Congress under the Constitution as it now is. I think I have already said enough to show that whatever the nation does to facilitate the suppression of the evils perpetrated by alcohol must be accomplished by a change in the Constitution itself.

TIME.

Second, the time when the first clause shall take effect is so far in the future that vested rights will not suffer at all; certainly not essentially. Notice of a quarter of a century is sufficient to every manufacturer to turn his attention to other and less harmful pursuits. It is longer than our fathers gave to the merchant marine of the country to remove its capital from the slave trade, even if ratified at once, and ten years are given whenever ratification may take place. This will enable every man to wear out his still or convert his machinery to some beneficial purpose. It will cover the average period of business life for this entire generation, and I doubt whether there is a distiller in the world who desires that his son should follow the pursuit in which he himself feels compelled to remain, and the immediate destruction of which would reduce his family to beggary. Capital invested in the wholesale and import trade could be very easily diverted in other directions at much shorter notice, while the retailer only requires time to sell out his stock on hand.

I am persuaded that great injustice is often done in public discussions of this subject by the wholesale denunciations and uncharitable, not to say unchristian and even brutal, epithets which are hurled at the large number of American citizens who are engaged in one branch or another of the liquor business. They are men like ourselves, oftentimes better than those who assail them, and nothing is gained by the effort to reform individuals by lectures which would disgrace a fishwoman, or to carry great public measures by scurrilous attacks upon men who follow an avocation which, however hostile to the interests of mankind, is yet intrenched in the Constitution of our country—a Constitution sanctioned by the names of Washington, Franklin, and Madison, and by virtue of the broad provisions of which we derive the power to attack our fellow-men with a license of the tongue almost as pernicious to the public welfare as the license of the traffic in rum. I am satisfied that very large numbers of men whose interests are bound up in the liquor traffic would themselves gladly cooperate, if they were not repelled as criminals, with the most ultra advocates of the temperance cause in some broad measure which, while it will enable them to avoid pecuniary ruin, will, at the same time, protect the coming generations from the storm of fire and brimstone which is pelting ours like that which fell upon Sodom and Gomorrah and left them at the bottom of the Dead Sea.

THE CONSUMER.

Again, the consumer, he who complains that you assault his manhood, his personal liberty, that you lock up his mouth with a sumptuary law, that you trample upon his God-given freedom, when you deprive him of his rum, whisky, brandy, and gin, when you interfere with his right to get drunk, to be drunk, and to help others to be drunk like himself, even this man cannot complain, for before the year 1900 he will be in his grave. And I have never yet seen the sot even who wanted to transmit his right to be destroyed by strong drink to his son. There is hardly a victim of intemperance on this continent to-day who will not vote to save his son from the dreadful appetite which chains him to his fate. The parental sentiment of the country will cry out for this amendment and the instincts of human nature will crowd to the ballot-boxes of the land to save the children of the ages to come. I firmly believe that if Congress will only give the American people the opportunity to act on this proposed amendment, it would win upon a popular vote after two years' discussion.

But there is no form in which the appeal can be made but by the submission of an amendment from the National Legislature to the States at large, and why should not the opportunity be given and the result left with the people themselves?

The importation of liquors is now the subject of treaty stipulation with France and other countries, but we have the unquestionable right to abrogate these treaties after reasonable notice. Every nation has this right, and I allude to it only because I have heard the existence of these treaties suggested as an obstacle to the adoption of the amendment.

Again, this resolution proposes to prevent the MANUFACTURE.

I think it is apparent that there can be no permanent temperance reform in this country so long as the manufacture is free.

I am not aware of the existence of any law in any State which interferes with the unrestricted manufacture of distilled spirits for every purpose. Whatever is made will be sold; and if it is right to regulate or prohibit the sale for any use, it must be right to regulate or prohibit the manufacture for the same use, and if it is possible to regulate or prevent the sale after the article has been distributed into a million localities all over the country, it is comparatively easy to control the manufacture, which necessarily must be carried on where large masses of capital are concentrated. Granted that individuals will manufacture their own poison, yet they must do it in secret and under such difficulties and public reprobation that comparatively small injury could result. And if it is possible to regulate the sale, and successfully or even with approximate success to restrict the sale to legitimate and necessary uses in detached States, as has been so largely done even under all the embarrassments of existing laws and a public sentiment none too sensitive and never hereafter to be less so than now, how much easier will it be to regulate and control the manufacture by licenses from the States or from the General Government, as should be found best in practice. Especially would this be so when by the control of transportation every particle made could be traced to the proper and authorized dealers or custodians throughout the country. It would be impossible to conceal the manufacture if carried on to any injurious extent. Nothing can reach the manufacturer but a constitutional amendment, for two reasons: first, as before observed, the Constitution now recognizes ardent spirits for all uses to be property, and, second, no matter how strictly any State law might provide for its suppression, capital could locate in some other jurisdiction, in some other State or Territory, or in some foreign state, and create the supply which the drinking appetite of the consumer demands.

Again it will be observed that the proposed prohibition by the nation alcoholic liquors. The advocates of temperance are themselves yet somewhat divided upon the question whether the use of fermented and brewed liquors as a beverage is or is not beneficial to the country. I have before alluded to the fact that there is high medical authority for the position that domestic wines, cider, ale, and beer are not hurtful in themselves, when not used in positive excess, and rendered so in the same way that the system is injured by gormandizing and gluttony. There is also a strong impression, however groundless it may be, that a mild stimulant is essential to the civilization of the nineteenth century, and that its use in the milder forms named prevents more general indulgence in distilled liquors, with their terribly destructive powers. Such a belief is a fact, although the ground for it may be false.

But all men who believe in restrictive legislation of any kind concur in the assertion that the use of distilled alcoholic drinks is the source of the great mass of the evil which intemperance inflicts upon the country, and all classes of men who advocate legislation of any kind will, it is believed, support this proposition; some because they believe it goes just far enough, others because they believe it is better than nothing and will lead ultimately to the desired end. The latter class may well ask themselves the question: "If we prevent the country from taking the first step, how can we expect it ever to take two?"

No doubt the extinction of distilled liquors as a beverage will increase, at least for the time being, the consumption of brewed and fermented drinks; but, on the other hand, it should be remembered that the general improvement of public sentiment which must attend the long and earnest agitation of the subject before even this proposition will become a part of the law of the land will strengthen the hands of those who oppose the intemperate use of the milder intoxicating beverages.

The third section relates to the first, and is designed to keep this proposition so long as there is a foe to alcohol in it, and to save every advantage ever gained until ratification is an accomplished fact. It cannot be expected that this great work will be accomplished in one year, or five; but if, in 1890, the amendment is not ratified, then it is to go into effect ten years after its ratification, whenever that devoutly to be wished consummation is realized. Every position gained will be held. Whatever question might arise from lapse of time as to the continued pendency of the proposition before the American people, or as to the power which has been claimed of a State to withdraw its assent to an amendment at any time before ratification by the constitutional three-fourths of the States, is entirely obviated by the distinct provision of the pending proposition itself.

If this Congress, or if any subsequent Congress, will submit this proposed amendment to the people of the country for action, there will never be necessity for another plan of battle. Whenever this one is carried out the victory will be complete. There can be no such thing as repulse, as the loss of strategic points or of defeat just as victory begins to dawn.

The language employed in stating the

for which the manufacture and traffic would still legally exist is, I think, as broad and comprehensive as any which can be devised and at the same time secure the object of the amendment. The term arts includes cooking and all the common, useful, industrial, and preservative purposes which are known and practiced by the people, as well as the fine arts and the more intricate and recondite processes of the laboratory. The term medicinal must cover every occasion for the use of alcohol as a remedy for physical infirmity, whether of man or beast, and I think the statement of specific excepted uses and purposes for which production and traffic may be continued better than the mere prohibition thereof for use as a "beverage." The medicinal use is necessarily sometimes as a beverage, although the proper use as a beverage is always medicinal. Possibly it would follow that the prohibition of the use as a beverage might interfere with its medicinal application in some cases. In all the statutes which I have seen the choice of terms is between the word "beverage," on the one hand, leaving the article to unrestricted use for all other purposes, and a general prohibition for all purposes, with exception only of those recognized cases of necessity which being definitely known could be provided for, and thus the abuses which might arise in the other method of statement be avoided.

THE SECOND SECTION EXPRESSLY GUARDS, and in some respects increases, the jurisdiction of the States as it now exists over the subject-matter, and negatives any license of the traffic by implication until the ratification of the proposed amendment. True, there could be no real license implied by the proposal of this amendment to the States, but it might be construed as a denial by Congress of the right of the States to regulate or suppress the traffic to the extent which they are now conceded to possess that power. It further contains a concession by Congress of power to the States and Territories to suppress the manufacture, transportation, and sale of all liquors, and to exclude them from State and territorial limits, which they have never yet exercised to my knowledge. Whether this would have the force of law as against existing constitutional rights may not be a serious question, but it would probably prevent any interference by legislation on the part of Congress with any action on the part of the States or Territories, unless it should clearly be required by the Constitution as it now exists. Whatever powers the National Government now possesses, such as the right to abrogate or regulate the traffic in the District of Columbia and in the Territories, and to make its exclusion forever from the Territories a part of their fundamental law, and to impose such a condition as inseparable to their admission as States, are expressly reserved. At the same time all the rights which any one engaged in the traffic now has under State laws are carefully preserved to him so long as his State shall not see fit to interfere with him; at least until the first section takes effect, and that does not interfere with fermented liquors at all.

The amendment carefully preserves the police power of the State over the whole subject by providing that Congress shall enforce it only in case of needful legislation. It is designed to leave the whole matter, concurrently with the General Government, still in the power of the States respectively, contemplating no interference with local machinery and methods unless it should become imperatively necessary; and it is not probable that much active interference by the National Government would ever be required. As, in the vindication of the great rights of the American citizen, legislation, the courts, their processes, and the ministerial officers of the States are generally sufficient to protect, so in this matter the fact that the broad ægis of the Constitution protected the American people from the curse of this traffic would secure the ample enforcement of its beneficent provisions by local authorities throughout the land.

Nor can there be any valid objection to this legislation based upon the doctrine of

for the Constitution now asserts and exercises the power to substantially control or thwart the police power of the States by rendering nugatory their efforts to regulate and suppress the evil. The police powers of the States are thus really nullified or abridged in a most important, nay a matter of vital, concern. The deadliest foe of social happiness and public order is placed under the protection of the national Constitution, and the State must subordinate its process to the rights of rum, protected by the national power. This amendment proposes to repeal those restrictions upon the rights of States to govern themselves, and substitute provisions in harmony with the tendencies of enlightened State legislation and the interests of society, and thus it proposes to re-inforce the police power of the States acting for the public good. This certainly at the worst is no greater restriction of the powers of the States than now exists in the Constitution by virtue of the protection given to the liquor interests against which the States, so many of them, wage war. And it is difficult to see why an advocate of State's rights should be satisfied with the Constitution as it is, and then complain when it is proposed to change the Constitution so as to give the States still greater power to restrict and control an evil over which but for this Constitution the States would have absolute power.

It seems to me that this is a sufficient reply to those who, claiming that they desire to suppress the evil, object to an increase of State power for that purpose. If the real difficulty is that the objector would relieve the liquor traffic of all legal disabilities, whether State or national, then this view of States' rights will not be satisfactory. He will then be satisfied with no constitutional amendment which does not destroy all "police power," State or national, to interfere with the evils of alcoholic intemperance. "States' rights" is a term too much abused in these latter days, and honest men should examine well the motives and pretenses of those who appeal to prejudices engendered by controversies which, with their causes, are vanished away. We certainly are a nation to such extent that a vast evil which contaminates the atmosphere of the continent can be assailed with national power, especially when it can be reached successfully in no other way, and the method proposed leaves to the States the execution of the great work if they will perform it in their own self-chosen way.

I deem it important to offer some observations upon the policy and efficiency of the

as applied to the suppression of the alcoholic evil. It is not seldom claimed that the policy of prohibition by law does not diminish the consumption of intoxicating drinks; that human nature resents interference with personal freedom; that legal restriction becomes a nullity, and in the end drunkenness and its attendant evils are increased; that the public conscience becomes hardened, and the sense of obligation to obey the laws of the land is blunted, so that the "last state of that man (and nation) is worse than the first." It will be observed, however, as a rule, that this argument is seldom advanced by those whose interests or principles incline them even so far as to the use of "moral suasion," as it is termed, to extirpate the evils of intemperance. As a rule, restrictive laws are opposed by the class of people who never resort to moral suasion themselves, and who stand in need of both legal and moral suasion to counteract the tendency of either their own interests or appetites or both. How sincerely these people believe in their position that restrictive laws which they oppose increase the evil upon which they thrive, every one is to judge for himself. But there are a few who honestly entertain that opinion. True that no law is operative except as it is made so by public opinion, but the enactment of an evidently wise and necessary law should often precede in order that it may assist in forming public opinion. Every step forward necessarily precedes and draws along the car of progress. Legislators are supposed to be selected because they are wiser than the mass of those for whom they make laws; but of what use are they if, having more wisdom, they are never to exercise it until moral suasion has raised the virtue of the people so high that the evil has disappeared and consequently the laws are unnecessary?

Laws presuppose something wrong to be prohibited, and it does not follow that they are to be repealed (or even not enacted) simply because the sentiment of a particular or even of the general community, for the time being, may not properly execute them. Agitation and the effort to enforce a good law, by demonstrating its wisdom and the blessings which flow from its enforcement, will create a public opinion which ultimately will make the law generally operative. Probably there is no criminal law whatever which is enforced in one-half the instances of its infraction. Should the law against theft, arson, burglary, forgery, and other crimes therefore be repealed? There was a condition of society, as man has progressed from the savage to the enlightened state, when there was no public conscience which took cognizance of any of these crimes. Wise legislators prescribed laws in advance of public opinion, and by their enforcement educated their peoples to a higher life and more complete acquiescence in the law. But it is said that the enforcement of laws with us depends upon the juries of the country; so it does; they are the judges of the fact. Therefore they should be impartial. And does any one believe that when a jury is selected with as complete freedom from bias as if selected for the trial of the charge of murder there would be any more difficulty in punishing that crime against society which occasions the perpetration of more than three-fourths of the murders? You inquire of every juryman upon his oath whether he is in favor of capital punishment before he is selected to pass upon a question which involves the life of his fellow-man. That man is disqualified to be a juror who does not believe in the law. In the same way ascertain his opinion as to the enforcement of restraining laws against intemperance, and thus secure an impartial jury by putting each member of the panel upon his conscience, and there is no trouble in enforcing the law.

But I do not design to follow out this train of thought. I wish to recall attention to the fact that there is no difference in principle, but only in the degree of its application, between laws which restrain and those which totally prohibit the use of intoxicating liquors, so that the question lies open only between those who would have some law and those who would have no law whatever upon the subject. Now, there is no civilized people, and I venture the assertion that there never was one, where seriously intoxicating liquors have existed which have not found it absolutely impossible to preserve the structure of society without legal restriction. Certainly there has been none in modern times, and there is none to-day so far as I know.

I wish to cite one or two instances in the recent history of the Anglo-Saxon race.

IN THE SENATE DEBATE

of last session, page 584 of the RECORD, Senator Morrill, now the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, said:

We had almost this identical question as early as 1795, when the country was in the dilemma of a large national debt. When the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Hamilton, was casting about for the means of sustaining the public credit, one of the methods resorted to was the identical thing we are doing now; that is, to raise a revenue upon the importation and distillation of alcoholic drinks, accompanied also by a system of licenses for the retail sale of alcoholic drinks so manufactured in this country or imported from abroad. Therefore it becomes of the utmost importance to inquire what was the effect of that policy upon the morals of the people. How did it come about that about that period we came to be denominated a nation of drunkards? How was it that it was generally asserted, and is a matter of history to-day, that the American Colonies at the close of the war, and for the two decades afterward, drank more liquor per capita than any other people upon the face of the globe? It has usually been accounted for from the pernicious effects of the war. * * * but it was not the prime cause. Whoever will take the pains to look into our history will find that more than all things together it sprang from the policy of raising a revenue out of the distillation of alcoholic drinks, and the Government taking into its own hands the retail trade of the country in alcoholic and intoxicating drinks.

In 1795 the number of wine licenses was 3,253, of spirit licenses 7,461. The amount of duties $54,731. In 1800 the Secretary's report says: "Of the proceeds of those duties more than $500,000 arise from tax on distillation, $372,000 of which are paid on 22,000 country stills, scattered over the immense territory of the United States. Sixty-five thousand dollars are the product of 13,000 retailers' licenses, all grown up in a single decade."

Senator Morrill then cites the experience of England, which was the same as ours, and after depicting the terrible results in powerful language, he says:

That is the history of it, and it is as natural as for water to run down hill. It must be so. Whenever the Government lends its moral countenance to, and encourages the importation and the production, of course you cannot, Senators will see that it is impossible to, control the sale. It becomes popular, it is taken out of the ban at once, and it increases everywhere. That, I think, is the historical account in this country and elsewhere. It is the natural, it is the irresistible effect I do not know the amount of crooked whisky, but I should suppose the distillation was not less than 100,000,000 gallons at least—for a people of 40,000,000, besides all that is imported from abroad. What becomes of it? * * * The statistics show beyond all controversy, if anything has ever been made clear by statistics, that three-fourths of the pauperism is attributable directly and indirectly to intoxicating drinks; and three-fourths of the crime to the same cause. Just contemplate that statement, and then see whether the government of a country that raises its revenues by the encouragement of the distillation of such an agency as that has no connection with it. Why, sir, more than all other agencies combined is the terrible effect of alcoholic drinks upon the health and morals and prosperity of this people. It is the gigantic crime of crimes in this age, and particularly in this country.

I would earnestly call attention to the able debate in the Senate from which this is taken, and in which several of the most distinguished men of the nation participated. The result was the passing of the resolution for a committee of inquiry elsewhere referred to.

in the adoption of the beer law and in other instances is exactly similar to that of the United States. The removal of restrictions and countenance of the business by the Government expands the evil just as naturally and inevitably as the removal of the dam lets out the water behind it.

Prohibition has been more honestly and thoroughly tried in the State of Maine than anywhere else in America or Europe, except perhaps in Mohammedan countries, where both religion and law enforce total abstinence.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE, when attorney-general of that State, writes to Hon. Neal Dow as follows:

I can and do, from my own personal observation, unhesitatingly affirm that the consumption of intoxicating liquors in Maine is not to-day one-fourth as great as it was twenty years ago; that in the country portions of the State the sale and use have almost entirely ceased; that the law itself, under a vigorous enforcement of its provisions, has created a temperance sentiment which is marvelous, and to which opposition is powerless. In my opinion our remarkable temperance reform of to-day is the legitimate child of the law.

To this high and emphatic testimony to the fact that prohibition does prohibit, I wish to add this evidence from the inexorable figures of the which contrasts the systems of prohibition and stringent license; and if such are the comparative results between these, what would be the consequence of the removal of all restrictions save only as moral suasion might oppose the whirlwinds and tornadoes of universal ruin with the gentle putterings of the mellow-voiced philanthropist?

	Maine.	New Jersey.
Barkeepers	72	338
Restaurants	280	1,380
Liquors and wines	36	665
Brewers and malsters	25	573
Distillers and rectifiers	8	43

In Maine the keepers of restaurants do not sell liquors, while in New Jersey they almost universally do. "Liquors and wines" in Maine refers to State liquor agents. The population of Maine was 626,915; that of New Jersey was 906,096.

In November, 1867, Massachusetts repealed her prohibitory liquor law. In his message to the Legislature, January, 1869, the governor said:

The increase of drunkenness and crime during the last six months, as compared with the same period of 1867, is very marked and decisive as to the operation of the law. The State prisons, jails, and houses of correction are being rapidly filled, and will soon require enlarged accommodations if the commitments continue to increase as they have since the present law (a license law) went into force.

Although this amendment does not propose to interfere with the fermented liquors any further than to remit their management more fully to the several States, it not being believed by me to be sufficiently clear that the prohibition of the manufacture and use of such liquors should be attempted by national enactment, so long as public sentiment is so considerable in favor of their beneficent effect when properly used, and in consideration of the comparatively small injury and danger which arise from their abuse, yet upon the question of the actual effect of prohibitory laws upon the traffic the statistics of the trade in fermented drinks are as logically illustrative as in case of distilled liquors. Take then the testimony of the brewers themselves. In the fifteenth annual report of the United States Brewers' Association, held at Cincinnati, June 1875, they passed these resolutions:

Resolved, That where restrictive prohibitory enactments exist, every possible measure be taken to oppose, resist, and repeal them.

And it is further resolved, That politicians favoring prohibitory enactments, who offer themselves as candidates for office, be everywhere strenuously opposed, and the more so if it be found that their personal habits do not conform to their public profession.

In an address before the convention it was stated:

Very severe is the injury which the brewers have received in the so-called temperance States.

Then follow data from various States proving the assertion.

This testimony shows the hollow insincerity of the absurd pretense that prohibitory laws do not tend to eradicate the evils of intemperance. Legal prohibition and moral suasion operate like the law of Moses and the Gospel of Christ. They act and react upon and fulfill each other. And to assert that law does not destroy this evil and therefore there should be no law, is to assert that there should be law against no evil whatever, since not one based upon the abuse of any appetite or passion of man has ever yet been absolutely extirpated. Doubtless the appetite for stimulants will always seek gratification by excess; but society can protect itself against the evils of that excess only by the most strenuous measures to remove alcohol, that terrific agency which the last two hundred years has brought into such common use that its blasting power over the fairest regions and highest civilizations of earth has become the bane of both, and threatens with destruction the future of the race. So far as the United States are concerned, (the people of each State dealing with it as they please,) even then there will remain alcohol in its fermented forms which were the most powerful used for five thousand five hundred years, and in this form alcohol was the curse and calamity of mankind. Evasions of this law as of all other laws will take place, and there need be no sentimental refinement upon the practical loss of any right which a confirmed toper may desire to cherish for his own personal comfort. Sources of gratification though limited will still be found. But it is to be hoped that something would be accomplished for the mass of our fellow-men, and particularly for those innocent ones to whom the great future belongs, and toward whom he that would bequeath to them the awful inheritance of drunken woe which is amassed and increasing daily on American soil, must be a brute indeed.

THEORIES OF PERSONAL LIBERTY, ETC.

There is a theory of personal liberty which, sanctioned by the great names of and of Von Humboldt and others of less distinction, has been advanced as the insuperable objection to all legislation which strikes at the use of alcohol as a beverage.

Mill, in his work on Civil Liberty, pages 170 to 173, thus states that theory in his vigorous way:

There are in our own day gross usurpations upon the liberty of private life actually practiced and still greater ones threatened with some expectations of success; and opinions proposed which assert an unlimited right in the public not only to prohibit by law everything which it thinks wrong, but in order to get at what it thinks wrong to prohibit any number of things which it admits to be innocent.

Under the name of preventing intemperance the people of one English colony, and of nearly one-half the United States, have been interdicted by law from making any use whatever of fermented drinks except for medicinal purposes; for prohibition of their sale is in fact, as it is intended to be, prohibition of their use. The infringement complained of is not on the liberty of the seller, but on that of the buyer and consumer; since the state might just as well forbid him to drink wine as purposely make it impossible for him to obtain it.

Governor Andrew cites this passage, and so do defenders of the traffic generally, as decisive authority upon the subject, and it is doubtless the highest that he can cite. The common sense of the American people would, however, hardly accept without question all the social, economic, religious, or irreligious theories of Mr. Mill, and I respectfully demur to any theory which results in the ruin of my fellow-men. By their fruits shall ye know them. That is the only rule by which a practical legislator has any right to test the theories of great or of little men.

But what does even Mill himself say? He asserts, in the first place, what is a positive error, so far as the grounds of this amendment are concerned. I do not assert the right in order to get at what I think wrong, "to prohibit any number of things which I admit to be right." By no means whatever. I admit the manufacture, importation, and use of alcohol in the form of distillation for certain necessary purposes, and for them only, to be legitimate, and convenient, if not necessary, entitled to protection and subject to regulation by law only for purposes of taxation like other property and to prevent its application to other dangerous and destructive uses which injure and often ruin mankind. The right to regulate the legitimate use and to prevent the abuse is just exactly the same right which government has to protect every man in the use of fire for his happiness, and to prohibit both himself and others from using it as the agent of wanton destruction to the lives and property of society at large. No more, no less. Alcohol is a poison, which may be put to good uses. When an individual puts this poison to a bad use the law has the right to interfere, and those who make it have the right to enact the law so that it may interfere; to prohibit not "any number of things which it admits to be innocent," but the use of an active means of self and social destruction. Thus it is clear that Mr. Mill, if he means us, has misconceived his form of action and must either bring a new suit or abandon his case.

But he goes on to illustrate and apply what he means by his general proposition above stated. He says "the use of fermented liquors has been interdicted except for medicinal use," &c. But this amendment does not intermeddle with their use at all. It is not designed to. It is not designed to raise that difficult question upon which mankind is divided. True, it increases the police power of the States over them indirectly, but not in a way to restrict their use unless public sentiment of the State requires it. This is done by an increase of the power of internal State police. It is a surrender of national power. It is a concession to the States of a power of interstate and foreign commerce. It only strikes at what all, or nearly all, men concede to be a most terrible national evil which ought to be suppressed and which cannot be effectually regulated except by a national prohibition, which must take the form of an amendment to the Constitution. I am sure that it will be conceded that the citation from Mr. Mill is irrelevant.

BARON VON HUMBOLDT

is also quoted by Governor Andrew and others. See his Sphere and Duties of Government, page 171, where he says:

The State may content itself with exercising the most watchful vigilance of every unlawful project and defeating it before it has been put into execution; or, advancing further, it may prohibit actions which are harmless in themselves, but which tempt to the commission of crimes or afford opportunity for resolving upon criminal actions. This latter policy again tends to encroach on the liberty of the citizens; manifests a distrust on the part of the State which not only operates hurtfully on the character of the citizens but goes to defeat the very end in view. All that the State may do without frustrating its own end, and without encroaching on the freedom of its citizens, is therefore restricted to the former course; that is, the strictest surveillance of every transgression of the law, either already committed or only resolved on; and as this cannot properly be called preventing the causes of crime, I think I may safely assert that this prevention of criminal actions is wholly foreign to the State's proper sphere of activity.

The essence of all this seems to be in the concluding idea, viz: that the State cannot legislate by imposing burdens or restrictions upon the individual, the object of which is to prevent the causes of crime. Well, supposing this to be so, does it reach the foundations of legislation restricting the evils resulting from the use of intoxicating liquors? Obviously not, unless those evils are simply causes of crime. But those evils embrace not merely crime against the individual and society at large, but physical degeneration of the individual and of the species, insanity, idiocy, pauperism, every form and degree of misery, taxation, public burdens of every kind, poverty, starvation, accident and frightful casualties, ignorance, and death.

Now many of these effects of the wrongful use of distilled spirits exist independently as distinct and most deplorable public evils, and would do so even though they did not so often culminate in every sort of crime. But this proposition of Humboldt's covers the case of causes of crime alone, and if legislation for the prevention of these evils is not within the power of the State, then I am at loss to see what forms of preventive legislation are possible. The doctrine is universal license and anarchy, if it is to be understood to cover the ground which is claimed for it. It not only abolishes the old truth, which, however homely in its expression, is the basis of the great mass of the laws to which society owes its happiness and all hope of future improvement—that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. Cannot legislate to prevent the causes of crime without violating personal liberty! Then personal liberty, which does not include the right to commit crime, does include the right to cause it to be committed. But the great Humboldt is misquoted, for observe the confusion of thought and the utter nonsense of his language if it is to be construed as covering this case. I revere his intellectual power, but there is only one God, and the man who undertakes to construct a universe or a Kosmos will not always manifest the attributes of the Almighty. He says "that the State is restricted to the strictest surveillance of every transgression of the law, either already committed or only resolved upon." But this is a question of the original enactment—the creation of a law, not of its violation or of its enforcement. Shall there be any law at all upon the subject? What is a crime in the only sense with which we have anything to do? Why, it is the violation of an existing law; doing what is already forbidden or failing to do that which is enjoined; or, in Mr. Webster's own words: "An omission of a duty which is commanded, or the commission of an act which is forbidden by law." So far as government is concerned there can be no crime, and therefore no causes of crime until there is a law, the violation of which is all that constitutes crime.

Now the question between alcohol and its opponent is whether there shall be any law at all, and the answer to that question depends altogether upon the consequences which the unrestricted use of alcohol exerts upon mankind. Does it or does it not produce such evils in society as to require or justify its restriction by law—the creation of a law—the violation of which will be a crime? The mere fact that a drunken man is more likely to commit murder than a sober man is of course no reason why he should be punished for being drunk, unless there is a law against it. Until there is a law against it drunkenness is no crime. So if, being drunk, he commits murder, then he is to be punished because he has violated the law against taking life, not because he was drunk. Drunk or sober, then, he is to be punished for his violation of law.

But now in this debate comes this question, Is the fact that drunkenness is a state of mind and body which is so bad and dangerous a thing of itself for members of society to be in, that voluntarily getting into that state should be prohibited, and is the making and selling that stuff which tempts and makes men to get drunk for that very purpose so bad a thing that the manufacture and sale of it should be prohibited by law? And upon that point the facts I have spread out are pertinent. To do that which causes three-fourths of all the crimes known to the law should itself be made a crime. It is bad itself, and should therefore be prohibited by law. It is a question of making a new law, not of enforcing an old one. It is therefore not at all within the reasoning of Von Humboldt, and the citation as an authority falls. New laws must be made according to the times. The duty of government is ever the same: to protect society and promote the general welfare. The special laws of different nations and ages vary according to the forms in which vice presents itself, and the various agencies and forms of destruction with which society is assailed. Alcohol is the parent of nearly all the forms of misery in this age and of three-fourths of the grand aggregate of all the crimes that are known, and surely that which produces all these is a legitimate subject for regulation by law. To say that society shall not control the dram-shops which line our streets is to say that any man has the right to plant Pennsylvania avenue with torpedoes and drape Broadway with old clothes from the pest-houses, because the torpedo and old clothes are property and a legitimate subject of barter and sale; and that because the torpedo and garments have their uses when they preserve a people and promote the general welfare, for that reason they may be used to destroy the nation and people which they were designed to preserve.

THE FALLACY IS HERE.

It is assumed that because alcohol may be manufactured and sold for some purposes, it follows that it therefore must be permitted for all. This is not so. Some things are beneficial in every form and way in which they are appropriated to the service of mankind. Other things have uses for which they are necessary and beneficial, and again their appropriation may be disastrous to society; and when they become so society, through the law, must protect itself. All laws restrict personal liberty when that much-abused term is used in the sense of license. I do not think it important to call further attention to the ipse dixit of theorists whose conclusions have been contradicted by experience and rejected by good sense wherever mankind have existed under the dominion of law. But the constitutionality of prohibitory or restrictive laws in the States has been settled by all the courts of the country; and I have previously endeavored to show that the right to license one man is the right to restrict all others, and implies the right to totally restrict when the public good requires. The general proposition is that the States have this power; that it should be extended and exercised over the whole country in the only way in which it effectually can be, by an amendment of the Constitution of the country giving concurrent power to the nation to make the prohibition general and efficient whenever isolated States shall fail.

I desire to cite a few sentences from the opinions of

of this country in the celebrated license cases. These cases were argued by Daniel Webster, Rufus Choate, B. F. Hallett, John P. Hale, and others, in favor of the licensees; and by very able counsel on the other side. I believe that the opinions are considered by the profession as very able and well considered. The court was unanimous, and most of the judges delivered separate though according opinions. The cases are reported in 5 Howard, 504–633.

Judge Taney says, page 576:

The laws of Congress regulating foreign commerce authorize the importation of spirits, distilled liquors and brandy, in casks or vessels not containing less than a certain quantity specified in the laws upon this subject. Now if the State laws in question come in collision with those acts of Congress and prevented or obstructed the importation or sale of these articles by the importer in the original cask or vessel in which they were imported, it would be the duty of this court to declare them void.

On page 577:

If any State deems the retail and internal traffic in ardent spirits injurious to its citizens and calculated to produce idleness, vice, and debauchery, I see nothing in the Constitution of the United States to prevent it from regulating and restraining the traffic or from prohibiting it altogether if it thinks proper.

On page 579:

It appears to me to be very clear that the mere grant of power to the General Government cannot upon any just principles of construction be construed to be an absolute prohibition to the exercise of any power over the same subject by the States.

I call attention to the language in italics as also bearing upon the nature of the concurrent and co-operative jurisdiction which this amendment proposes to give, both to the States and the nation, over the subject-matter of distilled liquors.

Judge McLean, on pages 588 and following, says:

The license laws of Massachusetts are essentially police laws; enactments similar in principle are common to all the States. A great moral reform which enlisted the judgments and excited the sympathies of the public has given notoriety to this course of legislation and extended it lately beyond its former limit. The acknowledged police power of a State extends often to the destruction of property. A nuisance may be abolished. Everything prejudicial to the health or morals of a city may be removed; merchandise from a port where a contagious disease prevails being liable to communicate the disease may be excluded and in extreme cases may be thrown into the sea. It is a power essential to self-preservation, and exists necessarily in every organized community. It is indeed a law of nature, and is possessed by man in his individual capacity. He may resist that which does him harm, whether he be assailed by an assassin or approached by poison. And it is the settled construction of every regulation of commerce that under the sanction of its general laws no person can introduce into a community malignant diseases or any thing which contaminates its morals or endangers its safety. Individuals in the enjoyment of their own rights must be careful not to injure the rights of others. From the explosive nature of gunpowder, a city may exclude it. * * * These are acts of self-preservation. * * * In the progress of population, of wealth, and civilization, new and vicious indulgences spring up, which require restraints which can only be imposed by legislative power.

Judge Woodbury says, page 630:

After articles have come within the territorial limits of States, whether on land or water, the destruction itself of what constitutes disease and death, and the longer continuance of such articles, or the terms and conditions of their continuance, when conflicting with their legitimate police, or with their power over internal commerce, or with their right of taxation over all persons and property within their jurisdiction, seems one of the first principles of State sovereignty and indispensable to public safety.

It would be easy, sir, to multiply authority from all the courts of the country, which assert, I think, with unvarying uniformity, the power of the State to control absolutely the use of alcohol, subject only to the protection given it by the Constitution of the United States, the extent to which it shall be exerted being purely a matter of expediency, while against this power and its exercise can be found nothing but the speculations of writers whose theories are either untenable or inapplicable to this or perhaps any other state of society which can arise until the millennium shall abolish all law by the absolute extirpation of evil from among men.

IN RECAPITULATION AND CONCLUSION, SIR,

I only wish further to say that by the indulgence of the House I have thus at great but I hope not at unnecessary length endeavored to call the attention of Congress and of the country to the vast and increasing public evils which exist in the land, whose origin lies in the excessive use of that most powerful poison known as alcohol. I have not dealt in specific instances but in masses of fact as they have been gathered and accumulated here and there by the statistician, the census-taker, the official investigator, and most of all by that noble profession which comprises so many of the ablest and best of men—a profession whose theory is the gospel of man's physical and mental nature, and whose practice is philanthropy applied to the details of all human woe—the medical profession, which by its researches in the chemical world and its incessant and protracted pursuit of the recondite origin of disease and of the philosophy of suffering and despair, as well as of the sources of vigor and hope and happiness to mankind, has placed civilization under the largest debt that is due to any of the learned orders of society; that profession, sir, has not failed to stamp upon alcohol the mark of Cain among poisons. It is the murderer of men. That noble profession has brought it to the doors of the Capitol, and charged it with the wholesale death of our people. They assail it as the pestilence which walketh in the darkness and which wasteth in the noon-day—as the parent of every crime, as the cup of misery ever full; the prolific source of ignorance, poverty, squalor, idiocy, insanity in all its dreadful forms, personal ruin, social destruction, national ruin—the prime agency of hell on the earth. And with them come all classes and conditions of men. These are not witnesses whose testimony can be denied or gainsaid. I will not speak of woman in rags and disheveled hair, with her wan cheek and hollow voice, nor of her children shivering on the corners of the street, starving within the shadow of churches built to the Most High with the price of their blood. It is not fitting here to be sentimental, nor would I attempt it if permitted. The gravity of the occasion has passed beyond all necessity of resort to touching tales and strokes of pathetic imagery. The evil is before us. Its infinite extent must be admitted. There is nothing to be considered but the remedy and its application. I have endeavored to present one that seems to me to have been born of hope.

This measure is not proposed by any party that now exists. I trust that it will encounter opposition from no party whatever. It has been prepared with the knowledge of scarcely any one. I am alone responsible for it. It is not the project of "temperance men," as they are sometimes called, whether derisively or otherwise. On the contrary, mistaking its true character and misconceiving its far-reaching consequences, and its avoidance of conflict with the interests and passions of the present time, "temperance men" have complained that it is an evasion of the conflict. I fear that fifteen years of agitation will convince such of us as may then be alive that this objection does not recognize the great power of existing forces which must be overcome. It should be remembered that no battle is won until the enemy is driven from his position. He is now intrenched in the Constitution of this country. The battle may go on as it has gone on for fifty years, without one single blow being struck at the manufacture of alcohol. And as hitherto "men may come and men may go" and thousands may continue to fall on either side, yet the battle remain forever undecided, because the struggle, however violent, is renewed forever by the recruits of successive generations. There is no concentration of forces upon the main position. Effort is lost because misdirected. Much of it, to be sure, is not wholly lost. Moral suasion—that is, argument and precept and exhortation, from the pulpit, the rostrum, the press, and private admonition—molds public opinion and accomplishes wonders for individual men, but it lacks the powerful re-enforcement of national law. That it can never get until it asks for and demands it. This revolution in national law can be wrought only by years or agitation and effort. Local sentiment must be awakened almost everywhere; in at least two-thirds of the country existing opinion must be reversed before the Constitution of the country in this respect can be changed. Meanwhile each State retains all the power it now has over both fermented and distilled liquors, and as soon as this measure has been ratified there would be conferred upon the States largely increased control over both. Discussion and effort would demand the attention of the nation as such, and a concentration of the whole army upon a comprehensive plan of battle to carry the citadel would be substituted for isolated and sporadic warfare. And when the battle is once gained it is won for all time. This form of effort is infinitely the best way in which to accomplish local reform. The facts and arguments upon which the temperance reform is based are the same, whether urged to influence the action of the individual, the local opinion, or Legislature of a single State, or the nation at large; and the modification of the national Constitution involves that universal local effort and the creation of that public sentiment everywhere which will result in the enactment and enforcement of prohibitory State and territorial laws.

Temperance men object because the first clause of this amendment if adopted does not become operative until 1900. They fear that they will die without the sight. So they may, but how can they object until they have tried to see whether they can obtain even this? Consider the past. Be admonished by history. Do not lose everything by attempting the impracticable. Remember that this is an effort to procure the enactment of a law, which must carry the heads and hearts of conservative jurists, of dignified and unconvinced legislators, and the popular vote. This is a different thing from enthusing a popular assembly under the magnetism of Mr. Gough. Do not forget either that it is to be the act of the nation; that, however it may be as between God and alcohol, however it may be between the maker of alcohol and the higher law, yet we as a nation have assured the maker and dealer in liquor that he might vest his capital in permanent forms, that he might manufacture this article for all purposes whatever, and that we would protect him in the enjoyment of his capital and the production of his still. We take from his industry yearly vast sums in the way of taxation for the support of the Government. True this legalized destruction of national wealth infinitely transcends the advantage of the tax, but nevertheless we have legalized the traffic for a century.

Now have we as a nation any right at once to destroy his industry and turn the distiller and his family upon the street to starve? Is he not entitled to reasonable notice of the change in the national policy, that he may gradually divert his capital and turn his business capacity in some other direction and train his son in some other employment? And if this view does not strike you with force, then consider the further fact that there are more than $500,000,000, probably $1,000,000,000 vested in this traffic to-day in the United States, and that such an interest will for many years to come have sufficient power to defeat any measure which destroys it at once.

But liquor makers and sellers are men. Great numbers of them are respectable and honest men. I have no sympathy with the wholesale denunciation of them as a criminal class. Many of them recognize the dreadful consequences which flow from the business in which they are engaged; yet it is a lawful business; circumstances over which often they have no control have identified them with it just as others have found their way into the pulpit, into Congress, or into other avocations of life. It is no more just to denounce them as cold-hearted villains, intent upon nothing but the destruction of mankind, than it is to assail the personal integrity of every man who ever owned a slave. If approached in a proper spirit with a proposed reform in which they should be recognized as men and invited and urged upon considerations which must influence any humane being, and which would give them a chance to save themselves and their families, I believe that the actual co-operation of many liquor makers and sellers could be secured.

Since the introduction of this resolution it has been attacked as a palpable effort to curry favor with the prohibitory sentiment of the country and at the same time avoid offense to the "beer element." It is no such thing. This measure is not of that radical nature to command the vehement approbation of what are known as prohibitory men, though it must and I trust will command increasingly their approval. But the question of the manufacture and use of fermented liquors is left where it now is, with the States, because it is medically still an open question whether the restricted use of such liquors is not beneficial to the people, although their use is fast becoming excessive and an abuse. But there is very slight difference of opinion as to the destructive tendency of distilled liquors as administered by the "laity," and all agree that the great mass of the evils of intemperance arise from their manufacture and use as a beverage. And if the ban of the law can be placed upon the manufacture and use of distilled alcoholic liquors as a beverage, the minor abuses resulting from fermented liquors can well be left wholly to the restraining powers of the States, as enlarged by the second clause of the proposed amendment. While by no means of a callous organization, I certainly do not complain of criticism which attacks my personal motives, some of which has been brought to my attention. Those motives are not relevant to the measure itself. And whatever may be said by others I am consoled by the consciousness that this step is taken after long reflection, that my motives are satisfactory to myself, and that they will be judged by the only Tribunal to whom they can be surely known and whose approval is of much consequence.

The opposition of the consumer to any national measure which should at once deprive him of his beverage would be found to be very serious and I fear decisive. But there is no class of men who have a stronger desire to see their children saved from the chains which hold them to their own dreadful doom than the drunkards of this country. This measure has been sneered at as a proposed reform—for posterity. So it is; and as such it ought and I think will enlist the overwhelming force of parental feeling in its favor whenever the public mind has studied its peculiar features and elements of strength.

I think that existing parties may well hesitate to oppose this measure. The cause it represents is one of moral reform, and it must be re-inforced by legislation. In due time it will be. If neither of the great parties now dividing the country sees fit to antagonize it, this measure will force its way without being made the source and object of political strife. Becoming operative so long in the future, it ought not to provoke the opposition of any political organization, and all men should be able to consider this subject calmly and to decide it upon its merits. If it is a measure enlisting the moral convictions and humane sentiments of the people, and especially of that nucleus of able, conscientious, and aggressive men who are ultimately the ruling power in every progressive nation, although for years they may struggle on fighting and dying under the banner of defeat, it will be well for all parties that would live to beware how they oppose this proposition. At least let it have fair consideration by the House and the country, for it is a subject which will have consideration. It is not a ghost, nor will it "down." I ask for it the considerate attention of all men now, for the time is coming when it will be forced upon them. The political exigency which absorbs and distracts the country will pass away, but this evil will not pass away. Its extirpation will be imperiously demanded long after the question of the succession to the Presidency shall have been settled whether by peace or by war. Public men will be destroyed who touch it, but the cause will survive. Stronger arms will uphold and advance the banner until victory floats on its ample folds; and the Constitution of the country shall yet become the pledge of sobriety and temperance among the people, the ally of virtue, and not the charter of this great source of ignorance, misery, and crime.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. C. J. FAULKNER,

OF WEST VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 24, 1877,

On the report of the select committee upon the privileges, powers, and duties of the House of Representatives in counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. Speaker, concurring as I do in the report which the Committee on the Judiciary has made on the powers and privileges of this House in counting the electoral vote—a subject now under our consideration—and believing that the people of my district and State feel a deep interest in the questions herein involved, I regard it a duty to give some expression to my opinions on this subject. I am not surprised that a very painful sense of anxiety should be felt at the clouds which already darken and which seem to be still gathering over our political horizon. We stand in the presence of one of those dangers which seem to be incident to the very structure of our Government, and which, as we may pass through it, peaceably or otherwise, must increase or impair confidence in the value of our free institutions.

Standing, then, in the presence of such events, I should regard myself criminal, if I sought, by the use of any intemperate or inflammatory language, to add to the excitement which now disturbs the tranquillity of the public mind. The occasion is too solemn for the display of any angry or vindictive partisan feeling. Yet I have my convictions of the duty which, at a crisis like the present, devolves upon me as a representative of the people; and I shall act up to those convictions of public duty firmly and fearlessly, leaving the results of my action to the wise and ultimate judgment of a free and intelligent people.

From the earliest foundation of our Government to the present hour, all who have had occasion to study our constitutional system have reached the conclusion that the election of a Chief Magistrate of this Republic is the experimentum crucis, or the crucial experiment of our system; that in the very nature of things it must be the source of the greatest perils to the Republic and the severest test to which our institutions can be exposed. Whether our present situation results from the intrinsic difficulties incident to the popular election of a Chief Magistrate, clothed with so much power and patronage as belongs to the office of President of the United States, or whether it results from any defect in the safeguards provided by law to secure a fair and honest expression of the popular will, it is not necessary at this time to discuss.

Mr. Calhoun, in his admirable work upon the Constitution and Government of the United States, and which I feel free here to say is one of the most striking examples of exact reasoning and of analytical power, to be found among the writings of American statesmen, has, with remarkable sagacity, foreshadowed the condition of political events which now exist in this country. He refers to the vast patronage and power vested in a single person, constituting the executive department of the Government; to the struggles which will be made by parties, through the election of a President, to get possession of this patronage and power; to the reluctance with which a party, long in possession of the offices and money of the Goverment, will surrender these advantages to its opponents; to the frauds and corruptions that may be expected to characterize this obstinate determination to retain power; to the probability of a disputed presidential succession; to the fact that the then incumbent in office may himself be a candidate for re-election or an active partisan of the organization seeking by corrupt and forcible means to retain the Government; to the probable employment of force by that incumbent to continue himself or his own party in power; and thus he proceeds to foreshadow the exchange of our republican institutions for monarchical, ending in the decay and destruction of our free Government.

We have now before us something of that condition of affairs which that eminent and reflecting statesman, more than thirty years ago, predicted as one of the consequences of a single Executive and of the growing centralization of power in the Federal Government.

We have now upon us the disputed presidential succession to which he refers; we see a party which for sixteen years has been in the absolute control of the vast power of this Government, now clinging to that power with a tenacious grasp, bold, desperate, and unscrupulous; we have witnessed the violations of law, the perpetration of frauds, and the employment of military force, which have been resorted to to perpetuate its power; we see that there is now in the executive chair a daring and successful soldier, who is in full sympathy with that party; who speaks of himself not as the President of the nation, but as the President of his party; who has already assembled a large body of troops around the Capitol of the Republic, and who has declared his purpose to increase that force if the course of events shall demand it. He openly avows his conviction (although the subject is yet under examination) that Governor Hayes has been elected President and he has announced his determination to see that he is inaugurated. If he acts up to all the declarations which are ascribed to him by interviewing reporters, he will have but one more act to perform to fill the rôle of Oliver Cromwell, and that will be to administer Colonel Pride's purge to the Representatives of the people by the expulsion of every democratic member by armed force from his seat. Nor does this seem to be altogether an imaginary event; for we are daily informed through the unrebuked columns of the National Republican, the leading organ of the Administration in Washington City, that, should the democratic House of Representatives refuse to join the Senate in counting the electoral vote in the mode prescribed by that body and should the House hold a session of its own, in which the Speaker shall announce that "As no President of the United States has been elected, the House will now proceed to ballot for the same," the moment this motion is made the Speaker and all who join with him in that movement "will be summarily arrested." This would indeed be the beginning of the end!

In casting our eyes over this country and in noting what has transpired within the last two months, we cannot but feel a very high degree of admiration for the good sense, marked moderation, and patriotic temper which have distinguished the American people. In what country, I will not say now upon this earth, but which ever has existed since the records of history have cast light upon their acts, has any people ever exhibited such self-control and mastery over their passions and feelings? For two months a large majority of the American people have believed that their favorite candidate has been fairly and honestly elected to the highest position of executive power in this country. And yet they have witnessed returning boards in three of the States of this Union, impelled by their own selfish interests, sustained by a powerful party, and encouraged by usurped military authority, deliberately tampering with the elections in those States and so manipulating results as to overthrow the expressed will of the people. And yet we have had no riots, no tumults, no crying "To your tents, O Israel," no organization of regiments, no marshalling of armies. During this protracted and painful suspense, the operations of business have almost ceased, and yet the people are cool, calm, and collected. In what country upon earth could such obedience to law, such calm reliance upon the ultimate triumph of right and justice, be found as in the people of the United States? Could any fact more fully establish the excellency and superiority of free institutions and the expediency of depositing with an intelligent people all the powers of government?

But let it not be supposed because there has been no outbreak of popular violence, no impatient, tumultuary assemblages threatening the peace of society, that it is thence to be inferred that the people are indifferent to the choice of their rulers or to the threatened violation of their rights. Far from it. The seeming indifference but real calmness of the public mind is to be ascribed to a conviction on their part that there is an ample remedy provided by the Constitution itself to rectify these wrongs. In other words, the people believe, as I believe, that there is a power in Congress fully adequate to meet all the exigencies of the present hour.

The facts of this case, so far as I deem it necessary to bring them to your attention, are few and easily stated. Mr. Tilden has received 184 undisputed electoral votes, lacking but one of the number necessary to elect him; and this exclusive and independent of the 19 votes of the three disputed States of South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana. I will say nothing at this time of South Carolina or Florida, neither will I at this time say more than a word or two of the Oregon fiasco. I must be allowed to say to you frankly that I take no stock in Cronin, the Oregon elector. It may be, and I think it not improbable, that Oregon has lost one of her republican electors by his ineligibility; I look not without satisfaction to the overthrow by this act of that prima facie dogma behind which the republican party has sought to intrench itself; but I can never give my consent that his minority competitor shall be substituted in his place. I think it much to be regretted that the purity of our cause should have been blemished by this attempt to give a democratic elector to a State whose popular vote was admittedly republican. I cannot at my time of life unlearn those doctrines of popular right which I was taught in my younger days. I remember when but a youth I read with extraordinary interest the contest between John Wilkes and the House of Commons of England. Wilkes was then a great popular favorite, and the cry of "Wilkes and liberty" resounded throughout that island from the hills of Cumberland to the promontory of Lands End. Wilkes was elected to the House of Commons, but he was the author of some indiscreet and objectionable publications. For these he was expelled by the government majority from the House. He was again returned by the sturdy voters of Westminster. He was again expelled, and declared ineligible to a seat in Parliament. A third election came on, and he received an overwhelming majority, while his competitor, Colonel Lutteral, received but a very small vote. The House then decided that the votes cast for Wilkes were all null and void, because cast for an ineligible candidate, and Colonel Lutteral, with his small minority vote, was adjudged entitled to a seat upon that floor. The people of England could not tamely submit to this subversion of a great elective principle, the right of the people to choose their own representatives. Parliament was dissolved, and the first act of the new House of Commons was what? To repeal, to rescind? No; but to expunge all those proceedings from its records as a violation of the fundamental principles of English liberty.

This principle has ever since been held sacred in England; and while the ineligibility of a candidate may, perhaps, in mere corporation elections, as some of the courts have decided, give the minority candidate a right to his seat, it cannot be introduced into the political elections of this country without violating the elementary and most sacred principles of our Government.

I have said that I would say nothing at this time about South Carolina and Florida, for the case of Louisiana itself affords all the facts necessary to the elucidation of my own views of my constitutional duty. In that State, which gives eight electoral votes—seven more than are necessary for the election of Mr. Tilden—it is an admitted and uncontroverted fact that Mr. Tilden's majority of the vote actually cast on the 7th of November was upward of 8,000. This is a fact denied by nobody, was testified to by all who were present at the examination of the returns in New Orleans, and is admitted without dispute by the republicans themselves. And yet the eight electoral votes of that State were cast on the 6th of December last in favor of Governor Hayes and in opposition to Governor Tilden. Upon what pretext was it that so shameless an outrage was perpetrated, not simply upon the people of Louisiana, but upon the people of West Virginia and of the entire Union? They have in that State what is called a returning board, which sits in secret conclave, and which assumes the right to disfranchise whole parishes for reasons satisfactory to itself; and proceeding to exercise that right in this particular case, it has so altered the returns of that State as not only to reverse Mr. Tilden's majority of upward of 8,000, but to give to Governor Hayes a majority of upward of 4,000. To accomplish this result, they deliberately disfranchised 13,350 democratic voters who appeared at the polls and voted on that day. No reason has been assigned to the public by the board for its arbitrary action, nor has there been any statement to show what votes were counted and what rejected. All that we are left to infer from their action is that they rejected these 13,000 democratic votes upon the false and unfounded pretext of force and intimidation employed by the democrats to prevent free suffrage by their opponents. This charge of violence and intimidation is wholly unsupported by any satisfactory testimony, the evidence being that there never was a more quiet and peaceable election in that State; never a larger number of voters at the polls, and that there had not been a riot, a tumult, nor even a fisticuffs encounter within the broad limits of that State on that day. The action of this board can only be characterized as a bold usurpation, and a fraudulent exercise of power, so reckless and daring that it would not even have been attempted had it not been distinctly understood that its action would be sustained by the military power of the United States.

We shall have a grave responsibility cast upon us as members of this House on the second Wednesday of February next if no adjustment of our pending difficulties is made before that day; and the question is, what are our duties to the people of the United States under the facts which I have just stated? Are we required, by any fair view of our duty, to count those eight electoral votes for Governor Hayes and thus defraud the people of the United States of their choice for President? Have we the constitutional right to reject those votes from the count? and if so, is it not our duty to resist this fraud, and to vindicate the purity of the election and the just rights of the people? These are, or may be, important and interesting questions at this particular crisis, and as they may lead to further complications they should be carefully considered by us all.

When something upward of two months ago, and prior to the presidential election, I made some speeches in West Virginia, I then anticipated very much what has since occurred. I then expressed my own decided opinion that the sole right of counting the electoral votes devolved, under the Constitution, upon the two Houses of Congress; that to accept a vote its acceptance must be concurred in by both the Senate and the House of Representatives; and that if either failed to concur the vote could not be counted, but must be rejected. I then said, in view of what was then going on in South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana, that, if I had satisfactory evidence before me that the votes of those States were procured by fraud or coerced by military power, I would not consent to count them, but would cast my vote for their rejection. For this declaration of my opinion I was stigmatized and denounced by the republican press of my own State and elsewhere as "a revolutionist" and "dangerous political agitator;" and yet I have not found since that those opinions were at all peculiar to me; I believe they are entertained by every democrat in this House and by some of the best intellects of the republican party in both Houses.

Let us now for a moment recur to the Constitution of the United States, and to the practice of the Government under that Constitution. The language of the Constitution is:

> The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

In construing this provision of the Constitution, two theories have been advanced. One that claims for the President of the Senate the sole and exclusive power of counting the electoral returns, treating the two Houses of Congress as mere constitutional spectators of the scene before them; the other claims that power as belonging exclusively to the Senate and House of Representatives, and regards the President of the Senate as simply a ministerial officer, designated to receive, to take charge of, to open the certificates, and to hand them over for the decision and action of the two Houses.

Without going into any minute examination of the question, I feel free to assert here that the idea of vesting in the President of the Senate the power thus claimed for him by the extremists of the republican party is not only without any authority in the language of the Constitution, but has been repudiated in the practice of this Government from our earliest history. The suggestion is of recent origin; it has sprung from the emergencies of party desperation; and it is the boldest, and, I may add, the most unauthorized assertion of unconstitutional power which has been advanced in our history. The pretension is absurd upon the face of it, not only because it would exclude the two Houses of Congress from all participation in a great act of the Government, at which they are required by the Constitution to be present, but because it would vest in the presiding officer of the Senate the right to determine the result of an election in which he might be directly and personally interested as a candidate, a fact which has already occurred six times in our history.

We have now had, prior to the one now pending, twenty-two presidential elections in this country. In every case, as the Constitution prescribes, the electoral votes have been submitted to a joint convention of the two Houses. Questions have arisen as to the rejection of the vote of States, but in not one single instance in the history of Congress has the President of the Senate claimed, or any other person claimed for him, the right to act on the acceptance or rejection of the contested vote of a State.

The most satisfactory precedent which has struck my attention in the past proceedings of Congress, and which is the most satisfactory, only because of the clearness and precision of the language used by the then presiding officer, occurred in 1805, upon the occasion of Mr. Jefferson's second election to the Presidency. I can well conceive that there was a great deal in the circumstances then surrounding the event to cause a marked observance of all the requirements of the Constitution and a strict and literal adherence to its letter and spirit. It was the first meeting of a joint convention of the two Houses subsequent to the exciting contest between Burr and Jefferson, which had so deeply agitated and convulsed the country. It was the first joint convention after the adoption of the twelfth amendment, which itself resulted from that contest and which is the law under which the recent election was held. Aaron Burr was then the President of the Senate, and as he was a man eminently distinguished for the clearness and precision of his expressions he left no doubt upon the mind of any one as to what his views were upon the subject. After alluding to the several packets which from the indorsements upon them "appeared" to be the votes of the electors, he addressed himself to the two Houses of Congress and said: "You will now proceed, gentlemen, to count the votes as the Constitution and laws direct;" which was accordingly so done by the tellers appointed by the two Houses.

I am very well aware that Vice-President Burr, who officiated at this first election after the adoption of the twelfth amendment, has not left a very savory memory in the minds of the American people; but with his known defects of character, all will admit that he was a man of the most acute and penetrating intellect, an able lawyer-a profound constitutional jurist, and the most accomplished parlia, mentarian that ever presided in the Senate. But what is of infinitely more importance than the weight of his name and authority is the fact that no single instance can be pointed out in the history of Congress, from that day to the present time, when any different construction of the respective powers of the President of the Senate and the two Houses of Congress has been asserted or practiced in any of the eighteen presidential elections which have since occurred.

There is one more incident that I will notice in connection with this subject. It occurred in my own presence in February, 1857, when I was a member of this House. A question was started as to the propriety of counting the electoral vote of Wisconsin, the electors having been prevented from meeting on the day prescribed by law by a severe snow-storm. But they met on the following day and cast the vote of that State for Frémont. Whether counted or rejected it could not affect the result of the election in the slightest degree, and not a great deal of interest was manifested on the subject. Mr. Mason, Senator from Virginia, was then acting as President of the Senate, and consequently officiated as president of the joint convention. He said nothing while in the chair that indicated a claim upon his part, as president of the convention, to decide upon the admissibility or rejection of the vote of Wisconsin; but an impression was produced upon the minds of some by the manner in which he abruptly terminated the joint convention that he held such an opinion. As soon as he was advised of these impressions, he availed himself of the earliest moment to disavow any such opinion and to repudiate all such authority on the part of the President of the Senate. I have alluded to this case because the conduct of Mr. Mason on that occasion has been misunderstood and misrepresented by those who sought to find in him an authority for asserted powers in the President of the Senate, which he declared in his opinion did not exist.

A recent construction has been advanced by some republican politicians and presses, which is quite as much in conflict with the true theory of the Constitution and the practice of the Government as the one just disposed of, and that is that, while it maintains that such a power is vested in the President of the Senate, it treats him not as the constitutional custodian of the electoral certificates, and ex officio president of the joint convention, but as the organ and instrument of the Senate itself, with the full right, upon the part of that body as the representatives of the States, to prescribe his duties and to make him the mouth-piece of their views upon all the disputed points that may arise in a presidential election. This construction destroys the individuality and independence of that officer for all the purposes for which he has been designated by the Constitution, makes him, in the performance of that constitutional duty, the mere organ and agent of the Senate, rejects all participation by the House in the count of the electoral vote, and assumes for a single branch of the Legislature the sole authority to act upon a contested presidential election. It is sufficient for me here to say that such a proposition can find no authority for its support in the Constitution, none in the opinion of any prominent statesman or jurist of this country, and none in the practice of the Government.

If it be true, then, as I think is very clear, that the right to count and reject electoral votes is not lodged by the Constitution in the President of the Senate, let us then further inquire whether any such power exists at all in the Federal Government to go behind the electoral certificates and inquire into their validity; and, if so, where that power resides. The chief difficulty on this branch of the subject results from the fact that the Constitution does not make the election of a President to depend upon the popular vote of the country at large, but treats it as the act of the States in their separate capacity of States. The choice of electors is to be made in such manner as the Legislatures of the States may prescribe. The number of electors is made equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State is entitled in Congress, and the mode of authenticating the result in each State is left to the local Legislatures. Some curious anomalies result from these constitutional provisions. It is not improbable under our system that a minority candidate, so far as the popular vote is concerned, might be elected. Let me illustrate this: New York might give to her electors for some particular candidate 200,000 majority, and Pennsylvania might give to electors 200 majority; the electoral vote of those two States would thus be carried for their respective favorites; but the popular majority of near 200,000 of the one over the other would avail nothing in the count. So Delaware and Nevada have a strength in the electoral colleges three times beyond their popular vote; Florida, Rhode Island, and Colorado twice as great as their popular vote, and West Virginia, Kansas, and Minnesota two-fifths beyond their popular vote. Now while it is conceded that the electoral certificates are the result of State action, yet it is State action that may involve in its consequences the welfare and happiness of the entire Union. Such being the case, there must be some central authority to determine the legality and validity of these certificates; how far they are in conformity to the State laws, and whether they have been manipulated in the State by some usurped authority, defying the law and trampling upon the rights of the people of that State.

While, therefore, there are many wise and excellent men who deny the existence of any such authority, yet I am satisfied that the great mass of the learning and intellect of the country has reached the conclusion that this power is rightfully and constitutionally vested in Congress. It is a power that has been claimed, exercised, and recognized from an early period of our Government; and Mr. Clay embraces the whole argument in a nutshell, when, in 1821, he contended that the power to count necessarily implied the power to reject that which ought not to be counted.

I have therefore reached the conclusion upon this point that the right to reject an electoral vote does reside in the central authority of the Union, and that that authority is Congress. Upon this point there will be found little diversity of opinion in the two Houses, but the same harmony of opinion will not exist as to the mode and limitations under which this power is to be exercised by Congress.

It is now held very generally by the republican party that while Congress does possess the constitutional authority for good cause to reject the vote of a State, yet this rejection, to be legally done, must be the concurrent act of both bodies. They deny that it is competent to one of the Houses acting separately to reject the vote of a State. This is the pons asinorum of the whole controversy; it is the key to the present situation; it is a problem pregnant with results at the present time, and upon its determination will depend, if not the peace, at least the satisfaction and contentment of the public mind. It is certainly, to say the least of it, a very extraordinary doctrine for the republican party to plant itself upon at this perilous crisis of the country. It is in direct conflict with the construction which that party has given to the respective powers of the two Houses for the last eleven years.

In 1865 what is known and recognized as the twenty-second joint rule originated in a republican Senate and was adopted with almost unanimity by both branches of a republican Congress. That rule in express terms declared that if either House objected to the count of the electoral vote of any State it should not be counted, but should be rejected from the enumeration. This rule has been in operation since 1865, and has controlled the annunciation of the three last presidential elections. Its propriety as a fair construction of the power of the two Houses was never questioned until the democratic party acquired a majority in the House of Representatives. But it is said the Senate have rescinded this joint rule. Admit that it has withdrawn its assent to its further continuance, does that in any wise impair the proper constitutional construction of the power of the House of Representatives? This rule was not an arbitrary regulation gotten up without any respect to the Constitution of the country, but it was a deliberate expression of the opinion of Congress as to the rights of the two Houses under that Constitution. And does not the propriety of this rule rest upon the plainest deductions of natural reason, and of parliamentary action? The vote of a State is announced, and the question is, shall it be counted? If the two Houses concur in its count, there can be no difficulty; but if they disagree, what other result can follow but its rejection? Both bodies are alike equal in authority, and independent in their action; both are entitled to equal respect of their opinions; and if there is a disagreement as to their acceptance of any proposition, the same result must follow as in the case of their disagreement in the passage of a bill or joint resolution. In other words, to give effect to anything upon which the two Houses have to act, there must be a concurrence of the two Houses, or the proposition before it fails. Any other view of the subject would make the one House inferior to the other, and virtually confer upon one what the Constitution requires both to perform. I therefore concur with the Judiciary Committee in the conclusions they have come to on this subject, and maintain that when the proposition is submitted to the two Houses, shall the vote of Louisiana be counted? and the House declares that in its opinion it should not, that the vote must stand rejected from the count.

Now we come to consider what in all probability will be the action of this House on the 14th of February next if the bill of the joint committee is not adopted before that day. With all the facts now before us, although there is a bare possibility that those facts may be varied by the reports of the committees, I do not see how the House of Representatives can do otherwise than reject the vote of Louisiana from the count. Assuming this then to be done, how will the vote stand before the House? Mr. Tilden will have 184 votes; Governor Hayes will have 177. Is this an election by the electoral colleges, or is it a failure to make an election? Upon this point there is some diversity of construction. I am rather inclined to the opinion that it requires a majority of the whole number of electors, composing the various electoral colleges, to make a choice, and that the exclusion of the Louisiana electors will not diminish the number required to make that majority. If this be the correct view, then there will, upon the facts stated, be no election by the electoral colleges, and the duty of electing a President will under the Constitution devolve upon the House of Representatives.

Will we be allowed without opposition to exercise this constitutional duty? Will the Senate assent to the rightfulness of our proceedings, or will it take issue with us and will the executive department assume to interfere in the event of such disagreement between the two Houses?

It is in the contemplation of just such a contingency as that to which I have referred—the Senate insisting upon the counting of Louisiana, and the House rejecting that vote from the count—which has caused the National Republican, the leading organ of the Administration at Washington, in successive frantic and jacobinical articles to announce that if the House shall, under the circumstances, proceed to exercise its constitutional power to elect a President, that every democrat in the House so concurring in that movement "will be summarily arrested." I know not how such threats may affect others, they certainly will not disturb me. I shall perform my constitutional duty according to the best lights before me, unawed by these contemptible menaces whether they proceed from the Executive or from any of his vile and profligate organs. I have already endured insult and imprisonment in four of the Government bastiles and forts in this country in resisting an illegal and arbitrary demand made upon me, and I am ready to endure imprisonment again and again, whenever my sense of duty counsels me to resist lawless and unscrupulous power. And here permit me to say that I am a man of peace; I hate all riots, tumults, and every form of disorder that can disturb the peace of society. I will go as far as he who will go farthest in support of every measure of conciliation, peace, and compromise short of a surrender of the Constitution and the violation of the just rights of the people; but there are evils to be dreaded worse than the convulsions that sometimes disturb the good order of society, and those are the triumph of the military over the civil power, the subversion of the popular will by force or fraud, and a base and cowardly surrender of our constitutional rights and privileges.

The inquiry may well be made whether if the House rejects the vote of Louisiana, to be followed by its logical consequences, an election by the House of Representatives, the Senate will acquiesce in or resist this proceeding of the House? I know that there are some men in this country of great ability, of vaulting ambition, and of intense partisan feeling; men of that stamp of character who would as soon see the Government in ruins as the republican party out of power; but such is certainly not the character of a large number of republican Senators now in that body. They are men who have some love yet left for their country and its institutions, and they will give to the subject a calm, patriotic, and statesman-like consideration. I believe then that the Senate will concur in the course which I have indicated that it is probable the House will adopt, if no adjustment of this difficulty shall be made. My reasons for that opinion can be very briefly stated. They are—

First. That a profound conviction pervades the public mind of this country, shared universally by the democrats and to a large extent by the most intelligent and reflecting republicans, that Tilden has been fairly and honestly elected and should be inaugurated. So general and profound is that opinion that no other conclusion could give satisfaction to the public mind. The time has not yet arrived in this country when the firm and decided judgment of the American people can be treated with inattention or contempt by a body of selfish and unscrupulous politicians.

Secondly. The fact is so notorious that the State of Louisiana cast her electoral vote for Tilden by a majority of upward of eight thousand, and that he has been defrauded of proper certificates by the secret and corrupt machinations of a returning board that were ashamed even to make and preserve any minutes of their proceedings, that I do not believe that Governor Hayes would accept the Presidency acquired through such fraudulent and dishonorable proceedings; nor do I believe that the Senate of the United States would imperil its high position before the American people by giving encouragement to such frauds.

Thirdly. In claiming our right to reject the vote of Louisiana, we stand upon firm and stable ground. We stand upon the justice of our cause; upon the clear support of the American people, and upon a construction of our powers which has been expressly recognized and acted upon by the Senate for the last eleven years, and which that body could not under existing circumstances repudiate without subjecting itself to the charge of the grossest inconsistency, and of the most extreme and indefensible partisanship.

I have, so far, confined myself exclusively to the expression of my concurrence in the resolutions reported by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT,] chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, which are now under consideration by this House, and have made no reference to the bill reported by the joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, submitted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] as chairman of said committee on behalf of the House. That bill is not yet before us, and probably will not be taken up for examination and discussion by this House until acted upon by the Senate.

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. Speaker, I do not profess to be exempt from the influence of party as a member of this body. Indeed, in looking back to my past political life, if I have committed any error in that respect at all, it has been in too rigid an adherence to its requirements and policy. Occasions will, however, sometimes arise in which party success may be too dearly bought, and when the transcendent interests of the country, and the peace and happiness of the nation, must cause all mere party triumphs to dwindle into utter insignificance. I took occasion a few days ago to express my opinion upon the powers, privileges, and duties of the House of Representatives in counting the electoral vote for President and Vice-President, and I endeavored to show that in accordance with the former practice of the Government, and the true construction of the Constitution, a result might be reached that would be in consonance with the wishes and feelings of the people of my State; and yet in reaching this conclusion I had to assume that a co-ordinate branch of the Government would rise superior to all the influences of party and concur with us in the rightfulness and justice of our position. In this assumption I might be mistaken, and the country precipitated in to a fierce and irreconcilable conflict between the Senate and House of Representatives, which might lead to the most serious civil convulsions. I cannot, therefore, but look with great satisfaction upon any measure which, violating no provision of the Constitution, nor surrendering any right of the people, will enable us to bring this painful and menacing controversy to a termination in a manner acceptable to the people of the United States.

The bill now under consideration comes before us with high recommendations; it professes to be a measure of peace, of conciliation, of order, and of settlement. It professes to be so just and impartial in its provisions that no man can predict in advance what result may flow from it, and it is alike lauded and assailed by prominent politicians of both parties. It comes before us unanimously recommended by the able committee on the part of this House and sustained by the committee of the Senate with one exception, whose opposition to the measure cannot disparage it much in my estimation. It has already passed the Senate by more than a two-thirds vote, receiving the cordial and earnest support of the most universally esteemed members of that body without distinction of party.

The bill fixes and determines three important propositions for which I have heretofore earnestly contended:

First. It utterly explodes the idea that the President of the Senate has any authority to determine the validity of contested electoral returns.

Secondly. It affirms the right to count the electoral vote to be in Congress.

Thirdly. It recognizes the authority of Congress to go behind the face of the electoral returns and to inquire into the fact, to what extent they may have been procured by fraud, coerced by military power, or manipulated by secret and illegal returning boards.

It is true it requires that where double returns are received from any State, and the commission created by the bill shall determine in favor of the acceptance of one of those returns, the decision of that tribunal can only be reversed by the concurrent action of the two bodies. This is the only feature in the bill that is not in accordance with my preconceived opinion of the powers of this House; and it is a concession based, on my part, upon the very high respect and deference which I am disposed in advance to give to the decisions of that able and upright tribunal.

This bill has been assailed upon the ground that it is a violation of the Constitution and a delegation of our constitutional powers to that commission. If this were true, it would be a fatal objection to the bill; but I am unable to see any provision of that instrument with which it is in conflict. It is conceded that the Constitution is not very clear and explicit as to the mode and manner of counting the electoral vote. Where such is the case much must necessarily be left to implication and legislation. The fair and just implication, sustained by the past practice of the Government, is that the power is vested in the two Houses of Congress. That power is distinctly recognized in the bill now before us, and the authority given to the commission is not a delegation of the power thus conferred any more than the reference of a cause in court to a commissioner to ascertain facts and the law bearing upon those facts for the information and enlightenment of the court would be a delegation of its judicial power to that officer. The right of Congress, retained by this bill, to reject any decision made by this commission upon the law and facts submitted by it is a conclusive answer to the objection of a surrender or delegation of our powers to that body. No doubt very great weight will be attached to its decisions; they will doubtless merit our fullest confidence, and will probably be acquiesced in without any dissent on our part; yet we are left entirely free to reject them if they shall not be in conformity with what we believe to be law and justice.

It is further maintained that the powers conferred upon this commission are novel, that the blending of judges of the Supreme Court with committees of the two Houses is unprecedented and dangerous, and that we are venturing upon an experiment which may mar the symmetry and beauty of our constitutional system. This is a very great error. The provisions contained in this bill are neither novel nor without some semblance of authority in our past history. The present bill is modeled upon a bill which received, in many provisions similar to it, the approval of both Houses of Congress in the year 1800, and which was earnestly sustained by the ability and influence of John Marshall, afterward Chief-Justice of the United States—a name illustrious in the jurisprudence of this country—and by many others scarcely less distinguished for their eminent talents and constitutional learning.

As this bill, therefore, in my opinion, is neither unconstitutional nor unsupported in its general features by distinguished jurists and statesmen in the earlier and purer days of this Republic, the simple inquiry is, does it afford a fair and honorable means of reconciling the conflicting sentiments and opinions of forty millions of people, and of producing a result which will give peace and satisfaction to the public mind? Upon this point there seems to be no ground for diversity of opinion. An overwhelming majority of both branches of Congress look to the results of this commission with the unshrinking confidence that it will remove every difficulty out of our path, and enable us to reach a conclusion satisfactory to ourselves and to the nation. From all parts of the country—north, south east, and west—we are receiving memorials, letters, telegrams, proceedings of public meetings, and resolutions of legislative assemblies, declaring their entire confidence in the efficacy of this bill as a measure of national relief, and announcing the determination of the people, without regard to their political predilections, to stand by and abide the result of this mode of settlement.

Under such circumstances can I refuse my assent to this bill? No greater calamity could befall this nation than to have a presidential incumbent holding office by a disputed title, and where one-half the nation would in their hearts and consciences believe him to be a usurper. Whether it led to civil strife and contention or not, it would give a shock to our institutions from which they might never thereafter successfully recover. I wish to see all causes for discontent and dissatisfaction in the public mind removed. I wish to see universal confidence restored in this nation, for without it industry must continue paralyzed and labor continue without employment. The happiness, the prosperity, financial ease, and industrial energies of this nation now hang upon a prompt, peaceable, and harmonious settlement of this presidential question. I am encouraged to believe, by all around me and by all that I can hear from every portion of the country, that this measure, if adopted, will quiet discontent, tranquilize the public mind, inspire confidence, and infuse new vigor and life into our free institutions. So believing, I shall without hesitation cast my vote for the bill.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. L. W. BALLOU,

OF RHODE ISLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, 1877.

Mr. BALLOU. Mr. Speaker, the great question for us to decide in this presidential contest, and that which is alike important to all parties, is not one of administration, not whether Mr. Tilden or Mr. Hayes is elected President, but who is legally and constitutionally elected.

There is no great principle that divides the two great parties of the country upon which an issue can be made of sufficient importance to justify any other contest than the one for the supremacy of the law. On this the liberty of the people and the perpetuity of our country rests, and all parties are alike interested in preserving it.

The two platforms of the republican and democratic parties, upon which the presidential contest was waged, differ in words rather than principles, and the great questions which have been before the country in the past and decided during the last sixteen years are now professedly accepted by all. All agree that we are a nation, and not a league; that all men are created equal and have the inalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. All profess to rejoice that the Union has been preserved; that slavery has been abolished; that the amendments to the Constitution are adopted, which confer citizenship, with all its rights and immunities, and the right to vote upon those who had been slaves; that the public debt incurred in suppressing insurrection cannot be questioned, and that the rebel debt is illegal and void.

The republican party to-day, both by the platform it has adopted and the candidate it has chosen, stands pledged to "the permanent pacification of the southern section of the Union and the complete protection of all its citizens in the free enjoyment of all their rights;" to "regard the interests of the white and of the colored people both and equally;" to "put forth its best efforts in behalf of a civil policy which will wipe out forever the distinction between North and South in our common country;" to "a civil service organized upon a system which will secure purity, experience, efficiency, and economy;" to "a strict regard for the public welfare solely in appointments, and the speedy, thorough, and unsparing prosecution and punishment of all public officers who betray official trusts;" to "a sound currency," (based upon specie;) to "education unsectarian and free to all;" to "simplicity and frugality in public and private affairs;" and to "a fraternal spirit of harmony toward all sections and classes."

Does the democratic party to-day dissent from any of these principles or propose any new measures antagonistic to those the republicans are pledged to carry out? If so, what? It is easy to say, "You republicans are extravagant and corrupt and we democrats are for economy and reform," but the history of the country in its different sections and localities or as a whole, when under democratic rule, has not shown such an excess of patriotism, purity, honesty, and faithfulness over republican administrations as to justify revolution in order to bring it into power. There are weak and selfish and corrupt men in all parties, and it will be difficult for any party to select sixty thousand persons for official positions and not get some who are unpatriotic and selfish mixed in, but I believe it may be safely stated that not only the percentage of loss by fraud, in proportion to the amount of money received and expended, has been greatly reduced since the inauguration of President Lincoln, and especially during the administration of President Grant, but that the percentage of unfaithful officials in proportion to the whole number employed has been greatly reduced also; and that the honesty and faithfulness and patriotism of the officials to-day will compare favorably with that of any period in the history of the Government.

If then there are no new principles to be adopted, the only party question there is must be, who shall administer and carry out to legitimate results those which all professedly hold? Shall the administration be in the hands of those who have heretofore proclaimed and defended these principles in the halls of legislation and on the battle-fields, or in the hands of those who have opposed them till means and strength failed and submission was a necessity.

I think candid men can give but one answer, and that is that the tried friends of equal rights and liberty for all will be more likely to see the work they have thus far carried on faithfully completed than to trust the administration to those who have seemingly accepted these principles only from necessity or inability longer to oppose them. And yet it would be far better that the democratic party, which has opposed them for years, should come into power and administer the Government, if legally chosen, than that the republicans should retain possession by illegal or unconstitutional means; for republican institutions and liberty itself can only be preserved by obedience to law.

How then stands the case in relation to the presidential election at the present time, and what course should be pursued? If it is a time of trial and danger, then more than ever should we be guided by law and hold on to the Constitution as the anchor of our hopes, and not resort to untried expedients. That Constitution declares that—

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.

It also declares that—

The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, * * * and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted;—the person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed, the time of choosing the electors and the day on which they shall give their votes being fixed by law.

Have these conditions been complied with? Certainly the number of electors designated by the Constitution have been chosen by all the States, and have voted by ballot for President and Vice-President on the days designated by law, and have sent distinct lists of the persons voted for, certified and sealed, to the President of the Senate, who has received and must open the certificates, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, when they must be counted, and somebody must do it. As there have been but two candidates for either President or Vice-President, and an odd number of votes has been given, some one must have a majority and be elected. Who shall count the vote and declare the result?

Unquestionably Congress may provide by law the course that shall be pursued under the Constitution, but in the absence of legislative provision to the contrary it would seem to be obviously the duty of the one whom the Constitution designates to do a part of the work in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives should complete what it specifies must then and there be done, no other person or body being officially present or named for that purpose. That this was the intention and understanding of the framers of the Constitution may be clearly seen not only by the uniform practice of Congress during the early and many successive presidential elections but by the following explanatory resolution adopted by the convention itself on the 17th day of September, 1787, the very day that Washington transmitted it to the Congress of the Confederacy, giving the opinion of the convention in regard to what should be the mode of proceeding by the first Congress under the Constitution to be adopted, and what it considered would be the duty of the President of the Senate:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this convention that as soon as the conventions of nine States shall have ratified this Constitution, the United States in Congress assembled should fix a day on which electors should be appointed by the States which shall have ratified the same, and a day on which the electors should assemble to vote for President, and the time and place for commencing proceedings under this Constitution; that after such publication electors should be appointed and the Senators and Representatives elected; that electors should meet on the day fixed for the election of President, and should transmit their votes, certified, signed, sealed, and directed as the Constitution requires, to the Secretary of the United States in Congress assembled; that the Senators and Representatives should convene at the time and place assigned; that the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President, and that after he shall be chosen the Congress, together with the President, should, without delay, proceed to execute the Constitution.

And in accordance with this resolution the President of the Senate, John Langdon, at the first election of George Washington, certifies that he did, "in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for a President and Vice-President." And John Adams, as Vice-President, who was also President-elect for the third presidential term, certifies to the election in the same words and to the opening and counting of all the votes. Thomas Jefferson also as Vice-President, and who received an equal number of electoral votes with Aaron Burr for the fourth presidential term, and who was chosen President by the House of Representatives, certifies that he "did in the presence of the Senate and the House of Representatives open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for President." The amendment of the Constitution adopted by the States in 1804 has the same phraseology in relation to opening and counting the votes as the original instrument, and the same course was pursued and similar certificates were issued by the President of the Senate in relation to opening and counting the electoral votes for the first eight administrations, certainly showing how the framers of the Constitution understood and what they considered the duties of the President of the Senate in relation to the counting of the electoral vote. And probably this course of proceeding would never have been questioned as being the constitutional and legal method were all the certificates of electors of such a character as to leave no doubt of the true and legal result.

But in the present crisis, when two great parties are almost evenly divided, and where fraud is charged upon both sides, and when two sets of certificates are returned from several States, and each party confidently claiming that its candidates have been legally elected, shall it be left to any one man to decide the issue, it is asked, and at his option accept one set of certificates and reject the other? While this may seem to be committing the will of the people to the voice of one man we should not forget that however many certificates are returned from a State to be opened and counted there is only one set that can be legal, and somebody must decide which that one is. The bill reported by the joint committee presumes that five Representatives and five Senators will be chosen, equally divided in their party preferences, and that from the judges of the Supreme Court four members shall be taken who shall choose a fifth, who may become the umpire, and thus the decision of the election by the proposed committee will still be in the hands of one man, and that too in a way not contemplated by the Constitution.

This may meet the difficulty of to-day and settle peaceably the presidential question of 1877, because a majority in each House belong to different party organizations and may choose the commission to whom the whole matter is to be referred, fairly; but none of us would be willing to submit it to the action of a committee to be thus chosen, viva voce, if both the Senate and the House of Representatives were controlled by the same political party, and in opposition to our own. Therefore the present bill of the joint committee, though it may bring peace for the moment, is an unsafe rule and will be a dangerous precedent unless the Constitution shall be soon amended so as to meet all emergencies.

In any closely contested election like the present it will be a tempting occasion for a Congress with a majority in both branches of one political party, under the pretense of illegality or fraud, to substitute its own voice through a partisan committee for the voice of the people.

Is it not better and safer to stand by the old rule, which the framers of the Constitution recommended both by resolution and practice, making it the duty of the President of the Senate to open the certificates, count the votes, and declare the result; and if further legislation is deemed necessary to allow an appeal to be made from his decision on any legal or constitutional question, and on no other, to the Supreme Court, our highest legal tribunal, for its opinion and decision of all such questions, thus avoiding the danger of a possible individual party bias either by the President of the Senate or a committee of Congress, and still have the voice of the people constitutionally expressed in the choice of their Chief Magistrate; thus making the decision equally fair and just on the present occasion, and being a safe precedent for any conceivable division of parties in any exigency which may arise in the future.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN V. LE MOYNE,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the report of the select committee upon the privileges, powers, and duties of the House of Representatives in counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. LE MOYNE. Mr. Speaker, what I desire to say is only in explanation of my vote and not expecting to influence any one else.

This has been said in this debate to be the most important measure which will probably come before Congress for a generation, yet it is to be disposed of in about twenty-four hours' consideration. Such haste is necessarily dangerous. In 1800 Congress discussed and considered this same question for many months, and was not then able to solve the difficulties which we propose to dispose of on the spot. We are being driven by a compelling fear, and that fear not only denies us the time to consider, but deprives us of the dispassionate judgment so necessary for a wise conclusion. This condition of itself suggests doubt, and that doubt is whether or not we are acting in obedience to the Constitution which we have sworn to support.

By the Constitution upon Congress alone has the duty been devolved of counting the electoral vote. There is no provision in it whereby authority is given to any other branch of the Government or individual to participate in this duty, or to revise the action of Congress. Whether the power be in the President of the Senate, in the House, or in the two Houses jointly, it is certainly in Congress as fully as its exclusive power to legislate. Would Congress have power to either deputize a part of itself to legislate or to incorporate with itself some other body or branch of the Government, or certain individuals to pass the laws? If it could not thus discharge a legislative function, can it thus discharge a judicial function conferred by the same power, to wit, the Constitution? We as members of Congress have only a delegated power, and how can we refuse obedience to that fundamental rule of law, "Delegatum non potest delegare." The gentleman from Virginia said this could not be considered as the relinquishment of any rights of the House, because the law could only be passed by our consent; but still it is more or less a delegation, and the question is, can we delegate? These are serious questions, and would certainly deserve more time if there was not a commanding necessity which denied it.

I confess that I feel the force of this necessity as much as any. I represent in part one of the important cities of the West. The gentleman from Maine reminded us that God made the country (meaning Maine) and man made the cities; and I believe so far as I know of Chicago that this is probably true. She may not be quite as godly as she ought to be, or perhaps as Maine is, but she has quite as much interest in the peace and prosperity of the country, quite as much in the fair, amicable, and speedy settlement of this question. The cities have responded more promptly on the desirableness of this bill, because the cities are the first and quickest to receive the impressions of public affairs with their daily papers and the intercommunication of large numbers of men. Public affairs are considered more speedily and it takes more time for this fermentation to work out into the rural districts. But the conclusion will not be different. I do not believe you will find the people through the country even in Maine more willing to sacrifice any material interest for the sake of maintaining either one side or the other in a difference of opinion as to constitutional law. I do not believe they will be any more willing even to delay that degree of prosperity in business which a termination of this political contest will bring.

I do not think that the question as to the effect of this measure on the political parties is worthy of consideration. I do believe that there is that feeling of assurance among a large number of the democrats that if by any scheme or plan devised Mr. Tilden shall not receive the office, their confidence in the men who supported the measure will be lost. Our action will be judged in this matter greatly by the results. But with all these considerations, with this great doubt and hesitation, I feel constrained for the sake of peace to vote for this bill.

Gentlemen may sneer at the suggestion of war. I myself have never believed it possible. Neither did we of the North believe in 1861 that the southern people would be so foolish as to make war. A bitter experience should make us now more careful. Any difficulty about this matter, if it did not lead to war, would so discredit us that our bonds would be sent home, our credit destroyed, and we would be utterly overwhelmed with financial distress. I will venture to say that there is not a member of this House who has not been consulted and told how many men to fight could be brought to Washington either by one side or the other. It is only mere rumor of war, but over the whole country there has been a grumbling that threatened a storm. The atmosphere seemed charged with angry excitement, which needed only a spark to light it, which would send a flame from one end of the land to the other. I believe this flame would utterly consume all such petty instruments of fraud as a Louisiana returning board and would annihilate all attempts at military dictation, but I fear it might also destroy that safeguard of liberty, "the law;" and, to avoid all risk, considering only that highest of all duties, to preserve the Government, I feel compelled to support the bill.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. TAUL BRADFORD,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, 1877.

Mr. BRADFORD. Mr. Speaker, as I propose to vote against the passage of the pending bill, it is due to myself and to my constituency that I place of record the reasons which impel me to this determination.

Trained in a school in which the inviolability of the Constitution is the cardinal canon of faith and of duty, I may with regret but not with trepidation dissent from the views of the majority of my party, which sanction an expedient by which the will of the American people may be defeated in its highest function and the frame of our Government materially and permanently changed.

Congress has not illimitable power. It can neither assume that which does not belong to it nor divest itself of that which is its proper attribute. It can neither elect a President of the United States nor create a tribunal by which such sovereign ordination may be accomplished.

The elective power in continuing the succession to the chief officers of the nation resides with the people, and when it is not constitutionally exercised the duty of preventing an interregnum devolves in part on the House of Representatives and in another part on the Senate.

And when and how this resultant duty of the several Houses of Congress arises and must be performed is the great question which now challenges our consideration and must soon receive from each of us an answer, loyally spoken in the presence of the people, truthfully spoken in the forum of conscience, and patriotically spoken for the guidance of those to whom the same question will hereafter be propounded.

Differences of opinion as to the meaning of the Constitution where it speaks of the mode of electing a President and Vice-President of the United States no doubt there are, but it is no part of our duty to reconcile these views if we can, and, if we cannot, then abandon the constitutional methods of procedure and agree upon some plan of judicial sortilege that has the sole but popular merit of promising to each aspirant to the Presidency a chance of success.

Yet these views have grown to be concurrent in a remarkable degree. Their original divergence occurred in the matter of the final count of the electoral vote, one favoring the power of the President of the Senate to count this vote, and the other the power of Congress to count it; and this has been entirely corrected and removed by the action of the Senate on the pending bill. And this much accomplished—this fundamental distinction of the warring creeds removed, is it not manifest that the remaining differences of opinion on this subject are but transitory, and that the whole dispute could have been settled conformably to the plain formula of the Constitution?

It may now be treated as determined that the President of the Senate has not the constitutional power to count the electoral vote, but that such power vests only in the Congress. How shall it be exercised?

Congress must pass upon the vote of each State as it is presented. And such vote will not be entitled to enumeration until it shall have been decided to possess all the elements of a valid constitutional vote. The judgment so pronouncing must be that of each House, acting separately, and must be delivered by silent acquiescence in the enumeration of the vote or by a deliberate resolution favoring or rejecting it. And certainly the failure of the Houses to agree on the matter cannot result in a decision favoring the judgment of either of them.

The mere existence of evidence which could make a prima facie case does not of itself make such case; but to accomplish that the judicial or quasi-judicial tribunal to which it is submitted must pronounce it, if competent and filling, the measure of legal admissibility. A prima facie case is the result of evidence acted upon by a judicial tribunal. Hence the mere presentation of the certified lists of electoral votes does not make the prima facie case to be overthrown only by the judgment of Congress. And without further elaborating this point I take the position that the question before Congress in prosecuting the inquiry under consideration is, Shall the vote be counted? and not the question, the votes being regular and prima facie entitled to enumeration as the President of the Senate or somebody else might decide, Shall the vote be rejected?

The right of the House to pass upon the vote is equal with that of the Senate. And the right to pronounce judgment in the premises implies the right to pronounce efficient judgment; otherwise, in the event of a disagreement between the Houses, we would have to fall back upon the position so successfully overthrown by able lawyers and experienced statesmen of both parties in the other end of the Capitol, that the President of the Senate has the right to count the vote.

The truth of the whole matter lies in a nut-shell. It is beautifully casketed in the resolutions of the "committee on the powers and privileges of the House in the matter of the count of the electoral vote," presided over by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT.]

These are the resolutions:

Resolved, 1st. That the Constitution of the United States does not confer upon the President of the Senate the power to examine and ascertain the votes to be counted as the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

2d. That the only power which the Constitution of the United States confers upon the President of the Senate in respect to the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States is, to receive the sealed lists transmitted to him by the several electoral colleges, to keep the same safely, and to open all the certificates, or those purporting to be such, in the presence of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

3d. That the Constitution of the United States does confer upon the Senate and the House of Representatives the power to examine and ascertain the votes to be counted as the electoral votes.

4th. That in the execution of their power in respect to the counting of the electoral votes, the House of Representatives is at least equal with the Senate.

5th. That in the counting of the electoral votes, no vote can be counted against the judgment and determination of the House of Representatives.

6th. That the committee have leave to sit again, and report hereafter further matter for the consideration of the House.

And these resolutions, at the time of their introduction a few days ago, evidently reflected the views of a majority of members on this side of the House. And how can so wide a departure be taken as leads one from the high ground of these resolutions down to a complete abdication of the powers and duties of this House embodied in the pending bill? Forensic or constitutional reasoning is unequal to the achievement of bridging the broad chasm that lies between the resolutions and the bill.

But the advocates of the bill claim a constitutional grant of power in the premises to the Congress, which power, they say, must be executed as Congress may direct, either directly under its own supervision or indirectly under some organized authority.

This position is not tenable. The high prerogative duty of counting the electoral vote is, in pregnant but not ambiguous terms, devolved upon Congress by the Constitution.

The Senate and House of Representatives are assembled in a single chamber, in whose presence the President of the Senate must open the packages containing the electoral votes; whereupon it is directed that the votes "shall then be counted." The "grand inquest" of the presidential office then ensues. A certain "presence" is required, and all other and subsidiary agencies are excluded from the solemn court. And after contemplating this high constitutional commission, endowed of dignity and authority by the authors of our Government, who with complacency can regard the ephemeral and unauthorized "commission" ordained to calm the fears of one party and to open to the other a way of retreat from a perilous and revolutionary position?

Democrats supporting this bill renounce their title to defenders of the hereditary faith of their party. They work on republican lines "outside the Constitution." They admit that there is color of truth and fairness in the republican claim to the vote of Louisiana and Florida, and, not willing to give judgment in the premises, they remit to an improvised and secret junta the power to impeach the indefeasible title of Tilden to the Presidency.

This course can find no justification anywhere except in unfounded dread of the republican party. It is the offspring of panic, the conjuration of alarmed capital, now well-nigh become the people's master.

The other and the better course is the one pointed out in the Constitution, and followed in all the history of our Government. This we ought to pursue. This the people expect us to pursue. We have no right to presume that anybody will levy war in this country because we discharge our duty. There will be no war. The advocates of peace are all the people. Republicans menace only because democrats are timid. Tilden has been elected President of the United States, and if a republican Senate should fail to recognize and acknowledge this fact, the House should then proceed to re-affirm the judgment and selection of the people. It has the right and it has the power, and lacks only the courage to condemn the unhallowed work of the impious conspirators who have raped the States of Louisiana and Florida. It is a national disgrace to treat with these felons; and the dignity and high standing of those who will be called upon to conduct the negotiation will not redeem its character. The judges who must play confessors to congressional consciences will suffer in the public estimation. The whole Government will be involved in the odium of arbitrating the right of the people to choose their President.

Sir, the rules of the House have denied me the privilege of discussing elaborately and at length the provisions of this bill. It is only permitted me to give in brief my notions of duty suggested by the situation in which I am placed. The bill will pass against my humble protest. It may secure an acknowledgment of Mr. Tilden's election, as its advocates on this side of the House believe. God grant that it will. But, as for myself, I prefer to give constitutional sanction to what the people have done, and without taking chances or sharing responsibility with another in an indivisible obligation, to proclaim Mr. Tilden, not the fortunate suitor before a court of arbitration for the Presidency, but, the annointed of the people, President of the United States.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN REILLY,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877—

Mr. JOHN REILLY. Mr. Speaker, the discussions on this bill by the members who have spoken in both Houses of Congress have, I think, fully established it as legal and constitutional. That there is a necessity for legislation that will effect an amicable and legal settlement as to how the electoral vote shall be counted, it is almost needless to argue; that "the tranquillity of the country has been disturbed and its business prosperity imperiled" by the impending question is shown by the following resolutions, being part of resolutions adopted by the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania and transmitted to the Senators and Representatives by the governor:

Whereas the tranquillity of the country has been disturbed and its business prosperity imperiled by the extraordinary difficulty of ascertaining in the nearly balanced vote what has been the result of the late election for the electors for President and Vice-President;

And whereas, to allay any excitement that may endanger the public peace and precipitate upon the people the calamities of civil war from which they have been lately delivered, it seems fit and proper that the Legislatures of the States, whose prerogatives and vital interests are involved in the issue, should declare and emphasize those principles embodied in the national Constitution by which the decision of the pending question can alone be safely and lawfully reached;

Resolved by the senate, (the house of representatives concurring,) That the will of the people in electing a President and Vice-President of the United States can only be expressed in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, and the persons having the majority of the votes of the electors appointed by the States of the Union in the manner prescribed by the Legislatures thereof must be by the force of the Constitution and laws declared President and Vice-President respectively and must be on the 4th of March inaugurated, and thereafterward duly respected as such.

Second. That all factious opposition and all threats of violence designed or intended to prevent or imperil the declaration and confirmation of the constitutional election of the President and Vice-President are unpatriotic in spirit, dangerous and revolutionary in tendency, and merit and should receive the condemnation of of an outraged and indignant people.

* * * * * * * *

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives requested to let their action on this question conform to the spirit of this declaration.

Resolved, That the governor be requested to have a copy of this preamble and resolutions forwarded to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress as early as convenient.

The foregoing preamble and resolutions have passed the Legislature.

THOS. B. COCHRAN,
Clerk of the Senate.

Clerk of the House of Representatives.

JANUARY 16, 1877.

If further evidence were required it will be found in the various resolutions of Legislatures, boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and other organizations, as well as the public meetings which have been held, and their resolutions on the subject which have in many cases been laid before Congress.

That the members of the Pennsylvania Legislature had good cause for the resolution denouncing "factious opposition" and "threats of violence" may be inferred from the following extract from a prominent daily paper:

[Correspondence of Forney's Press, Philadelphia.]

HARRISBURG, January 14.—There has been considerable conversation in republican circles since the late caucus on the subject of a bill which Representative Long proposed to offer for consideration. No one as yet, save your correspondent, is able to give the facts. Here they are: After the question of adjournment had been discussed in the Thursday night gathering, Mr. Long stated that he had a bill which had been prepared in Washington and sent to this city, and had here been submitted to the governor and approved by him, providing for the appropriation of $1,000,000 to arm and equip the National Guard of Pennsylvania, to be used in case of an emergency at Washington. The announcement of such a bill created the most intense excitement in the caucus. Mr. Long was assailed on all sides to divulge the authorship of the bill, which he declined to do, only repeating that it was prepared at Washington and approved by the authorities there and here.

Here is a proposition given to the country to place the State forces on a war footing at an expense of a million of dollars. The resolution, I presume, is sleeping in caucus ready to be brought out at any time the "authorities" referred to may direct. That the General Government regard this question with alarm may be inferred when they concentrate troops at the national capital. On July 10, 1876, the report of the War Department to this House shows that there was not a single soldier in Washington. Their report of January 9, 1877, shows that there are 771 soldiers at the Arsenal here, it being the fourth point in numbers in the United States. July 10, 1876, there were in South Carolina 538 soldiers; the report for January 9, 1877, showed 1,466. In Louisiana in 1876 there were 506 soldiers; in 1877 there are 1,391. The movement of troops to the Southern States you will recollect was ordered the day after the adjournment of last session of Congress. It is fair to presume that it was important that they should go there, as there was a great Indian war on hand, and Congress was urgently pressed for additional troops only a few days before; and it must have been urgent indeed to divert them from the protection of the frontier. It is barely possible that the election in these States was more important than the protection of the frontier and the suppression of the Indian war. The country will hardly believe that there was much necessity for it. When there was a threatened outbreak, Governor Hampton being called upon by the officers to quiet it, the election over in these States, the troops were re-enforced by a committee to secure a "fair count." That result not being altogether satisfactory, it is to be presumed that the troops are sent to the national capital to re-enforce the "fair count" committee and enforce it; hence the disturbance to the country. The people see in all this an evidence of danger, and their wishes are that the question shall be removed to a tribunal that will not be affected by bayonet rule, and one that they can stand by and support when made; one that will help restore the country to the path of prosperity, which it was rapidly reaching when this obstruction was put in its way. That the passage of this bill will give relief to the country I have no doubt, and therefore cheerfully give it my vote.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN F. PHILIPS,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped for the opportunity to express at length some opinions formed and convictions entertained by me in respect of this great measure.

But the action of the House in limiting the debate, under the necessities of the case, admits only a few words in explanation of the vote I shall give.

Many honest, true men of my political household think the democrats of this House should stand by their construction of the Constitution and let the consequences take care of themselves. I concede to no man greater zeal for the party than myself. In its policy and principles are wrapped up the tranquillity, the prosperity, honor, and glory of the American Union. Its defense under persecution, derision, and misconception of the autonomy of the people, its unshaken attachment to the constitutional methods of administering the Government, challenge the admiration of every honest, thoughtful citizen. To the fact that amid the season of wild disorder succeeding our civil strife, when bad blood, wicked passion, and devilish fanaticism ran riot and ruled the hour, the democratic party held up the blazing shield of the Constitution are we this day indebted for our rescue from the unappeasable and unchained spirit of despotic power.

That the American people in the late election approved its policy by electing its presidential candidate, I have no doubt whatever. But circumstances of an extraordinary and perilous nature environ the Republic in the matter of declaring according to the methods of law the result of that election. Be it fraud, conspiracy, or corruption, we find ourselves as members of this House in a conjuncture, anomalous and doubtless wholly unanticipated by the framers of the Constitution, who did not foresee what a rôle returning boards and the Federal army were to play in American politics? We are in the condition of shipwrecked men at sea. We need not in this perilous moment debate how came we here, nor exhaust ourselves so much in reproaches and mutual accusations. The great question with us as rational men, fit to be legislators, is, what shall we do to reach the shore?

No party in this country ever stultified itself in yielding an abstract opinion in the face of that necessity which places against party fealty the outcry of a whole people for relief. And the party which shall be foremost in the struggle for a peaceable and just solution of the complications of this hour—threatening as they do to whelm us with a strife that would bear American liberty to the bloodiest grave the world ever saw—will be the controlling party of this Republic for many years.

The democratic party is a pacific party, because it works by the agency of law, and not the sword. It loves not the riot of confusion, for it is the hand-maid of peace and the guardian of orderly government. Backed as it is by the popular conviction that it has been denied the immediate recognition of the fruit of its triumph at the polls only by force and fraud, it will the more demonstrate the grandeur and self-abnegation of its patriotism when for the public peace it admits the defeated party to the equality of compromise.

A people without faith is a people without hope. Surely all honor and conscience are not dead in the breasts of Congresses and the judiciary! If men have brought their minds to a different conclusion on firm ground of belief, the sooner we dissolve and pull down this fabric of so-called popular government the better.

If, in fact and in law, Mr. Tilden or Mr. Hayes has been elected by the people, there is authority lodged in the commission to ascertain this; and if the commission, composed, as it will be, of the best men of the Senate and House and venerable men of the highest judicial tribunal on the earth, have not the wisdom to discern, the conscience to seek, and the courage to declare the truth, then indeed have we reached that extreme of political disorder for which revolution is the only cure. I shall vote for this bill as the best solution proposed and in preference to the humiliating spectacle of one man in the Senate declaring according to his party bent who is to be the President, and then witness a quiet submission to this usurpation or an appeal to the bloody arbitrament of the sword.

In the face of such an emergency as this to say that the Constitution is barren of power to admit of the solution proposed, is to stultify the men who made it and to create a just suspicion of its preservative energy. Coming as do the appeals against the constitutionality of this bill from the men who have tossed that instrument in the air, spat upon it, and cut it into shreds with military bayonets whenever it interposed to thwart their party schemes, they excite little alarm. Invoked as this measure is by every consideration of public peace and patriotism, I doubt not these constitutional mists clouding the visions of my colleagues, will dissipate in the sunlight of the nation's repose and glory to follow this lawful and orderly adjustment.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. JAMES PHELPS,

OF CONNECTICUT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, in the few moments allowed me under the necessary arrangement for the limited debate upon this measure, which is not second in importance to any which has demanded the consideration of the Congress of the United States since the formation of the Constitution, I shall have an opportunity to state but briefly and very generally the reasons by which I am governed in the conclusion to which I have arrived. In doing so, I shall purposely avoid the discussion in its bearing on precedents which have been made and followed on former occasions of counting the electoral vote, because that branch of the subject involved has been exhaustively treated by many gentlemen representing both sides of the question.

In giving expression to my views, I shall endeavor to betray no partisan bias. Party organizations are unimportant in the presence of such a crisis, and partisan triumphs sink into insignificance when weighed against the mighty issues which hang upon the disposition of this question. One party or the other may succeed through the proposed arrangement, and one or the other must be defeated, but whatever the result in that respect, if the safety of the country is secured, the people will have reason to bless the instrumentality by which it has been accomplished.

For the first time in our history we are confronted with the spectacle of contending political parties disputing over the result of a presidential election, in which thirty-eight States participated, whose citizens cast an aggregate of more than eight millions of votes. If the preponderance exists on a certain side, it is only by a single vote in the electoral college, and whether it does honestly exist depends upon the decision of numerous controverted questions which arose in the conduct of the election and the subsequent canvass and promulgation of the vote in three of those States, all of which are necessary to be counted on that side to establish such preponderance.

In each of those disputed States, unfortunately perhaps for the credibility of the claim that the result of their elections was fairly declared, the party which seeks to take advantage of that declaration had in its possession the State governments and the officers and machinery by which the election was conducted, the votes canvassed, and the result proclaimed; and in each of them the gravest charges of irregularity, informality, intimidation, and fraud are alleged by each party against the other; and in two of them the difference on the face of the returns between the opposing electoral tickets was so small as to be decisively affected by the balance of the alleged irregularity and fraud. In the other still more serious charges are made, and important constitutional and jurisdictional questions are raised to add to the embarrassing complications which surround the result.

The returning officers in all have so certified the election as to give the votes of the States to a candidate who, by such certification, receives precisely the number necessary to his election; a state of things which never before arose and may never again occur, which seems not to have been anticipated by the framers of the Constitution and for the adjustment of which no clear method appears to have been provided in the organic law.

The uncertainty attending the final conclusion of the question has kept alive the intensely bitter feeling which pervaded the canvass, and increased the hitherto unexampled and protracted prostration of the industries of the country, until the people have justly become more anxious for a satisfactory solution of the difficulty than for the success of the political party with which they are identified.

It is contended by a class of ultra partisans whose political interests and feelings accord with those of the officer who is by law designated to preside over the two Houses of Congress when convened for the purpose of counting the electoral votes, that that officer has the power, and that it is his duty, to make the count and ascertain and declare the result; or in other words, that he is the final arbiter in all controversies that may arise in connection with all the claims and counter-claims of fraud, intimidation, &c., and all the points of jurisdiction and of constitutional power which are involved in the settlement of the numerous questions which arise in the disputed States. Whatever the Constitution authorizes him to do is as the presiding officer of the two Houses of Congress, and in their presence legally assembled. How, and when, and by what rule or precedent is he to determine those vexed questions? The exercise of such authority, if he legally possessed it, would be utterly impracticable in the present case. But the Constitution gives him no such power, and imposes on him no such duty, and by the clearest implication confines both his power and duty to the simple ministerial function of opening the certificates, that the count may be made by Congress through its appointed agents, and the ascertainment and declaration of the result by the two Houses in their accustomed mode. Such a construction is recognized by the sanction of an uninterrupted practice since the adoption of the Constitution. A departure from it under existing circumstances would be not only arbitrary, but revolutionary, and the Chief Magistrate inaugurated under such a proceeding would be the head of a party and the leader in the conspiracy, and not the legally chosen and constitutional Executive of the nation. If installed by virtue of such an unwarranted innovation, he would command neither the acquiescence nor the respect of the people. Under such an example all constitutional obligations and restraints would thenceforward be inoperative, and arbitrary and unlawful power would be invoked and exercised to perpetuate the existence of the party in possession of the Government.

The power of Congress to count the vote is vested in the two Houses by constitutional enactment, and there is doubtless a well-founded objection, except in the most pressing emergency, to its delegation by Congress to any other body not wholly composed of members of both Houses. But the usual and only constitutional course hitherto pursued on such occasions is almost certain now to fail through a disagreement between the two Houses of Congress, for the reason that they possess equal original powers and are separately controlled by opposing political parties, and therefore some measure of compromise is absolutely necessary to obviate the difficulty. Such adjustment must from necessity be constitutionally irregular in the sense that it is not constitutionally provided for, and it can only be justified to secure the peace of the country and preserve what remains of the Constitution. This is the paramount duty in the extreme exigency before us. To save the life of the nation one of its members, if need be, may be sacrificed. On that ground I believe the proposed measure to be fully justified and properly available as a choice between the continuance of free popular government and anarchy; between public and private financial prosperity and individual and national bankruptcy; between employment and honest support for the laboring masses and a degree of destitution and distress which cannot be described; and possibly between peace and such civil discord as would crimson the country with fraternal blood.

Possibly some of the details of the bill may be liable to criticism, but statesmen should not be too technical when the whole Constitution is in danger. I believe it is as perfect and as well adapted to the occasion as any which human wisdom could have devised, and the able and conscientious committee who freely sacrificed party preferences upon the altar of patriotism that they might harmonize all differences and present a plan to rescue the Government from the danger which menaced it deserve the gratitude of the country, and their names will live so long as the American Constitution shall survive.

For these reasons I cannot hesitate to give the measure my cordial support; and my anxiety for its success, regardless of the question who through it may be the recipient of the great trust depending on its execution, is limited only by the magnitude of the trust, the extent of the peril, and the value of free institutions to a people who in the course of a century have achieved marvelous advancement in everything which makes a nation great, and whose destiny is I trust to continue for all coming time to accomplish still greater conquests in the way of peaceful and enlightened progress.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. W. H. STANTON,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Speaker, in casting my vote for this bill, I do not wish to be understood as sanctioning it as a procedure to be followed for all time, in determining who are elected President and Vice-President. The twenty-second joint rule, which the Senate longer refuses to act under, contains provisions, in my view, far more in consonance with the Constitution in counting the electoral vote than are the provisions of this bill.

The refusal of the Senate to act under this rule presents to us the alternatives of adopting this bill or refusing to adopt it and precipitating on the country internecine strife. There is no use shutting our eyes to the fact that unless some measure of the nature of this bill be adopted forthwith, there will be a dual administration after the 4th of March next, and, as a consequence, there will be anarchy, confusion, business prostration, riot, and, without doubt, bloodshed.

I say now that if I considered that any one provision of this bill were unconstitutional I would not vote for it. The Constitution, by my vote, shall not be bartered away for expediency. This bill I believe to be entirely consistent with the Constitution, but it is not, I also believe, such a mode of procedure to count the presidential or electoral vote as the framers of the Constitution designed. They would not have delegated to a committee composed of members of both Houses and members of the Supreme Court such functions as are prescribed in this bill. It is not well to drag the Supreme Court of this country into the slough of politics. But in times of high political excitement like the present, when the members of that body are the only ones whose decisions and determinations on the presidential question the parties of the country will respect, they can for a moment, with propriety, lend their saving influence and services to avert evils incomprehensible from our land. It is not the first time in the history of our country that a member of the Supreme Court has performed in behalf of the country functions which a technical construction of the Constitution might question. It is in truth a question requiring judicial interpretation and exposition in a degree to which this bill calls the services of these judges. It is technical rather than substantial violence done the Constitution (if there be thereby any violation of that instrument at all) to place members of the Supreme Court on this proposed commission, and he who would let loose the dogs of war that technicalities might be inviolate thinks more of his own opinion than of his country's good.

We have all, I believe, arrived at this conclusion: that there will be no acquiescence by this House in a count of the electoral votes by the President of the Senate alone. The weight of precedent and practice is against the right of this officer to count these votes, and within the present week the most eminent members of the Senate, democratic and republican, have in public speeches declared that the right to count these votes does not reside in this officer. This House will not recognize, as the arbiter to determine who will be President after the 4th of March, the President of the Senate and the Senate will not recognize, in determining who was elected President, the mode of procedure provided in the twenty-second joint rule.

In this dilemma what are we do to? Are we to let the ship of state drive headlong into the breakers, or will we, like good citizens, provide a compass by which we may take our bearings and thus escape the dangers that beset us?

I sincerely believe that Samuel J. Tilden and Thomas A. Hendricks, on the 7th of November last, were unquestionably elected President and Vice-President of these United States. I believe that the majority of the voters of the United States, a majority of more than a quarter million, agrees with me in this view. But the other portion of the voters of these States, if they do not sincerely believe that Rutherford B. Hayes and William A. Wheeler were elected President and Vice-President, profess at least so to believe. To these professions I must give the credit of sincerity. I always respect the man who is sincere, no matter in what or to what extent he may differ from me, and while I think that there is no basis for the claims of those who say Mr. Hayes was elected President, yet I feel so strong in the justness of what I claim in behalf of Mr. Tilden that I have no hesitation in submitting the points in dispute to the arbitrament of such eminent men as this bill designates to compose the commission.

I confess I do not like that provision of the bill that allows a vote to be counted unless rejected by both Houses. If the Senate and House have the right to make the count—and in the light of all I have read on this subject I believe they have—then it is singular, it is a contradiction of terms to say that the yes of one House shall prevail over the no of the other House. If the Senate and House are to count they cannot count without concurring, and assuredly when one says yes and the other says no there is no concurrence.

But this is one of the open questions of constitutional interpretation and construction, and since the interpretation that requires a vote to be rejected by both Houses to exclude it is the only interpretation upon which the committee that reported the bill would harmonize, I am willing for this occasion and to bridge over the present difficulty to accept that construction of the Constitution. There being a doubt, that doubt can be no better resolved on this occasion than in the direction of harmonizing differences and preventing turbulence and bloodshed. I believe Congress has the power to prescribe how the electoral vote shall be counted. The framers of the Constitution made no provision how or by whom the votes shall be counted. They simply said: "And the votes shall then be counted."

When the Constitution says by whom a power shall be exercised or in what particular manner it shall be exercised, that precludes all legislation on the subject, and no legislation such as this bill proposes would be in order if the person to make the count and the manner of making it were named and designated in the Constitution. But, as they are not named and designated in that instrument, it is incumbent on Congress, by a law or joint rule, to provide for carrying into effect and operation the provision of the Constitution relating to counting the electoral votes. Until Congress does that the machinery for making a President is incomplete. Our republican friends say that the twenty-second joint rule is abrogated; they are divided among themselves as to the right of the President of the Senate to count the votes. They certainly know that the provision of the Constitution relating to counting the votes has not completeness or full proportions, and yet in the face of these things some of their leaders say we do wrong in making provision to count the vote.

To fail to provide for counting the vote in the face of these circumstances is to give up the ship of state to the buffetings of every wind and wave. Why do these men wish the ship of state to float into a maelstrom? Is it that the vessel may be wrecked and that their personal fortunes may be thereby advanced and enhanced? If they are not wreckers, they are certainly trying to allure that ship of state on by false beacons. They declare that all is peace while in fact all is unrest and confusion. They declare that the democracy will acquiesce in an arbitrary decision by the President of the Senate that Hayes is elected President, when the voice of democracy says they will not accept any such unlawful determination of this question. That these leaders of the republican party have not faith in these declarations themselves is evident from the fact that they have for some weeks past been making such a disposition of the Army and munitions of war as can be construed into nothing less than warlike preparations. And yet these men would bid us be still. That would be the stillness of death—the stillness of death for those who are plotting to triumph by the sword.

Never in the history of this country has there been need of moderation, of compromise, of concession on the part of political parties, more than at the present moment. It only requires a blow to be struck between the democratic and republican partisans to beget a civil war in this country, before which all other civil wars would be insignificant. All the elements for such a strife are at hand. There are poverty and destitution and total prostration of business throughout the length and breadth of the land. The laboring masses, although pleading for work and opportunity to earn something for the support of their families, plead in vain, and their only occupation is to stand day after day idling in the streets and by-ways waiting for something to turn up. Those men took such action at the last election as they thought would bring back to them the days of their old prosperity. They voted to turn out an administration lavish of the people's money, prodigal of the people's property, and to install in its stead an administration under Samuel J. Tilden, who showed himself during his governorship of the great State of New York as a champion of economy in the public expenditures and a friend of the poor man. They may be robbed of the fruits of that work; it is possible that Mr. Tilden may be counted out; but if they are to be subjected longer to a continuation of the present ruinous policy, I say to the opponents of this bill that they who thus subject them better do it within the law.

The American people always obey the law, but they have little reverence for the small tricks of the politicians. I shall be grievously disappointed if a procedure to count the electoral vote under this bill shall result in defeating the just claims of Mr. Tilden to the Presidency. A majority of my constituents will be grievously disappointed at such a result; but I feel I am acting for their best interests, and for the best interests of the country, in voting to reach a result on this question by reason and law rather than by blind partisanship and brute force. I vote for this bill because I still have faith in humanity, because I believe that the men who compose our Supreme Court will rise above partisanship and decide as to justice and equity belong.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. WILLIAM M. LEVY,

OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Speaker, in the closing hours of the discussion of this bill and on the eve of final and decisive action on a measure fraught with interest to the whole country, I deem it proper for me, as one of the Representatives from Louisiana, to give expression to the reasons which influenced my vote. In the decision of the pending issue it is generally conceded that the electoral vote of that State enters largely, indeed conclusively. I have neither the time nor the disposition on this occasion to enter into a discussion on the merits of the disputed question as to how the legal votes of Louisiana were cast in the recent presidential election.

While violent attacks have been made by a portion of the republican press and by gentlemen of the other side, on this floor, assailing the character of the people of Louisiana by charges, as unfounded as they are gross, that intimidation, violence, and murder have undisputed sway within its limits, thus preventing the free exercise of the elective franchise, and while these denunciations demand refutation, I shall postpone that refutation to a later day, when the testimony taken before the committees of this House shall be presented, and thereby a complete vindication can and will be made.

The able and elaborate arguments in both Houses of Congress are, to my mind, conclusive in favor of the constitutionality of the measure; as to the fairness of the plan proposed in the bill, my convictions are strong; as to the expediency and necessity of its adoption I am solemly impressed.

Mr. Speaker, the enemies of Louisiana—by this I mean the enemies of her true interests and those who have marred and are still endeavoring to mar her prosperity and advancement—have by representations based on vague allegations and unsustained by truthful testimony sought to create the impression and establish the belief that the democratic party of Louisiana wages unrelenting warfare against the colored republicans; seeks to deny them the enjoyment of their constitutional and legal rights; sets at defiance the legislation of the country, and practices or justifies intimidation, violence, and murder of the colored men and social ostracism of the white men who are opposed to their political views and policy. Without entering at this time into details to disprove these groundless accusations against the whole people of my State, I shall content myself for the present with supporting my declaration as to their falsity by the simple statement that the continued existence of the men who have so grievously wronged them, the unscrupulous adventurers who have preyed upon their vitals and robbed them of their substance, the security in which they live in the State which they have oppressed, the safety with which they walk the streets and flaunt their ill-gotten gains in the faces of their victims, afford incontrovertible evidence of the patience, forbearance, and peaceful disposition of a community which for partisan ends is traduced and abused.

Mr. Speaker, amid all the wrongs, oppression, and humiliation which have been heaped upon down-trodden Louisiana; in spite of the sacrilege which has violated her rights as a State in the Federal Union, co-equal with each and all of her sister States; in spite of the insult which has been offered to her sovereignty and her majesty within her legislative halls; although she has been denied the right to choose her own State rulers, and instead of citizens of her own choice selected fairly and legally at the ballot-box, a heartless and cruel usurpation has been foisted upon her; in spite of all this, her sons have patiently endured all these insults, injuries, wrongs, and outrages, and instead of rising in their might and driving the usurpers and wrong-doers from her soil, they await the awakened justice of their fellow-countrymen and anxiously look forward to a peaceful solution of their difficulties and release from thraldom by the slow but sure process of law and ultimate triumph of right.

Louisiana has passed through the trial of disappointed hopes, has suffered in the school of adversity as but few Commonwealths have ever suffered, and in all her tribulations, in all her sorrowing trouble, she has maintained peace and order, and while all else has been imperiled and ,may perchance be lost, she has preserved her fair name, the manhood of her sons, and illustrated her devotion to good government and the cardinal principles of republican institutions.

Mr. Speaker, in 1872 the high-handed, unlawful interposition of Federal authority forced upon my State a government not of their choice, and maintained a gross usurpation the fruits of which have been the disturbance of society, the wreck of material interest, blight of prosperity, misrule, failure to administer the laws, and absence of protection to life and property. An unscrupulous, partisan returning board has shamelessly trampled under foot the elective franchise and seeks again to fasten on her a usurpation more hateful, if posssible, than that belched forth in 1872. Though there has never been a day or an hour when the people of Louisiana did not have the ability to hurl these usurpers from their high places and sweep them from their soil, they have resisted this natural impulse and contained their wrath within the limits of law and order; and now in this moment of excitement and passion, when her destiny is hanging on the thread of executive will, the dispatch just read at the Clerk's desk from her prominent citizens and business men affords another proof that her true sons rise above the plane of prejudice and partisanship and their voice is heard in this solemn crisis in the ever-blessed cause of peace.

Believing, then, that the public good will be promoted, quiet and good feeling restored, civil discord avoided, and fraternal harmony established by the passage of this bill; and believing further that I reflect the sentiments and wishes of my immediate constituents, and my fellow-citizens of the whole State, I shall cheerfully cast my vote in favor of the measure under consideration.

Counting the Eectoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. A. M. BLISS,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Speaker, the strong probability that the important measure now under discussion will soon become a law is, I think, a cause for congratulation on the part of all patriotic citizens and of the American people at large. The spirit of patriotism, the sinking of passion, of prejudice, and of party feeling, displayed by the representative men of both of the great political parties who composed the joint committee on counting the electoral vote, and who framed the bill under consideration, cannot be too highly commended. It seems like a return of the spirit that animated our forefathers in the early days of the Republic when there was less of partisanship, if not more of patriotism.

The necessity of agreeing upon some plan that shall settle the question now agitating the country, as to which of the candidates for President and Vice-President voted for at the late election have received the rightful and honest majority of the electoral votes under the Constitution and the laws, is admitted by the great mass of the people. Not only is this necessity admitted, but we are strongly urged by memorials, by letters, by telegrams, emanating from citizens of the Republic without regard to party, to support the bill of the joint committee. While it is regarded by some as objectionable in a few respects, the fact remains that the popular sentiment is unmistakably in its favor. We would prove recreant to our trusts and fail to perform the duties of our office if we as representatives of the people did not listen to their voice and strive to carry out their will.

I will not undertake to discuss the constitutionality of the bill. That is the province of the lawyers in this body. After having listened to the able and it seems to me convincing and conclusive arguments in favor of the bill advanced by gentlemen of such eminent attainments in the legal profession as have delivered their opinions in both the Senate and the House, I have no hesitation in accepting their views on that subject.

I have endeavored to divest my mind of narrow, partisan opinions, and take into consideration the facts concerning the recent election, and take a practical view of all the circumstances, then judge of what my duties are on the present occasion. I believe that Mr. Tilden has been honestly and fairly elected by a majority of the legal electoral votes of the States, as well as by a popular vote. The political party to which I am attached is almost a unit in the same belief. I think a very large number of republicans all over the country also believe that Mr. Tilden is fairly and honestly elected. It would, however, be an act of injustice on my part did I not admit that there are great numbers of fair-minded, honest republicans who just as earnestly and honestly believe that Mr. Hayes has been elected by a majority of one of the electoral votes according to the form of law.

The tribunal that this bill authorizes is of a nature that should command the confidence and respect of all citizens of either political party in the country. I am one of those who believe that there are higher considerations and graver duties in the minds of men who may be chosen to give the most momentous decision of the greatest question that in our time has agitated the country than mere partisan spirit.

The individual presidential candidate will weight but little in the balance before the judicial minds of this tribunal in comparison with the justice and truth that is demanded from the men upon whose verdict the eyes of the whole nation are centered.

Sir, I have no fear of the result of this question. Unworthy indeed would be the Republic to drag on a longer life if a tribunal of the highest caste could not be trusted to adjudicate upon justice and fact.

It would be a great blow at a republican form of government if in this our centennial year, in the face of dangers predicted years ago, that the Republic would be destroyed in a contest for a presidential successor, enough of patriotism were not manifested by both parties to honorably and peaceably arbitrate on a question that has brought ruin to so many other governments.

We should be willing to admit that partisan influences have caused non-partisans to doubt, and that the great mass of the people desire only to be convinced which side is right to cordially acquiesce in an authoritative decision. Accepting this as true, then it will be much better that disputed facts and disputed law should be referred to a tribunal in whom all the people would have confidence, and whose decisions would be accepted as of supreme and binding force, subject to the ratification of at least one branch of Congress.

There are questions to be settled now concerning the meaning of the Constitution in regard to counting the electoral vote about which there has been more or less difference of opinion expressed by able statesmen from the early days of the Republic until the present time. The exigencies of the times demand that this settlement should now take place and be settled for the future.

So far as the legal questions of the bill have been discussed I am willing to be governed in my judgment by the judgment and opinions of such eminent and experienced minds as composed the joint committee who matured the bill, and who have so ably advocated its passage. When such able and eminent lawyers and statesmen as Mr. BAYARD and Mr. THURMAN, who represent one party, and Mr. CONKLING and Mr. EDMUNDS representing the other party in the Senate, together with the gentlemen of the legal profession belonging to both parties who advocate the legality of the measure in this House, agree on all the essential points favorable to the bill, my judgment readily agrees with their opinions. I believe the judgment of the people at large must be affected in the same manner, and that they will accept the conclusions of those gentlemen as convincing and satisfactory.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, if I were to look at the subject merely as a partisan, having no regard for the honest opinions of others who believe that Mr. Hayes has been elected President of the United States, with my own positive views that Mr. Tilden has been elected, I would naturally take the partisan position that no step must be taken that admits of a doubt as to which candidate is elected. We hear men declare in a positive manner that Mr. Hayes has been elected and must be inaugurated, or that Mr. Tilden is elected and he must be inaugurated. This conflict of opinion must be decided in an impartial manner by some impartial tribunal, or the promptings of party zeal may lead us into a sea of trouble. I believe the right mode and the one that will give the greatest satisfaction to the people is the one indicated in this bill.

The trouble and dispute that has been agitating the country, it seems to me, will be productive of much good in the end. Already we have seen in the House and in the Senate, since this bill has been discussed, members of the two political parties, animated by a mutual desire to avert the dangers that threatened the nation, unite in bursting the bonds of partisanship, and working together earnestly in an effort to arrive at conclusions which do not flavor of an advantage to either party. Gentlemen who have always been politically opposed to each other are now found working together harmoniously in support of this bill. It augurs well for the future welfare of our republican institutions when gentlemen so recently opposed in bitter political contests can lay partisanship aside and labor in unison to arrive at a peaceable settlement.

Mr. Speaker, it is but too well known that the whole country during the last three years has been prostrate and suffering after the most fearful crisis that has ever visited this country. When prosperity and confidence began to dawn upon us shortly before the great contest, they were blighted in their very bud by this unfortunate doubt in which the country has been plunged.

It needs no prophet to foretell that the fair and equitable settlement of the great question before us will at once restore confidence, which will, as if by magic, give the people of this country the peace and plenty that have ever been their natural birthright. But no such happy restoration can be attained if by any possibility the occupant of the White House could be considered a usurper or doubtfully elected. I have as much confidence in the wisdom and peaceable disposition of the people as any man on this floor, but I do know that there is as much grave danger when an unarmed nation is disturbed in the confidence of their rightful ruler as there is in the armed mobs that might infest the streets of our great cities. Knowing this danger I am the more ready to acquiesce and give my hearty support to a measure that will avert it.

Mr. Speaker, I have said that I am willing to leave with confidence the legal questions of this bill in the hands of those great lawyers of both the Senate and the House, of whom the country may feel proud; but to an unlegal mind certain facts seem naturally to assert themselves in regard to this great question.

The Constitution has provided for the solution of certain doubtful questions in the electoral college. Thus, for instance, if there is a tie vote in the electoral college the Constitution provides for its remedy; or, if more than two candidates were voted for and none received a majority of the whole vote cast, we again find the Constitution provides a remedy. But the Constitution has failed to provide for fraud; and the framers of that great instrument, in the purity of their minds, never perhaps supposed that frauds would be an element of selecting the occupant of the highest position in the gift of the people.

I suppose there can be no doubt, as events fully prove, that both parties admit, in the very act of asserting their belief in the victory of the election, that the contest naturally is in dispute. Now, sir, admitting, as the opponents of my party do admit, that such a contest does exist, what other remedy is possible to decide this grave question than this bill now before us, when the Constitution has failed to make provisions for a remedy to settle the present exigencies?

And here I might say, however satified I feel that Mr. Tilden has been elected President, I would still consider it a great misfortune if his inauguration should not receive the undisputed title of his opponents as well as his friends; because that misfortune would speedily assert itself in his case as well as in that of Mr. Hayes to the injury of the whole country. Surely, sir, a private citizen would hesitate to invest his means in real estate when there was a doubt about the title. How much more should the people hesitate to have a Chief Magistrate ruling over them whose title to the great office could by any possibility be tainted with doubt?

It is that solution and remedy which the bill affords that has so speedily and strongly asserted itself in the public mind, and public opinion has spoken with its thousand tongues in its favor. It is for that reason that I heartily give my consent to this measure which holds out the olive-branch of peace to a nation distracted with political strife.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. LEVI MAISH,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. MAISH. Mr. Speaker, in the absence of rule or statute regulating the count of the electoral votes, I have held that the House by its own organs must count the votes for President and the Senate the votes for Vice-President. This, it seems to me, is the plain implication of the twelfth amendment, and under circumstances not difficult to imagine might be absolutely essential to the execution of the ultimate power of the House to choose a President and the Senate to choose a Vice-President, in the event of no election by the colleges. How otherwise shall either body determine when the contingency has arisen upon which its further action depends? We are made by the Constitution the sole judges as to that. No one, except here and there some desperate partisan, who contends that the President of the Senate may count the votes and declare the result, will say that there is any other provision for the ascertainment and notification to us of that contingency. Shall we wait until the Senate, upon which is devolved the lesser trust and the lesser duty, has arrived at a conclusion and certified it to us? That would be to make the Chief Magistrate a mere dependency of the Senate, and to defeat the very purpose for which the election in case of no choice by the colleges was transferred to this House.

Nor was it in my judgment ever intended by the men who framed the twelfth amendment that the two bodies, so entirely dissimilar in constitution, should count concurrently, and that no result could be reached or declared until they agreed. To leave this most momentous question in a government, the choice of its head, to two tribunals without an umpire, would be to invite anarchy or a settlement by the sword. We might continue in this way until the 4th of March, concurring in nothing but continued non-concurrence, and this process might be repeated after every new election, and every new election under such circumstances would be a more frightful civil convulsion than the last. What, in that case, would become of the express power and enjoined duty of the House to elect in the event of no election by the people. It is subordinated to the Senate or surrendered altogether, as the case may be; the operation of the Constitution is arrested, and the undoubted rights of this House to choose and of the people to have chosen a President by their immediate representatives is wholly defeated. The majority on this floor is the last and most emphatic expression of that public opinion which gave one of the candidates at the late election 300,000 majority of all the votes cast in the United States.

It is because we are such that the Constitution has given us the choice upon the partial failure of the electoral machinery. And we are required to proceed with this duty. "Immediately" upon the opening of the certificates. In these certificates we find "distinct lists" of the ballots respectively cast for President and Vice-President, and these are thus separate in order that such body may take and count those relating to the office to be in a given contingency filled by it, and thus to ascertain for itself whether that has arisen or not.

But I hold also, Mr. Speaker, that either House may take advice in the performance of these duties, and may employ any agency best designed to enlightened its conscience. If the two Houses see fit to join in the creation of a new tribunal for this purpose whose judgment is not final, and may not be arbitrary, I cannot see that the project is open to any future constitutional objection. The pending bill is not precisely what I would have made it, but I believe that it tends directly to peace, to reconciliation, and to substantial justice between the parties. Cherishing these views I shall cheerfully give this measure my support.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. H. S. MAGOON,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. MAGOON. Mr. Speaker, believing the bill to be unconstitutional, I have but one duty. As members of this House we have sworn to "support the Constitution;" not simply to follow or obey, but "to support." To trifle with an oath so solemn by yielding aid to a bill of even doubtful constitutionality, we should not; but to support a bill, palpably, to my judgment, in conflict with the Constitution, I cannot.

First. The Constitution provides, article 1, section 6, that—

No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created * * * during such time."

This bill, sir, creates a commission, requires its members to take an oath, clothes them respectively with new, with vast and independent powers, binding upon both the Government and the States; and then appoints five Senators and five members of this House to be ten tribunes in the high civil office thus created, and annuls the right of either House to withdraw any member after his appointment thereto.

Second. The Constitution requires, article 1, section 7, that—

Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary, except on a question of adjournment, shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him.

This bill, sir, proceeds solely on the theory that it is constitutionally necessary, and the bill makes it necessary for the concurrent act of both Houses to reject the electoral vote of a State from which there has been but one return; also, the bill gives the commission the power to reject all the votes from a State where there are more than one return; also, makes the concurrent act of both Houses essential to reverse any decision of the commission. In all which respective cases, whether the two Houses concurrently vote upon the question, or whether the commission decide for their concurrent voice, the President is utterly ignored. No resolution, no order, no vote is presented for the President's approval; but the bald ipse dixit of the two Houses, and of their delegated commission, is final, the approval of the President required by the Constitution to the contrary.

Third. The Government of the United States, Mr. Speaker, is a Government of granted powers. All powers not conferred by the Constitution, nor thereby necessarily implied, are reserved expressly to the States or the people. This is the language of the Constitution:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. —Constitution, Amendment 10.

To appoint electors, sir, for President and Vice-President is a power not delegated to either House of Congress or to both Houses jointly; but, on the contrary, the Constitution expressly provides that—

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.—Constitution, article 2, section 1.

Mark you the words. Not, sir, that each State may appoint, but "each State shall appoint." The power to appoint electors is thus recognized to be, not in either House or in both Houses, but in the State alone, to which goes the organic mandate, "Each State shall appoint!" If those powers, therefore, which are not delegated to the United States by the Constitution be reserved to the States or to the people, a fortiori, the power to appoint electors, thus expressly declared to be in the State, is no wise lodged in either House of Congress or in both Houses, but is constitutionally denied to them both.

Again, the Constitution provides, in reference to the electors and the lists of their votes for President and Vice-President, that those lists the electors "shall sign and certify and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted." (Constitutional amendment, article 12.)

This bill, Mr. Speaker, provides that an objection to the electoral return from any State may be made here in writing, signed by any Senator and Member of the House. And this even in the case where there has been but one return from the State. No matter if the State has appointed the electors constitutionally; no matter if the State has supreme authority over this subject, and sent hither but one return of the solemn action of its electors; no matter if the Constitution not only denies to Congress the appointment of electors but solemnly ordains that their "votes shall be counted;" yet, by this bill, when merely objection to such return is filed, the Senate must withdraw; and if the objection be sustained by a bare majority of both Houses, the votes "shall be" not "counted," but rejected.

Fourth. This bill deliberately takes from the President of the Senate all power to count the electoral votes. Who is the President of the Senate? Why, sir, the answer is in the Constitution:

The Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate.—Article 1, section 3.

He must have the same personal qualifications as the President himself:

No person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President.—Amendment 12.

Like the President, the Vice-President must be "a natural-born citizen," "thirty-five years" of age, "fourteen years a resident within the United States." (Article 2, section 1.) He is elected at the same time and in the same manner and for the same term as the President; not from a single district like members of the House, not from a single State like august Senators, but by the people of the whole United States through electors appointed in each State by their sovereign national will.

Side by side in the Government the President and the Vice-President stand clothed with vast responsibilities and powers, the one in the highest elective office in the world, and the other only second to the first—his personal co-equal and constitutional successor; yet over both, as a protection to the people, hangs everywhere the poised sword of impeachment.

While on the one hand, then, the executive power of this nation, great and tremendous as all must admit it to be, is vested in the President; while the President alone is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States; while he, with the Senate, makes treaties with the empires of the world, appoints foreign embassadors, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers whose appointment is not otherwise directed in the Constitution; yet on the other hand the Vice-President was intended in the Constitution of our fathers to perform three plainly designated duties:

First. To preside over the Senate.

Second. To act as President upon the death, resignation, or inability of the President.

Third. To safely keep the certified lists of the electoral returns as the sole constitutional custodian, and, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count the votes.

Such, in my judgment, is the text of the Constitution, together with the practice and precedents of many years of our national history. In 1789, 1797, 1801, 1805, 1809, 1813, 1817, and 1825, respectively, the Senate solemnly ordered the President of the Senate to transmit to the President and Vice-President-elect, at each of said presidential elections, a certificate of election expressly reciting that—

The President of the Senate did, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors.

But not only, in my judgment, does the stream of precedents combine with the text of the Constitution to anchor the right in the President of the Senate to count the votes, but plain reason teaches me that this is the safer construction. The highest officer in this nation, except one, may well be vested with this important trust. His personal qualifications required by the Constitution are greater than those required of any member of either House. Although it is not certain that a member of either House may be impeached for official misconduct, indeed precedents make it almost certain he cannot be, yet with the Vice-President there is no such uncertainty. The Constitution expressly ordains, he may be impeached.

Here, then, is the officer, the President of the Senate, who under the Constitution receives the electoral returns, keeps them till the day appointed for opening, and then, in the presence of both Houses as witnesses, he, the representative not of a district or of a State, but of the nation; he, bound by his oath of office and in the peril of impeachment for misconduct, "opens all the certificates and counts the votes." With deference and respect to both Houses, nevertheless my judgment is that it is safer to intrust this power to count the votes, necessarily at times both difficult and intricate, comprehending perhaps both political and judicial questions, to the Vice-President alone than it is to either House alone or to both Houses alone.

But, sir, this bill robs the President of the Senate of any power to count at all. It locks up the counting in the two Houses alone or in their delegated commission. It reverses precedent; drives away the President of the Senate from the counting; ignores the President of the United States himself as a part of the law-making power; centralizes in the two Houses the electoral votes of the States; thus striking a blow into the vitals of the Government by expedients temporary in their intended scope, but dangerous at last to the welfare and peace of our Republic.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. T. J. HENDERSON,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, for the first time in the history of our country, under our present form of Government, we are met with grave and serious difficulties in determining the important question who have been constitutionally and legally elected to the high offices of President and Vice-President of the United States. The great difficulty now presented is in ascertaining and determining where the power and duty rest, under the Constitution, to count the electoral vote and to declare who are elected President and Vice-President of the United States for the next four years, from the 4th day of March next. I say, Mr. Speaker, in determining under the Constitution, for the reason that, if it be granted that Congress has the power to legislate upon the subject and to provide by whom and in what manner the electoral vote shall be counted, it has neglected for a period of more than eighty-seven years to exercise such power and to provide by law in what manner and by whom the electoral vote shall be counted.

To-day, Mr. Speaker, we have many conflicting views and opinions on the question who is to count the electoral vote and determine who has been legally and constitutionally elected President and Vice-President; and these views and opinions are intensified by political and partisan prejudices and interests. Some claim that Congress alone has the power to count the vote and declare the result. Others hold that either House, acting for itself and independently of the other, can judge for itself whether a vote shall be counted or not; and, therefore, that no vote can be counted, unless both Houses agree that it shall be. Others still claim that the two Houses meet in joint convention and count the vote, and that a vote is taken on all questions arising, and that members of the Senate and House vote per capita, as members of a joint convention. And still others claim that the President of the Senate alone has the power, and that it is his duty under the Constitution to open and to count the vote and to declare who is elected. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult at this time to determine correctly the proper construction of the constitutional provision relating to the counting of the electoral vote. And why? Because of our political prejudices and partisan interests. The determination of this question and the adoption of any one of these modes claimed, by which the vote may be counted, may determine which party shall control the administration of the Government and enjoy its immense patronage for the next four years. Neither party has any confidence in the other, and the difficulty is greatly augmented by the fact that both parties claim the election of their respective candidates. And neither will yield to any construction of the Constitution or to any plan of adjustment which does not result, or at least give some promise that will result, in the success of their respective candidates.

Turn which way we may there seems to be danger. Mr. Speaker, at least danger is talked of. And I fear that danger will not be lessened by mere expedients, by temporizing with the troubles that threaten us. Our safety lies in our wisdom and patriotism, in our ability to rise above the shadows of political prejudices and interests, and in the light of truth and of an earnest patriotism, to determine what is right and just in settling the result of the presidential question by the constitutional mode, whatever that may be held to be.

Mr. Speaker, I have not intended to make any elaborate speech on the question now before the House, nor on other questions relating to the presidential question and which are now of such deep interest to us and to the country. But I desire to express my opinions on some of these questions and to give some of the reasons which will influence my vote on the bill now under consideration. After much careful investigation and thought, I have arrived at the conclusion that Kent was entirely correct in his supposition or opinion that in the absence of legislation on the subject, it is the duty of the President of the Senate to count the electoral vote. I am not so clear as to the power to legislate, but incline to the opinion that he would have been justified in going further and declaring that the Constitution made it the duty of the President of the Senate to count the electoral vote, and that it was intended he should do so; and that therefore there is no casus omissus in the Constitution, as is claimed by very many able and learned men. But unless the President of the Senate is to count the vote under the Constitution then there was a casus omissus in that provision of the Constitution unquestionably.

I know, Mr. Speaker, there are no express words in the Constitution which say the President of the Senate shall count the votes, neither are there any words which say that any other officer or officers, or that any other body or bodies of men shall do it, nor any from which it can be implied that anybody else is to do it other than the President of the Senate. During the discussions on this question it has frequently been said: "If the framers of the Constitution intended the President of the Senate to count the vote the insertion of two words, 'by him,' after the word 'counted,' would have made it clear and left no doubt about their intention." That is true, Mr. Speaker, and I can say with as much force of reason and of logic that if the framers of the Constitution intended that the Senate and House of Representatives should count the votes it would have been quite as easy to have said so by adding, after the word "counted," the words, "by the Senate and House of Representatives." So that the provision of the Constitution would have read: "The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted by the Senate and House of Representatives." Then there would have been no doubt about the intention. But it is said as the Constitution only says the President of the Senate is to open the certificates, you are therefore to infer from that that he was not to do anything else but to open them. If that is good reasoning, then it can be said with quite as much force, and I think a great deal more, that as the Constitution only requires the Senate and House to be present when the certificates are opened and the vote counted, therefore it was not intended that the two Houses should count the vote. The original Constitution as well as the twelfth amendment provided that the certificates or lists of persons voted for, and the number of votes for each, should be directed to the President of the Senate; so that he is to be the custodian of them. And it further provides that he is to open all the certificates, and when he opens them in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, then, that is, at that time, and when the Senate and House of Representatives are present, the votes shall be counted. Now it is universally admitted that it is not said by whom the votes shall be counted in words; but in the absence of any words whatever from which it can be inferred that the Senate and House of Representatives are to count the vote, or that any other officer than the President of the Senate is to count the vote, then the conclusion seems to me irresistible that the President of the Senate, in whose hands the certificates are, and who opens them in the presence of the two Houses, and who is not required to deliver them to the Senate and House, nor to any other person to count, shall count the votes himself.

Mr. Speaker, in connection with this whole matter of the electoral votes and of the counting of them there is not one syllable said in the Constitution about the "Senate and House of Representatives," except that the certificates are to be opened in their presence and that the vote shall then be counted; and the word then undoubtedly means and was intended to require that the votes should be counted at that time when the Senate and House were present. There is nothing affirmed of the two Houses of Congress, no duty imposed upon them, no power nor authority conferred upon them in the counting of the electoral votes, except the duty to be present when the certificates shall be opened and the votes counted. But it is asked: What are the two Houses present for? As the Constitution is as silent as the grave as to any duty they are present to perform, the answer is, they are there as witnesses, as spectators, to witness the performance of what the framers of the Constitution did not anticipate would be a very difficult duty to perform. They are there not to make the opportunity themselves for making a President and Vice-President, respectively, but to know whether these officers have been elected by the people through the electoral colleges, and if not, then immediately to elect, as the Constitution requires, the House a President and the Senate a Vice-President. It may well be doubted, Mr. Speaker, whether the framers of the Constitution ever intended the Senate and House of Representatives to exercise any control over the counting of the electoral votes when they are in certain contingencies, which by their own acts they may create if given the power to act judicially in counting the electoral votes, to elect the President and Vice-President. I think we can see the danger to-day if that were so. I firmly believe that Hayes and Wheeler have been fairly and justly elected President and Vice-President of the United States. I have no doubt but they have been. That belief may be the result of political bias; but if I am correct the same political bias prevents the democrats, who are in a large majority in this House, from seeing it. And if they had the power to-day over the electoral vote I do not for one moment doubt but that Hayes and Wheeler would be counted out; or else it would be held that there was no election by the people, and the House would assume to elect a President. In fact I have heard and seen that course talked of and advocated as the right and proper course for the democrats to pursue. Yet every sensible man knows that there has been an election by the people; that the electors of all the States of the Union have been appointed or elected; that they have cast their votes for one or the other of two candidates only, and therefore that one or the other must be legally elected President. And for this House to attempt to elect a President, or for the Senate to attempt to elect a Vice-President, would be a most unwarrantable usurpation of power and would amount in itself to revolution.

Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me that a careful examination of the history of this provision of the Constitution must satisfy a reasonable mind that the framers of the Constitution intended that the President of the Senate should be the proper person to count the vote. Now let us examine that history for a moment.

The first provision we find on this subject in the proceedings of the constitutional convention, as we learn both from the Journal of the convention and from the Madison Papers, is:

> The President of the Senate shall, in that House, open all the certificates; and the votes shall be then and there counted, &c.

This is the first proposition made by the committee of eleven in their report to the convention, September 4, 1787, and let it be borne in mind that the only difference between this and the proposition finally adopted is that the words "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives" are substituted for the words "in that House," and the words "and there" were stricken out. Now I do not think the word "House" was intended to mean the room or place where the Senate met simply, but it was intended that the certificates should be opened in the Senate, sitting as a Senate. And if the construction of the clause as it was finally adopted is correct, that the two Houses are to count the vote, then it will be claimed also that as the proposition was originally presented to the convention it was intended that the Senate should count the vote, for the form of expression is the same, "and the votes shall then and there be counted." But was it the intention then that the Senate should count the vote? There is no evidence of it; none whatever. But, on the contrary, on the 6th of September, 1787, we find that the seventh clause, the one in question, was amended by inserting the words "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives" after the word "counted." And if it had remained that way the clause would have read: "The President of the Senate shall, in that House, open all the certificates and the votes shall then and there be counted in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives." And in that case there could be no doubt as to the intention that the Senate and House should have nothing to do with the counting of the votes, but were only to be present when it was done. For it would be absurd to say that, "the votes shall then and there be counted in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives," if those two bodies were to count the votes. And yet this amendment left the language of the provision as it was, "the votes shall then and there be counted" in the presence of, &c." This makes it very clear to my mind that the constitutional convention by the adoption of that amendment did not intend the two Houses to count the vote. Is there any evidence that the members of the constitutional convention changed that intention? I think not. The only possible evidence is that the words of the clause were afterward transposed, and the words "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives" were inserted in lieu of the words "in that House," and after the word "shall;" so that the clause as adopted reads:

> The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

But it will be noticed that the form of construction or expression is the same as it was originally in the first report of the committee of eleven: that is, "shall open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted;" and, whether the words "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives" are inserted after the word "shall," in the middle of the clause, or after the word "counted," at the end of it, in my opinion, makes no difference as to the proper interpretation of the provision and in determining what the intention of the framers of the Constitution was as to how and by whom the votes were to be counted. To say that the change of the form of construction was intended to give the two Houses the controlling power over the count is to charge the framers of the Constitution with wonderful stupidity, or with a deliberate and willful intention to leave in doubt how and by whom the vote was to be counted; for, if it occurred to them as to whether the two Houses were to exercise a controlling power over the count or whether the President of the Senate was to count, and it was determined, after they had agreed that the vote should be counted "in the presence of the Senate and House," that they would change the provision and make it the duty of the Senate and House to count the votes, is it not strange, passing strange, that they would have signified that intention by simply changing the form of expression—by transposing the words "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives," putting them in a different place, and leaving the language as to the counting of the votes substantially as it had been all the time before, and still saying nothing about the Senate and House of Representatives whatever, except that the certificates were to be opened in their presence? If it was intended to change the clause, and make it the duty of the Senate and House of Representatives to count the vote, after they had adopted the amendment—which only required that the votes should be counted "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives," and which unquestionably excludes the idea that the Senate and House were to count the vote—then it occurs to me the framers of the Constitution certainly would have used such language as would have made it clear that it was intended by them that the Senate and House should count the votes. The transposition of the words did not do that, Mr. Speaker; and hence it occurs to me that the authors of the Constitution did not intend any different interpretation by the simple change of the form of construction, and that it is intended to mean precisely the same as if the words "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives" had remained after the word "counted." But did the framers of the Constitution put any interpretation upon this provision so that we may fairly judge what their intention was as to the counting of the votes? I think they did, and that, if any doubt was created by the transposition of the words "in the presence of," &c., that doubt was removed by the acts and resolutions of the convention, adopted September 13, 1787. After the convention had concluded or was about to conclude its labors, the following resolution was adopted on the 13th day of September, 1787, as preliminary to putting the new government in operation under the Constitution just adopted by them, viz:

> Resolved, That it is the opinion of this convention that, as soon as the conventions of nine States shall have ratified this Constitution, the United States in Congress assembled should fix a day on which electors should be appointed by the States which shall have ratified the same, and a day on which the electors should assemble to vote for the President, and the time and place for commencing proceedings under this Constitution; that, after such publication, the electors should be appointed and the Senators and Representatives elected; that the electors should meet on the day fixed for the election of the President, and should transmit their votes, certified, signed, sealed, and directed as the Constitution requires, to the Secretary of the United States in Congress assembled; that the Senators and Representatives should convene at the time and place assigned; that the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President; and that, after he shall be chosen, the Congress, together with the President, should without delay proceed to execute this Constitution.

Now, here immediately after the adoption of this very clause of the Constitution, and before the convention adjourned, we find its members, in the resolution just read, recommending necessary action for the purpose of putting the new Government in operation; and among other things it was recommended that "the Senators and Representatives should convene at the time and place assigned, and that the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President." This resolution shows plainly how the framers of the Constitution understood their own acts, and what they intended in regard to the counting of the votes. The Constitution had not yet gone into operation. There was no President of the Senate to open and count the votes as provided in the Constitution, and the convention recommended or expressed the opinion that the Senate should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose, not only of receiving and opening, but of counting the votes for President. And why, Mr. Speaker, did they make this recommendation? Why did they not let the Senate and House count the first votes? It has been said over and over again, by men who claim to be the embodiment of all wisdom and who sneer at the idea that it was ever intended the President of the Senate should count the votes, that the framers of the Constitution never intended to confer such tremendous power upon one man. All such are answered, fully and completely answered, by saying that is just what the framers of the Constitution expressed the opinion should be done at the first election under the Constitution, namely, that one man should be elected for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President. If it was proper at the first election, why not at subsequent elections? If it was so dangerous a power that the framers of the Constitution never could have intended to confer it upon one man, why, I repeat, did they express the opinion it should be conferred upon one man in case of the first election of a President under the Constitution, and that in contravention of the Constitution, the work of their own hands, if they intended the Senate and House should count the vote? This was not only the opinion and recommendation of the men who made the Constitution, but when Congress assembled in 1789, the Senate, on the 6th day of April of that year, proceeded by ballot to the choice of a President for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes for President of the United States, and John Langdon was elected. The very first order of the Senate relating to the counting of the vote is very important in determining how and by whom it was understood the counting of the votes was to be done. It is as follows:

Ordered, That Mr. Ellsworth inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is formed; that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States, in the choice of a President and Vice-President of the United States; and that the Senate is now ready in the Senate Chamber to proceed in the presence of the House to discharge that duty; and that the Senate have appointed one of their members to sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared, submitting it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their members for the like purpose.

This message was delivered to the House by Mr. Ellsworth, and the Senate was notified by the House of Representatives that the House was ready forthwith to meet the Senate, not to count the votes, Mr. Speaker, but "to attend the opening and counting of the votes."

Now, the language of the order read is that the Senate will proceed not with the House to discharge whatever duty was intended, but "in the presence of the House." Why do they use that language? Because the Constitution required the President of the Senate, who had just been appointed by the Senate for the sole purpose of opening and counting the vote, to perform that duty in the presence of the Senate and House. But it is said they appointed tellers. This is true; but it is perfectly consistent for them to have done so without having any controlling power over the count of the votes. They were required to be present when the votes were counted, and by tellers the votes as declared could be verified. The language of the order is that the teller appointed by the Senate was to make a list of the votes as declared, and the Senate only submitted it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their number for a like purpose. These tellers were not to count the votes for the two Houses, but to make lists of the votes as declared. Declared by whom? Not by the Senate and House, but by the President of the Senate. This is made certain by the proceedings in the House as shown by the Journal of the House. For after the votes were counted and the House of Representatives had returned to the House, the Journal says:

Mr. Parker and Mr. Heister (tellers appointed on the part of the House) then delivered in at the Clerk's table a list of the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice-President of the United States, as the same were declared by the President of the Senate in the presence of the Senate and of this House, using the language of the Constitution:

And the Journal of the Senate is as follows:

The Speaker and the House of Representatives attended in the Senate Chamber, and the President elected for the purpose of counting the votes declared that the Senate and House of Representatives had met, and that he, in their presence, had opened and counted the votes of the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, &c.

This was in case of the first election of President of the United States, and was done agreeably to the Constitution of the United States, as appears from the certificate of Mr. Langdon, prepared by a committee of the Senate under the order of the Senate. That certificate has been so often repeated I will not read it. But it states that the President of the Senate "did, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for a President and Vice-President."

Without encumbering my remarks or the RECORD by repeating extracts from the Journals of Congress and reading certificates of various Presidents of the Senate who certify that they had counted the votes for President and Vice-President, and which will appear so often in other speeches in the RECORD, I will say that I find in 1801, and again in 1805, resolutions adopted by the Senate that the Senate would be ready to receive the House of Representatives on certain days, not to count the votes, but "for the purpose of being present at the opening and counting of the votes for President and Vice-President." And in 1805, the House of Representatives resolved—

That this House will attend in the Chamber of the Senate this day, at noon, for the purpose of being present at the opening and counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

Not, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of counting the votes with the Senate, but of being present at the counting of the votes; and which excludes the idea that the two Houses were to count the votes most unquestionably. We find also that not only John Langdon in 1789, but John Adams, President of the Senate in 1797; Thomas Jefferson, President of the Senate in 1801, and he himself then a candidate for President, as Adams was in 1797; and Aaron Burr, President of the Senate in 1805, each and all of them certified under their hands and seals that they had at the time stated, respectively, "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, opened the certificates and counted the votes for President."

Mr. Speaker, whatever doubts may have arisen since or may exist now as to the construction to be put upon this provision of our Constitution, as to the counting of the votes for President, there can be no doubt as to how it was understood and construed by the makers of it and by those acting under it at the time of its adoption and for many years afterward. And to-day I have no doubt, sir, that it was the manifest intention of the framers of the Constitution, and especially in the absence of legislation on the subject, that the President of the Senate should open and also count the electoral votes for President and Vice-President. Why not, Mr. Speaker? It is said he ought not to count the vote because he may be a candidate for President himself. Is that a good reason? I think not. If it is, a man should not be elected judge because he may have a suit to be tried in the court over which he presides; and it is a familar maxim of the law that "no man shall be a judge in his own cause." I should doubt the propriety of a President of the Senate counting the electoral votes if a candidate himself for President, and certainly if such eminent men as John Adams and Thomas Jefferson had not done so or otherwise certified to a falsehood. If they did not certify to a falsehood, did not count the electoral votes themselves when candidates as certified by them, they certainly in their respective certificates indulged in figures of speech which make an ugly record against them. But if it be improper for a President of the Senate when a candidate for President, to count the votes, if his modesty inclines him to do so, he can allow the Senate to appoint a President pro tempore while he takes a trip to Long Branch or Saratoga.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is said the President of the Senate is a mere "figure-head;" that he is not a member of any department of the Government, and he has no voice nor vote except in case of a tie; that he only presides over the Senate as a sort of ornamental appendage. It is true that in certain contingencies, they admit that he may be President of the United States. But the idea is ridiculed of such an important duty being performed by one occupying so insignificant a position. Why, Mr. Speaker, I can see much danger in giving to the House of Representatives a controlling influence in the "counting in" or "counting out" of a President when the House is to elect if none is declared elected upon counting the electoral votes; and the same may be said of the Senate, which is to elect a Vice-President in case none is declared elected upon counting the electoral votes. In doubtful cases upon some flimsy pretense the two Houses, when an election is close, may usurp the rights of the people, declare certain votes illegal, claim that there has been no election by the electoral colleges, and then proceed to elect by the House a President who may have received a minority only of the electoral votes. If there is anything certain in the history of our Government it is, that it was the intention of those who established it to keep the several departments of it separate and distinct from and independent of each other; and to-day, in the light or in the darkness of the present hour, I do not think it would be safe to allow this House to make its own opportunity to elect a President of its own choice, whatever may be said of the President of the Senate and of the danger of his exercising the power to count the electoral votes.

But, to close my views of this question Who is to count the vote? I will say that the very fact that the President of the Senate does not belong to any of the departments of the Government, but is at the head of the Senate—the body representing the States; and that it may well be presumed that he has been selected by the people for his high charcter, for his ability, honor, and integrity, because he is in certain contingencies to fill the high office of President of the United States and discharge its responsible duties, (far greater and more responsible than to count the electoral votes)—is the most satisfactory evidence to my mind that the framers of the Constitution intended that he, the President of the Senate, should count the electoral votes and declare the result of the election, and that the Senate and House of Representatives were only required to be present when the act was done.

This, sir, is the conclusion of my mind as to the intention of the fathers of the Constitution. I can see no danger, sir, in standing by the constitutional mode of counting the votes, and if the conclusion I with so many others have arrived at be not correct, then it is our duty to arrive at a correct conclusion and have the matter settled either by legislation or by constitutional amendment. I believe in meeting questions which are likely to affect not only ourselves but future generations fairly and calmly, and in the light of reason and of patriotism to settle them upon sound and just principles. Threats, bluster, and bravado give no evidence of statesmanship nor of patriotism. I have but little faith in temporizing with national troubles, in adopting mere expedients to tide over difficulties when the difficulties should be radically remedied. I know that medicine is sometimes given, not to cure but simply to relieve pain; and this I fear is the most that the bill from the select committee on counting the electoral vote, now under consideration, will do, even if it does that. I have great respect for the committee and a very high appreciation of their ability and patriotism, and if the bill passes, as I have no doubt it will, I trust good may result from it. But I doubt the constitutional power to pass it. I doubt whether the good anticipated to result from it will be realized; and I believe, whatever the result may be by the mode proposed, the defeated party will be no better satisfied; and above all I believe that there is an almost absolute certainty that the result, whatever it may be, and in favor of whichever party it may be, will affect the character of the justices of the Supreme Court who are to compose a part of the commission provided for in the bill. Four judges are selected by the bill so that it is understood two are democrats and two are republicans. I do not like this, Mr. Speaker. I cannot approve of it. I have the highest respect for the Supreme Court and for all the judicial tribunals of our country, and I do not desire to see the high character of our judges, especially of the Supreme Court, the highest tribunal of the land, compromised and endangered by making them political judges to decide political controversies. For this reason as well as others I cannot vote for this bill.

But, Mr. Speaker, I will vote for any proper bill to refer to the Supreme Court, sitting as a court, any judicial question connected with the counting of the electoral votes. Or, if it is not the law now, I will vote for a bill providing for a trial of title to the office of President, so that no man can be unlawfully "counted in" as President; for, while I have not proposed to say anything about the late election, I believe in a fair election and I abhor practices of fraud in elections. Our safety is in the purity and freedom of the ballot-box, and those we must preserve at all hazards, or the Republic is sooner or later lost. Fraud and force must not be tolerated. And, while so many gentlemen on the other side of the House are so much afraid of the Army and are complaining of the use of a few soldiers here and there to preserve the public peace under the law, no word of condemnation, no protest is ever heard from their lips against armed bodies of men, rifle clubs, parading around the country for weeks before an election, attending and preventing political meetings, and intending to interfere with the rights of citizens and the freedom of the ballot-box. That this was done at and preceding the late election in several States, and with the intention of controlling and carrying the election, there can be no doubt in the mind of any reasonable man who is not deaf to all evidence. Yet honorable gentlemen on this floor, who would impeach the President of the United States for sending a small squad of soldiers to preserve the peace and to maintain the rights of citizens, utter no word of condemnation against these lawless bands of armed men, unrestrained by law. In the language of the great Roman orator we may well exclaim, "O tempora! O mores!" I tell those gentlemen that the distinguished services of President Grant, both civil and military, will be remembered by a grateful people. He is soon to retire from his present high office, and perhaps from the public service forever, but his name and his fame will be dear to the hearts of the American people when the memory of his defamers and traducers will have perished from the earth, to be remembered no more forever.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to see peace and fraternity established throughout all our borders. I desire that every citizen, whatever may be his race or color, shall enjoy in the most perfect freedom all the rights guaranteed to him by the Constitution and all the constitutional amendments; and when this shall be the condition of our country then will the institutions of our country and this great Republic be established on a rock. I have no patience, Mr. Speaker, with the man or association of men who talk about war, about the settlement of national questions by other than peaceful modes. Woe to the man who first lifts his voice or his arm against the peace of this country. A curse upon his name and a curse upon his memory forever!

Mr. Speaker, "our days on the earth are as a shadow." All that now hear my voice and all that are now in authority or who may be during the next four years will soon have passed away; but this great Republic and these grand and glorious institutions of ours must live, and, I trust, live FOREVER.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide
In the strife of truth with falsehood, for the good or evil side;
Then it is the brave man chooses, while the coward stands aside,
Doubting in his abject spirit till his Lord is crucified.

SPEECH OF HON. GEORGE W. CATE,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. CATE. Mr. Speaker, we are told by the friends of this measure that there exists great excitement and uneasiness in the public mind, and almost entire prostration in business, by reason of the doubt and uncertainty regarding the final termination of the muddle over the electoral vote, and an apprehension that serious consequences, perhaps bloodshed, will follow. Well, sir, there is undoubtedly much uneasiness in the public mind, an apprehension of impending evil, growing out of this question beyond what has ever been felt before. And why is it? Because of any doubt in the public mind as to where the exact truth is? because of any doubt as to where the Constitution has placed the power to count the votes and determine the result of the late election? or because of a want of confidence in the body possessing such power to deliver full and complete justice in this matter? Any apprehensions of evil arising from the determination of the contest in accordance with the Constitution as interpreted and construed by all men and all parties from the first to the last election? Not at all; but all the excitement and uneasiness prevading the public mind is wholly and entirely due to the wicked pretensions of certain prominent men in the republican party that they would not submit to a counting of the votes as they have hitherto been counted, but that the votes shall be counted by the President of the Senate, and that he is the sole judge of how many and what votes shall be counted; that he and the Senate would declare who was elected, and that if the House after such a declaration should attempt the election of Tilden the members would be promptly arrested—a proposition startling to the average mind in view of the fact that in no possible contingency has the Senate the power to elect or declare anybody elected President of the United States, and well calculated to produce alarm among a people who are and ought to be jealous of their liberties, and who have in the recent past submitted to about as much usurpation as they are willing to bear.

The people believed that if these pretenses and threats were carried into execution there would be trouble and perhaps a civil war, because such things would not be tolerated. A fear that Hayes is about to be inaugurated by the use of the Army of the United States in defiance of the unquestioned belief that he was defeated, in short, a fear arising from the sayings of prominent men in the republican party that the settled law of the land was to be defied and trampled under foot at the dictation of the bold conspirators who have assumed to speak for the party, has created all this alarm and uneasiness and fear of war, and was designed for that very purpose, to drive the democratic party to abandon the old well-beaten path in which all the electoral votes heretofore cast have been peaceably and satisfactorily counted and accept in its place some other mode more favorable to them. There has been no fears of strife if the Constitution is observed, but only in case it is wholly ignored in the interest of a defeated candidate.

We are told that a compromise like that proposed is in the interest of peace and will bring a revival in business. I do not so regard it; peace will be insured if the time-honored precedents be followed, and confidence in the stability of our institutions be fully restored, and the public mind will at once become tranquil. A sort of "bull-dozing" process has been resorted to from the first to disturb and distract the public mind and create an apprehension of danger that could only be diverted by a resort to other modes of counting the vote than the mode hitherto in practice. This was commenced on the day following the election by the announcement that Hayes had received 185 votes, and was elected, which was untrue, or at least was not known to be true, and therefore none the less a falsehood, but was designed to prepare the public mind for what should follow, and there has followed from that time to the present a most wicked and fiendish attempt to force an abandonment of well-known and approved methods, and the adoption of methods novel and untried, but out of which, or by means of which these bold conspirators expect to be able successfully to thwart the will of the people. To allay all this excitement it is only necessary that these pretensions be abandoned and submit to the usual methods of counting the vote. The people are never alarmed or excited over the observance of the settled law. I will now briefly give my reasons for opposing this bill; and first, who all count the vote.

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

Three principal questions arise upon this clause of the Constitution; first, by whom shall the votes be counted; secondly, what shall be counted; and thirdly, to what shall the inquiry extend. In virtue of the law the Vice-President is the custodian of the returns until the time of counting, at which time he is commanded to open them in the presence of the two Houses. His duties are specific and clearly defined, and it is a familiar rule in the construction of powers that when specified enumerated powers are granted there can be no implied powers except such as may be necessary to the execution of such as are specifically conferred. Such minute and particular specification of granted power of itself excludes the idea of the grant of any additional power, upon the theory that having attempted to define the power or authority conferred in relation to a particular subject, it will be presumed that all the authority intended to be invested has been fully and specifically defined.

Why was the President of the Senate required to produce the returns and open them in the presence of the two Houses? For no other reason than because he had the possession, because he was the custodian of them. There is not in the whole Constitution in relation to this subject the delegation to the President of the Senate of a single scintilla of power or authority beyond that conferred upon any member of the House, or upon any other member of the Senate, the right to preside in the separate deliberations of the Senate and give the casting vote in case of an equal division; but as to possessing any particular power or control over the joint convention, it is not to be found in the Constitution. And yet there are found gentlemen who, in the face of this silence of the Constitution, contend that the power to accomplish the grand act of the occasion, the only object of the meeting of the two Houses, is vested in the President of the Senate; an unusual way to confer such an important power.

No, sir; at best it can only be claimed to be an inferential power in the President of the Senate, and the best argument that can be urged to rebut any such inference, an argument that ought to be conclusive at least upon the two Houses of Congress, is the fact that from the first convention that assembled for that purpose to the last the two Houses always did count the vote—ordinarily, perhaps always, by the instrumentality of tellers appointed by their direction from each body, as a means of exercising the right and duty of the two Houses, because each member could not count, neither could the whole body count; but as a means of convenience only, the tellers being no more or less than the organs, the instruments of the two bodies to ascertain a fact, and their acts in the premises to all intents and purposes are the acts of the two Houses.

Sir, it is significant of the merits of this question that until the present time there has been no difference of opinion as to the right of the two Houses to count the votes for President and Vice-President, and whenever any discussion involving that right has arisen it has not been so much to combat an opposite opinion as to protect the rights and privileges of the two Houses against unintentioned abrasion. The people of this country are and should be jealous of their liberties and are naturally opposed to an unnecessary centralization of power, and to-day they look with alarm upon this new doctrine; new because never before asserted with any considerable confidence by anybody that such an important power had been lodged with any one man in this country; a power that he may be, as he has been, called upon to exercise in a case where he is himself acandidate for President; a power which may enable him by the manipulation of votes to declare himself elected in opposition to the true state of the vote, and for which there may be no redress but by revolution.

The power of determining the result of an election for President and Vice-President is a great power, to inquire into the election and determine from the returns and other proper evidence who has received a majority of the legal votes, involving, as the inquiry necessarily must in closely contested elections, the question "What is a vote?" "What votes are to be counted?" "Which are the votes that represent the true will of the people of a State?" because none others can be counted, call them by whatever name you please, the power to reject and the power to count, and you have some idea of the tremendous and dangerous prerogative claimed for the President of the Senate.

That no man shall be permitted to be a judge in his own case or in a case in which he is interested is a fundamental principle in the polity of this country, recognized and practiced in every department of the Government, from the highest to lowest. Freedom of all personal interest is absolutely necessary to impartial judgment; even send a juryman from the box if he is related to either party within the third or fourth degree and looks with suspicion and discredit upon the testimony of a witness who is related however remotely to the party for whom he testifies. Yet gentlemen contend for the lodgment of a power in the President of the Senate where the inducements to use that power for his own advancement are beyond estimate. This is a strong argument that the power has not been given, because such a consideration could scarcely have escaped the attention of the framers of the Constitution. They must have anticipated that the President of the Senate, usually the Vice-President, would himself be a candidate for the office of President and entitled to participate in counting the electoral vote; and the impropriety of him being the sole judge must have been as apparent to them as it is to us and explains the singular phraseology of the Constitution. To the popular mind it will be one of the strangest arguments, the magnitude of the power to be vested in one man, however eminent and able and however pure and exalted he may be.

In a debate occurring on this subject at the last session of Congress Senator CHRISTIANCY said:

> There seems to me a fair though not conclusive inference that it is not made the duty of the President of the Senate to count them—
> The votes—
> because, if this had been intended, the language in that connection would naturally have been as already suggested by several Senators, "the President of the Senate shall open all the certificates and count the votes."

And it is instructive to find that, while all the more able Senators in both political parties participated in that debate, not one, so far as I have observed, favored the idea that the President of the Senate had power to count the vote, and this, too, at a time when there were no reasons to anticipate the circumstances by which we are now surrounded, and will therefore be accepted by the country as the calm and well-matured judgment of the Senate. In 1821, Mr. Clay declared in the Senate that the counting was by the two Houses, and there was no one to deny it in a body at that time containing as able men as this country has ever produced. In 1857, the right of the President of the Senate to decide as to the counting of the vote of a State objected to was denied in the most emphatic manner and asserted by none, although the then acting President of the Senate disclaimed any such power and declared that he had not assumed to exercise such a right, and the right of the two Houses to determine what is a vote within the meaning of the Constitution, and what votes, if any, shall be counted, was maintained in the most determined manner by Senators Seward, Douglas, Crittenden, Stanton, Toombs, Butler, Wilson, Collamer, and others, and while no action was taken toward defining the relative powers of the two Houses and the President of the Senate in counting the electoral vote, because the exigencies of the case did not demand any, still the expressions of opinion can lead to but one conclusion, namely, that the power of deciding what votes should be counted is vested in the two Houses of Congress. Such also was the general opinion of the members of the House of Representatives as expressed on that occasion.

But the most direct and notable construction of the Constitution occurred in the enactment of the twenty-second joint rule just prior to counting the electoral vote in 1865, and under which the vote in that year and 1869 and 1873 were counted without difficulty, and under which the present contest would have been peaceably and fairly settled had it pleased the party responsible for the rule to be governed by it, although it had served the party for three presidential elections and the votes of States had been counted and rejected by the two Houses under its provisions. That rule construed the Constitution to lodge in the two Houses the power to count the electoral vote, and in case of a dispute to decide what votes, if any, from a given State should be counted, and demanded a concurrence of the two Houses to admit the vote of any State to be counted if it was objected to, giving to either House the power to exclude a vote if in its judgment it ought to be excluded. But now, unhappily for the peace of the country, men who are responsible for the rule and have participated in its execution from its inception to the present time without perceiving its injustice, can hardly find suitable words to express their detestation of it. It is pronounced monstrous that a vote of a State can be rejected by the action of but one of the two Houses. Ay, it is monstrous that a democratic House should have the power to reject the vote of a State, but it was not considered monstrous for a republican House to reject the vote of a State, and probably would have continued to be so considered had the republicans retained power in both Houses; but having lost the control of one body beyond hope of recovery, and having quite as unexpectedly secured the vote of a portion of the "solid South" though by means the most disreputable, these conscientious gentlemen can no longer conceal their disapproval of this iniquitous rule, especially as under it, if justice should prevail, their party would be sure to lose their vote in the solid South and with it Hayes would lose his election. But I was speaking of the legislative precedents tending to establish the right of the two Houses to count the electoral vote. On the 25th day of February, 1875, Mr. MORTON introduced a bill to provide for and regulate the counting of the electoral vote, the prominent feature of which was that the power to count and determine the result was in the two Houses of Congress.

In case of two sets of returns, it provides that the two Houses shall decide which shall be counted, and in case there is a disagreement between them as to which shall be counted, the vote of the State is lost; in other words, the concurrence of both bodies is required to receive and count the vote where there are two returns. The bill passed the Senate on the same day, but was lost in the House; but the discussion in the Senate developes the remarkable fact, in view of recent occurrences, that the Senate was almost unanimous in the opinion that the right of counting was in the two Houses. At the commencement of the next Congress, Mr. MORTON introduced a similar bill upon which final action has not been had, but the discussion of the principles involved was more elaborate and characterized by more ability and learning than upon any other measure before Congress, and showed that almost the entire body concurred in the opinion that to the two Houses had been given the jurisdiction to count the electoral vote. Thus in support of the power of the two Houses to count the vote we have the uniform practice of one hundred years; the enactment of the twenty-second joint rule by Congress, signed and approved by President Lincoln and yet in force; the passage through the Senate of a bill expressly recognizing the power, and the introduction of a second similar bill in the Senate which received the indorsement of all the prominent Senators of both parties; and yet, with all this unbroken history before us, there rises up like the ghost in the play a party to deny this rule, as Peter denied his Master, under the leadership of men who have been instrumental in producing this very history, who, if not responsible for the enactment of this rule, assisted in administering it for years without objection and so long as it promised aid and comfort to their party. Upon my construction of the Constitution, and the record I have referred to, I rest this part of my argument, except to add that this bill expressly admits the power.

This bill lodges the power to count in all disputed cases where there is but one return from a State in the two Houses, but in cases of double returns the power to decide is placed in the commission. To my mind this is clearly unconstitutional. What right has the Congress to delegate this important duty imposed upon it by the Constitution to any other body or person? Clearly none at all. If we once admit that this power is by the Constitution delegated to the Houses—and so far the friends of this bill are concerned it must be conceded for the purposes of this argument, because the bill admits the power—any other power imposed upon Congress may just as well be transferred, and any duty imposed may just as well be shirked as this. Will anybody pretend that the Congress could refer to the President or any other department of the Government the power to decide a contested-election case of a member of Congress? And why not? Because the power and duty in that regard is placed in the two Houses, an answer that is impregnable to any criticism. The Constitution has within certain limits defined the separate and independent powers of the several departments of the Government and within which each is independent of the other. Now will anybody pretend that the executive department might impose upon either of the other departments the discharge of any duty imposed upon it by the Constitution or that the judicial might create a commission of learned men to determine an important and difficult case pending in it? How apparent is the absurdity of such a proposition. And yet that is just what this bill does; and it is no answer to say that it is being done by the law-making power, because it no less than the other departments is acting solely within delegated powers beyond which it cannot go.

Sir, why should this side of the House consent to deprive itself of the power the House now possesses, the power of preventing the inauguration of any man as President who in its judgment, after a full and fair inquiry, has not been elected. This side of the Chamber believes that the two Houses have full power to institute investigations to determine who has been legally elected, and that the prima facie case made by the certificate may be disproved by showing that the canvass upon which it was based is tainted with fraud or other illegality. I feel that there is no doubt of this power, and that it should be exerted in the interest of justice and good government. Without it the people of this country are at the mercy of a few returning boards controlled and manipulated, as they will ever be, by the worst elements in politics, in the interest of one party or the other.

It is monstrous to say that the people are without any remedy for such outrages as it is claimed have been perpetrated in Louisiana and Florida, when, as in the former State, the whole State government is in the conspiracy. Why, sir, should this power be surrendered and those important questions left in the adjudication of a tribunal intensely partisan in its organization and a majority of whose members there is every reason to believe disagree with us? In the debates that have transpired on this bill republican members who support it justify their support in part with the assertion that the commission will not go behind the certificates of the State canvassers when the certificate is regular on its face, leaving nothing to be done in such cases but to tabulate the returns, and while these orators are loud in their praises of the absolute fairness of the commission as contemplated, there can be no question that they expect each republican member will do his duty, which means that the opinions expressed in debate shall be sustained, and that the casting vote of the fifteenth man, though silent as the falling snow shall as quickly and unerringly as lightning executes the will of God execute the wish of the republican party.

Why not stand by the Constitution as explained and construed in a hundred years of advancing science and civilization, rather than embark upon an unknown sea of experiment, and throwing doubt and uncertainty upon such unbroken current of authority? This House should plant itself on the Constitution and tender to the other House as the mode of counting the vote the uniform practice and insist upon its observance. But, says the objector, the Senate will not agree to that and the peace of the country will be disturbed, our institutions endangered, and the prosperity of the country seriously disturbed. To this I answer that the liberties of the people are best preserved by frequent resort to first principles, and that the peace and prosperity of the country are best preserved by a strict adherence to the settled law of the land, and the country will stand by the public servant who is fearless in the discharge of duty and stands by the Constitution, as construed and interpreted through a long series of years. I yield to no man in appreciating the blessing of peace, and no man deprecates more than myself the horrors of war; but I would preserve peace and avert war by an adherence to the law. No party will ever be charged with fomenting strife which insists that an unbroken line of precedents, based upon and sustained by the Constitution, shall be observed. If in such a case war comes, it will be chargeable to that element that sought to ignore the settled law of the land and substitute in its place new and untried theories. But war would not come; the mere force of public opinion would frown down all attempts to subvert and overturn the established usage of the land, and consign to eternal infamy all who would seek to involve the people in civil war to accomplish their own base purposes. It would be a war in which the people would be on one side and a few politicians on the other.

But as important as are the questions of peace and war, a far more important question to this people is involved in the questions now before Congress. Is the will of the people the supreme law of the land in the election of President and Vice-President? That is the important question now confronting us, the most momentous question ever presented to the people of this country, and no amount of talking and antagonizing it with the rights of States can obscure or belittle it in the public mind. The States have rights which must be protected, and duties are imposed upon them which should not be neglected. The United States will see that the governments of the States are not only republican in form, but republican in practice, and no State will be permitted by any species of legislation to perpetrate an injustice upon the people of the whole country, as would be the case if a candidate lacking a majority of the votes of the people of a State should, by the fraudulent action of its canvassing board, be foisted upon the country as the President-elect. The republican leaders say that, though the fraud may be proved clear as holy writ, there is no remedy here if the fraud is covered by the forms of law. From such a monstrous doctrine I dissent; and I also object to submitting that question to any tribunals organized in the interest of a party holding such a doctrine. The pertinacity with which it is urged alarms me.

Is the fraud in Louisiana to be passed, and force and truth imparted to the saying that a "fraud is as good as a truth if it be clothed in the forms of law," under which principle, while admitting that the popular vote of that State, as shown in the returns, was for Tilden, they yet claim the State for Hayes, because all the fraud and deviltry by which such result was reached is merged in the certificate? But happily for the good of the country there is no such law. Fraud vitiates everything with which it comes in contact, from the simplest transaction between man and man to the orders, certificates, judgments, and decrees of the highest tribunal in the land.

But what necessity for such a tribunal as the one provided for in this bill? Is not the Constitution and the legislation had under it sufficient for the present emergency as it has been in the past? Senator BOUTWELL, in speaking to Senator MORTON'S bill of last year, says:

> Not only did the framers of the Constitution do all that is possible to secure a true count of the electoral votes, but all that is necessary.

This part of the Constitution was long and well considered, as the debates show. There has been no fault found before. In aid of its provisions the joint rule was enacted by our republican friends, which, together with the Constitution, served their purposes well for three successive elections.

Sir, why are the republicans so thoroughly dissatisfied with the old mode of counting the vote? There is but one answer; because under the old method they cannot defeat the election of Tilden, and therefore it must be discarded and a plan devised that will bring about that result. First, it is insisted that the President of the Senate shall count the vote, a plan that had been proposed and denounced in the convention by those who made the Constitution and also denounced as untenable by the good men of all parties and at all times since the adoption of the Constitution whenever the subject has been discussed, and finally it had to be abandoned, and instead a commission is raised intensely partisan in its character and in part composed of five judges of the Supreme Court, three at least of whom must be republicans, and thus giving the republicans a majority in the commission. And this is the tribunal by the decisions of which the inauguration of Hayes is made possible; makes that possible which without it would be impossible without the consent of the House.

But it is said that this tribunal is an absolutely fair and impartial one, and the fact that the five judges are taken from the Supreme Court is referred to as showing its exceeding fairness; but justice and candor compel me to say that while I respect and revere that august tribunal and bow with reverence to its judgments and decrees, and would submit in entire confidence to the adjudication of any one of its members my dearest rights, off the bench in regard to all mere political questions I should repose no other or greater confidence in what they might say or do than I would in any other number of equally able men of the same party—no more, no less; for I expect when those judges get down from the bench and take their places in this commission they will go there to represent the republican idea in this controversy, and I have good reasons to believe that that is what is expected of them. Republican orators who support the measure justify their course to their party friends by asserting that it increases Hayes's chances, upon the theory of course that the certificates will be adjudged conclusive. And Mr. MORTON said in debate that "in no other way than by going behind the certificates can Tilden be de-clared elected," and it being understood the two Houses will go behind the certificates and investigate the charges of fraud and corruption, those gentlemen regard a change of forum to a tribunal whose opinions are not known—in doubt—perhaps as favorable to them. They take the benefit of the doubt, because the logical result of MORTON'S statement is, that if we do go behind the certificates an investigation will result in Tilden's election.

Now, profoundly impressed with the belief that Mr. Tilden has been fairly elected, I am decidedly opposed to surrendering the lawful and constitutional method of determining that question; a method that in my judgment will lead to the inauguration of Tilden and Hendricks, to this new and untried tribunal not judicial but political in its character, a majority of the members being presumptively against us. Undeniably it will be regarded, as in truth it is, a concession to the republicans. I am not willing to make it. I know the two Houses have the power to enforce the right, and will do so if it is left to them. Manifestly we ought not to shirk the responsibility. England expected every man to do his duty at Trafalgar; our country expects every member of this House to do his duty here, remembering that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

Mr. Speaker, if this was a question of sentiment only, I grant you the bill ought to pass, for the debate is replete in beautiful thoughts, expressed in words and manner of surpassing eloquence, creditable alike to the head and heart of the speakers; but I submit that it is more than that, it is really whether the voice of a majority of the people of this country is to go for naught, be set at defiance by the fraudulent action of a Louisiana returning board upon the senseless pretext that its action is conclusive upon the country if satisfactory to that State, the entire machinery of whose government is in the hands of men who wink at the fraud and justify the wrong, men who have notoriously defied the law and trampled in the dust the liberties of the people for their own base purposes. And are the people without remedy? None need be expected from the State authorities because they are interested in perpetuating the wrong. Then none exists unless this body, in virtue of its admitted constitutional powers, becomes the grand inquest of the nation and asserts the supremacy of right.

Am not I in Wisconsin as much interested in an honest count of the electoral vote in Louisiana as the people of that State are, and have I not the right to demand that the vote shall be correctly counted? Shall the people submit to the action of a returning board composed of men notoriously unworthy of credit, condemned by the action of a republican Congress, and by the deliberate judgment of every honest man of all parties, one of whom practically convicted of perjury by the House committee of the Forty-third Congress, and whom General Sheridan declared to be a "political trickster" and unworthy of confidence? The idea is monstrous, and strikes at the very foundation of our institutions, the right of the people to govern. I do not subscribe to any such doctrine. I believe in protecting to the fullest extent all the rights of the States against the encroachments of Federal power, but it is not one of the rights of the States to arbitrarily defeat the popular will through the knavery of any of its officials; and if, by any means or in any manner, the government of a State shall for any purpose, with or without the consent of its people, be used in such a manner as to cheat and defraud the people of the Union of the just results of the election of President and Vice-President, such State government is no longer republican in form, and it becomes the duty of the two Houses of Congress to interfere to protect not only the people of Louisiana, but of the whole country, from such lawlessness.

Mr. Speaker, I firmly believe the two Houses of Congress have this power, and that it ought to be exercised, and for fear that some other tribunal might not believe as we do, I will not consent to surrender one iota of power, but would hold and exercise it to the vindication of truth and justice. Never was there a question of such transcendent importance to the future of this country; let us meet it here and now and establish a precedent that will be of untold value, deciding once and forever that the people of this country will not submit to a falsehood and bow in humble submission before a certificate known to be false. A piece of paper conceived in fraud and perjury, and brought forth in iniquity, is claimed to impart absolute verity, a thing that cannot be inquired into at all; and this in the face of the fact that most of the States, and especially my own State of Wisconsin, have by their courts decided that the certificate is impeachable, even in cases where the statute declares that the canvassers shall determine what persons have been elected, holding that it is the election and not the canvass that determines the right to the office. Therefore I shall vote against this bill: First, because I believe the right of counting the electoral vote is by the Constitution vested solely in the two Houses of Congress; secondly, because I believe that power cannot be delegated to any body or persons; and thirdly, because, if the bill is not in conflict with the Constitution, it is unnecessary, as there is no reason why the present electoral vote shall not be counted in accordance with all the precedents; and lastly, because it may result in the denial of justice and the triumph of a conspiracy, the most gigantic and damnable, to compass the inauguration of Mr. Hayes in fraud of the voice of the people, and therefore I would keep the power where I know that justice will be done.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. SAMUEL F. MILLER,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, in the short time allotted me for debate I shall not expect to enter upon any general discussion of this measure. I content myself by saying that I believe this bill now before us, providing for counting the votes for President and Vice-President, is constitutional. If I did not so regard it, I certainly should not give it my vote. But, further than this, Mr. Speaker, I believe this bill is more just and more impartial to the parties interested than any plan suggested by any of the various interpretations of the Constitution given us by the disagreeing constitutional expounders.

I am one of those who honestly and sincerely believe that Mr. Hayes was elected by the people, but I concede that other gentlemen equally honest just as sincerely believe that Mr. Tilden was elected. I have so much confidence in the honest election of my candidate, the republican candidate, that I am willing to submit the question to a fair and impartial tribunal. If my democratic friends, who are equally confident in the justice of their claims, are willing to submit them to an impartial tribunal, why should we not agree upon this mode of settlement? Why should either party persist in asking a tribunal or umpire whose decision is known in advance and whose award cannot command the respect and acquiescence of the other party.

It is idle to say that the Constitution clearly marks out the course for us to pursue. The Constitution leaves us in doubt. Not only do the two great parties in this House not agree upon the constitutional mode of counting the electoral votes, but even individuals of the same party advocate opposing interpretations. The truth is, for the last sixty years, at least, the votes of the electoral colleges have been counted under the provisions of a legislative plan or agreement adopted by the two Houses of Congress. So we are but doing our duty as it has been understood by those who have gone before us in trying to agree upon a plan in advance of the count.

Of course in the absence of any legislative provision on the subject we must follow the constitutional path by the best lights we have. And I am free to say, if this bill is defeated, if agreement is impossible, I shall support those who claim the right of the President of the Senate to count, believing that this accords with the early practice before the adoption of the twelfth amendment, and believing, too, that, as this amendment retained the same words in relation to the count as the old section which it superseded, it is but fair to claim that it was adopted with the interpretation that these words had already received.

But, after the precedents of the last sixty years, I never could justify myself in refusing to support a legislative plan so fair and impartial as this, to follow a disputed interpretation, however plausible. The interpretation may be followed from necessity by reason of failure to enact a legislative provision, but never from choice and design.

Now let me hasten to another point. Let me ask my republican friends if they think it probable—after the speeches and votes of republican Senators on this bill—that these Senators will ever maintain the right of their president to count the votes for President and Vice-President, unless possibly the democratic party should be foolish enough to defeat this measure or fail honorably to carry out its provisions. And is there a sane man in this House who believes that the President of the Senate will count these votes without the support and against the voice of that body? But I forbear to press this point, although it is suggestive of our real position.

Now we are told by some exceedingly brave gentlemen that we are yielding to clamor, to unmanly fears. I am conscious of no personal fear in this business. But are the peace and prosperity of the American people and the honor of republican institutions matters of so little consequence that we cannot guard and preserve them without the suspicion of unworthy motives? I certainly do not anticipate any bloodshed or civil war if this bill is defeated, but I shall expect, if either party defeats this measure with the design through doubtful means to seize the administration, that it will hold power without satisfaction and without honor, and that it will receive such a rebuke from the people at the first election as will consign it to defeat and oblivion for the next fifty years.

The gentlemen on the other side will mark out for themselves the policy of the democratic party; but I for one do not wish the republican party with its record so glorious in war and in peace consigned to any such fate. I prefer to vote for this bill. If it is passed I shall expect to see the claim of Mr. Hayes, now clouded by suspicion and misrepresentation, cleared up and vindicated by the decision of this high tribunal.

And if his claim be so established we shall see him inaugurated with the approbation of the whole American people.

Counting the Electoral Vot..

SPEECH OF HON. DAVID REA,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877.

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. REA. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss the constitutionality of the bill now before the House. That has been done in this and the other end of the Capitol much more ably than I could do it. I shall therefore content myself with a statement of the reasons for the vote I shall give upon this bill.

This bill is one of grave importance and demands the calm, unpartisan consideration of every member. No graver question in my humble judgment ever confronted Congress than the one now before this House.

The people of this great country are divided into two almost equal parties, each claiming to have elected its candidate for President and Vice-President. Dual returns from each of four States are said to be in the possession of the President of the Senate, each purporting to contain the true and lawful votes from said States.

Under the Constitution it is the duty of the President of the Senate to open all the certificates, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, that he may have in his possession, and under the law as it now is that duty is to be performed on the second Wednesday in February, a little over two weeks from this day.

When the certificates are opened and double votes from one or more States shall appear, of necessity an adjudgment must be had as to which of the dual votes are lawful and shall be counted, and some person or body must determine that question.

Who shall adjudge the disputed votes is a question upon which members of the House and Senate are not agreed.

The Constitution says:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

It is not stated in words by whom the votes shall be counted, neither is it stated what shall be done in the case of double votes from a State.

The twenty-second joint rule has been abrogated, and there is no law or rule at this time prescribing how and by whom the true and lawful votes shall be selected from the false ones. It is claimed by some that the President of the Senate is empowered by the Constitution with power and authority to judge and determine for himself which are the lawful votes, and to count the same, and that an assumption of authority by Congress to determine and pass upon the genuineness of votes, in the absence of a law authorizing the same, would be revolution. Others claim that the President of the Senate has no power or authority to judge which are the true and lawful votes, but that by virtue of the Constitution the authority and power to adjudge the validity of the votes are vested in the Senate and House of Representatives, and that for the President of the Senate to adjudge the validity of votes without authority from the Senate and House of Representatives, and against the protestations of either House, would be revolution. And others claim that all votes, although objected to, properly certified are to be held as lawful votes and counted, unless both Houses concur in excluding the same, while others claim that all such votes objected to are to be excluded, unless both Houses concur in counting the same.

With all these conflicting views, entertained by members of this House and by the Senate, and knowing there was no rule or law in force to plainly guide and control the canvas and count of the electoral votes when the two Houses should meet together and the President of the Senate in their presence should open all the certificates containing the votes, the Senate and House some weeks ago wisely appointed a joint select committee to prepare some measure, legislative or otherwise, best calculated to accomplish the lawful counting of the electoral votes.

That joint committee, composed of honest and able men of both political parties, of whose patriotism mainly and learning there can be no doubt, after long and patient deliberation, reported the bill now before the House unanimously, with one exception.

The bill has passed the Senate and is now before the House, and the question now is shall the House defeat or pass the same. Is this House prepared to take the grave responsibility of defeating this bill, confronted as it is with the surrounding difficulties and contrariety of opinions of members of the House and Senate; with the good people of this whole country of both parties demanding a peaceful and lawful solution of the presidential problem? In view of all these facts, in full view of the near, and, without some agreement, it may be the unwelcome future to the American people, are Representatives upon this floor prepared to reject this bill without substituting something better, and launch the ship of state upon a boisterous and turbulent sea on the 14th day of February next without rudder or pilot—to be driven by every uncertain wind, it may be, upon some unseen reef, there to be broken asunder? I for one am not. I am a partisan; I believe in the political tenets of the party to which I belong. I would sacrifice much for its success; I love my party, but I love my country better.

I do not believe the President of the Senate has any power under the Constitution to pass upon and determine the lawful from the unlawful votes. His power over the votes ends when he has opened the certificates.

I believe the power to judge of the legality of votes is vested in the Senate and House of Representatives, acting concurrently, and that no vote objected to can be counted unless both Houses agree thereto. The bill now before the House is founded upon the doctrine that the power to canvass and count the votes and adjudge the lawful from the unlawful votes is in the Senate and House of Representatives, and not in the President of the Senate, and hence the right of Congress to prescribe the means and manner by law of passing upon the lawfulness of votes, canvassing, and counting the same. The Senate and House are equal, one having as much power to judge of the lawfulness of votes as the other; and they are equal in the passage of this bill. It cannot pass unless both Houses agree to it. Whatever can be done under this bill is in law done by the two Houses acting concurrently.

I do not believe the passage of this bill will be a surrender of the right and power of either the Senate or House, but on the contrary it will be an affirmance of the power of both.

There are some objections, in my judgment, to bringing the judges of the Supreme Court into the commission authorized by this bill. It would have been better, in my judgment, if some other plan or commission could have been devised, provided it would have been equally impartial, and would have commanded the same respect from the people. No other plan has been presented, and without anything better I believe it would be unwise for this House to defeat this bill. This side of the House cannot afford to do it. This side of the House has the power to pass the bill, and hence if the bill is lost it will be chargeable with its defeat.

I believe there is a wide-spread conspiracy in this country to inaugurate a President by fraud and force if necessary, and for that purpose the fraudulent acts of fraudulent returning boards, sustained by military force, have been resorted to in order to procure the electoral votes of certain States against the expressed will of a majority of the electors of such States. The passage of this bill, in my judgment, will defeat that conspiracy.

I am certain a large majority of this House believe in all sincerity that this House has an equal voice with the Senate in determining what votes shall be counted, and that neither the Senate nor the President thereof has the right or power under the Constitution to count votes objected to by the House.

Suppose this bill is defeated and that when the Senate and House of Representatives meet together on the 14th day of February next, and the certificates are opened, that the President of the Senate should claim the right, in the absence of any rule or law to the contrary, to count the votes and determine for himself what votes he will count, and proceeds to and does count certain votes, and declares Hayes and Wheeler elected against the protestations of the House of Representatives, what will this House do? It can do but one thing. If the honest judgment of the House shall be in that event that the action of the President of the Senate was unlawful, and therefore no President had been elected, then it would be its sworn duty to proceed at once and elect a President, and should the House then elect Tilden President there would be two declared-elected Presidents; and I cannot see how a collision could be avoided, unless one of the parties should back down. Let us not take the chances. Let not the Representatives of the people, who are this day holding in the balance the future destiny of this great Republic, move on blindly without any rule or law, to govern the count, until they have arrived at a point at which it would be cowardly and humiliating for one party to yield to the other.

The passage of this bill will avert any such calamity. It is not cowardly or humiliating to vote for it, but, on the contrary, it is patriotic.

This is a government of law; all great disputes ought to be settled by law rather than force. No party that abandons the forms of law can expect to be intrusted with power in this country.

We upon this side of the House have great confidence in our cause. If we have the law, justice, and the right on our side, should we hesitate as to the results under this bill?

Through a number of years of practice in an honorable profession I have learned that thrice armed is he, before the bar of justice, who has truth, justice, and the right on his side.

As a rule, it is those who have no faith in the justness of their cause who refuse to submit matters in difference to an honorable and wise tribunal.

Mr. Speaker, I represent on this floor a law-abiding, liberty-loving constituency, engaged in the honest, industrious pursuits of life. They want peace. I do not believe those of either party desire any man inaugurated President unless he has been fairly elected. I do not believe I would reflect their will if I should vote against this bill.

If by the passage of this bill we shall avert a great national danger without doing violence to the Constitution, we will have done an act of patriotism for which the good people of this whole country within their hearts will thank us.

When this bill shall become a law, as I believe it will, I trust that fraud and corruption will find no protection under it, but, on the contrary, through the instrumentalities of this bill I shall hope to see the true and lawful votes for President and Vice-President counted, and the will of the people thereby respected.

Doubtless this bill is not perfect. Through all the works of man imperfection can be traced, but under all the circumstances surrounding the presidential problem I believe it better to pass the bill than to defeat it.

I shall, therefore, give it my vote.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN H. BURLEIGH,

OF MAINE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Mr. Speaker, as the time allotted to each member of this House to speak on this most important question is very short, I must state my reason for the vote I shall give in as brief a manner as I can. Since I can remember, my idea of the counting of the electoral vote has been that, according to the Constitution, this high honor was vested in the President of the Senate.

But, sir, since the grave question of the day and how to decide it has arisen, I find in looking over the history of our country that the greatest of the men we have had, without distinction of party, have taken different views in regard to counting and deciding electoral votes that are questionable.

There is another impression that has always been fixed on my mind, and that is that the framers of the Constitution never intended that Congress should have the power by throwing out the vote of a State, or otherwise to annul the action of the several States in the choice of a President. On the contrary, the Constitution provides that a member of Congress, or holder of any office under the Government, shall not be an elector.

It only provides that the House of Representatives, voting by States, may elect a President when the States by votes of electors fail in so doing.

The Constitution was made before the days of telegrams. It directs that the result of presidential elections shall be arrived at and forwarded to the Vice-President, under close seal, in the quickest possible time for those days, as has been so well shown and expressed by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] Then the voters of Massachusetts could not know how those of Georgia had voted, or those of Georgia how those of Massachusetts had voted, until the votes of each had been counted and registered by the authorities of these States. Then the result of the election in the States far removed from each other and from the capital could not be known generally until but a short time before they were to be opened by the President of the Senate. But now on the morning after the election the click of the wires informs the voters of all the States of the approximate result, or so near that a close calculation can at once be made of what votes are wanted to decide the election in favor of one candidate or the other. So that the object of the framers of the Constitution in having the quickest possible returns that neither party could take advantage of the knowledge of how the State had voted and be incited to use extraordinary efforts to secure the election of their candidate is lost. The Constitution should be changed to meet the advance of the times.

Men and money, it is said, after the late election were sent into the States that might be influenced in making up the counts by both parties to see that there was a fair count and that their respective party should secure the vote or votes necessary to secure the election of their candidate. The result is each party charges the other with fraud, each claims that their candidate is elected. The country urgently looks to Congress to settle the question of who is elected President, and to settle it fairly, while the constituents of every member, in every city and town, are divided in their views or wishes in regard to its adjustment. We search the records of the country since it was formed for information. We find no precedent, no parallel antecedent, and that every question that has arisen in former Congresses that the settlement of would aid us now has been passed over, and that the views of eminent men as expressed in the records of how disputed votes shall be counted and the action of former Congresses on the subject tend more to mistify and entangle than to guide and clear.

Men that voted for Governor Hayes declare that he is elected, and men that voted for Governor Tilden declare that he is elected. The best men in the country, in Congress and out, are divided in opinion in regard to the meaning of the Constitution, as to how and by whom the votes of disputed States shall be settled; the guides that might govern not settled, but contradicting each other, each side positive and earnest in the belief that their candidate is elected, some saying, on both sides, "No compromise, hold on, we have got them." Is this the language of statesmen, when the peace of their country is perhaps at stake?

Mr. Speaker, while I believe sincerely in the honesty of the party to which I belong, in its belief that Governor Hayes is elected legally, I accord to the democratic party an equally sincere, honest belief that Governor Tilden is elected by the people who voted in the several States. Under these circumstances what shall be done? What shall we do?

Sir, seeing no way of settling the great question of who shall be President of the United States under the present condition of things by Congress, under the Constitution or by precedent, I shall cheerfuly vote for the bill now under discussion, with the feeling that by so doing I shall be acting for the best interest of my country. I believe that in settling this great question by this commission, without a jar to our institutions, the great Republic will rise to a greater prominence; our people and those of the Old World will have greater respect and confidence in our republican form of government.

Hereafter, when the question we have before us is bridged over and Congress again gets to work, every lover of our country will hope that it will act on this subject and have it settled in such a manner as will last for all time.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN K. TARBOX,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. TARBOX. Mr. Speaker, I attempt no argument. The debate here and in the upper House has been exhaustive to the last degree of research and logic. I wish simply and briefly to indicate the considerations that govern the vote I shall give. The pending bill is obnoxious to objections which under less imperative stress of affairs had constrained me into opposition. I cannot regard with unruffled complacency the apparent abdication or delegation to a novel tribunal, unknown to familiar government processes, of a fraction even of the power and responsibility to adjudge a political question the determination of which, as I believe and as I read the law and the precedents, falls within the province of the two Houses of Congress in the performance of a duty devolved by the Constitution; and I cannot take kindly to the proposition to involve the Supreme Court, however remotely, in a partisan controversy and the decision of an extra-judicial matter, out of which I fear that august tribunal may not emerge without some regretted loss of public confidence and popular reverence, which make the basis of its moral strength and conservative usefulness in our republican polity. I wish, sir, the scheme had been so cast as that the opinion of the court might be taken on controverted legal issues relative to the constitutional powers and privileges of the two Houses, several or joint, in the electoral count, and left the Houses free to execute the function, whatever it be, which the highest judicial authority should adjudge them severally or jointly top ossess. Any denial that the chief Legislative Assembly of the people can be trusted to discharge with integrity the trust the Constitution vests in it, when once the nature and boundaries of that trust are defined by authority, is an impeachment of the organic charter and equally of the foundation principle of republics.

But, Mr. Speaker, these objections are overmastered by the imminence of the public crisis. The peace of the country is beset by perils, in the apprehension of which the best sentiment of the land has taken serious alarm. The wisest men of our counsel, skilled in law and practiced in statesmanship, commend the bill under consideration as the best expedient not subversive of the Constitution that their most patient and conscientious deliberation can construct, to compose a strife which if left uncontrolled may spend itself in ruinous ravage of our prosperities and institutions. Statesmen, most constant in fealty to the Constitution and able among ablest expounders of that revered oracle, approve it as conservative of the organic form and spirit and legitimate for carrying into effect the constitutional provision. The chief hostility, based on reasons drawn from the Constitution, comes from a source not hitherto distinguished for devotion to the authority of that instrument. Again, sir, the compromise feature of the bill is honorable, for it reaches neither fact, principle, nor right, but only methods. It is not a compromise in the offensive sense of a bargain or barter of election results; but a compromise of conflicting opinions as to the just mode for the ascertainment of the true constitutional result. It proposes to give effect to the national will as the ballot declares and the law awards it; not to reverse or revise it. In fine, sir, the tribunal, or commission, or whatever is its fittest designation, which the bill creates will exist by the authority and creative act and as the agent and subordinate aid of the law-making power of the Government, not to elect a President and Vice-President, but to ascertain and determine the fact who are the lawfully elect to those offices. The scheme is not therefore vulnerable to the fatal criticism of unconstitutionality or the assumption of power to override the judgment of the ballot-box. The tribunal is not an absolutely impartial one, since the strongest and fairest minds are not wholly invincible to the unconscious bias of prejudices, interests, sympathies, and affections; but, in its judicial part at least, I believe it will prove as fair and impartial as the wit of man could constitute it or human imperfections admit of. Not only the individual honor of these grave judicial personages, but also the dignity of the great tribunal of justice they adorn, are involved in the righteous determination of the legal questions committed to their decision. The country and the world expect them to act in a spirit equal to the gravity and solemnity of their responsibility.

No competent and reasonably impartial observer of events, I think, now doubts that a purpose was entertained in certain political circles—I do not call it a conspiracy; I will not characterize it at all—but a purpose existed to assert the independent right of the President of the Senate, in the contingency of inaction by Congress, to count the votes, decide all contests, and declare the election. The now President was expected to enforce the decision and, if need be, by the use of the Army put the person so declared elected in possession of the presidential office, and the Senate and the several executive departments were relied on to recognize him as the rightful President and support his title. I will not contemplate the consequences to domestic tranquillity and the common welfare from such a consummation. This bill, if accepted, defeats that purpose and protects the nation from its perils. Sir, I see no alternative. The event is close by. We cannot drift in safety. We must act. The choice rests between the adoption of this measure and a probable failure of the Houses to seasonably agree upon a mode for the discharge of a constitutional duty to the execution of which the joint action of the two Houses is essential, and in default of which the government of law stops as stricken with a paralysis and the Republic is cast helpless into the troubled sea of revolution.

Mr. Speaker, the favor I give this bill is apart from any calculation of the probable issue it will occasion to the presidential contest. That the people chose Mr. Tilden for their President in November is a conviction I entertain in common with a large majority of the American people. That democratic electors were chosen in Florida and Louisiana and the choice of the ballot-box corruptly set aside by as base knaves as ever abused authority and dishonored official place will be writ in the history of these events when a interest no longer exists to falsify the truth. But, sir, we know how oft unequal are human systems of law to accomplish the ends of full and absolute justice. It possibly may be that the tribunal will hold that whatever frauds the State officers may have been guilty of, their acts are nevertheless final and conclusive and beyond the reach of any power resident in the Federal authority to revise and reform. If it shall so result the country must endure with patriotic patience, and wickedness enjoy its doubtful triumph for a season. Better to suffer the temporary wrong than by extraconstitutional and revolutionary resorts imperil the structure of the Government itself, which shelters—so our patriotic pride fondly believes—the best hopes of civil liberty. If wrong be done, time accomplishes its just revenges.

No lie shall live; no man by lies—
God's debts are paid at last:
He who with devil's coin that tries
To pay them, shall be cast!"

Counting the Electoral Vote—Louisiana.

SPEECH OF HON. R. LEE GIBSON,

OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. GIBSON. It is impossible properly to investigate the processes of an election in the State of Louisiana without being familiar with the methods by which the citizens may be duly qualified to vote.

REGISTRATION.

No one can exercise the right of suffrage without having been duly registered and having received a certificate of registration. The entire machinery of registration has been and is in the hands of the governor of the State and his political adherents. The governor has power to appoint a registrar for the State at large and a supervisor of registration in each parish (county) in the State. And it is provided by law, (see section 31 of act No. 155, approved July 24, 1874:)

That the decision of any supervisor or assistant supervisor of registration on all questions of erasure from or addition to the registration and on all questions relative to the registry of voters shall be final. No parish or district judge shall interfere by writ of injunction, mandamus, or other order of court, to compel any supervisor or assistant supervisor of registration to register or prohibit him from registering any person. Any judge so interfering shall, upon conviction thereof, be subject to a fine of not less than $500 and imprisonment for not less than six months, and shall be liable to impeachment and removal from office.

Heavy penalties are inflicted upon any person who not being entitled to register shall attempt to do so, or who shall attempt to vote at any election without being duly qualified.

A person who believed he had the right to register and who was refused made application to the only judge who had jurisdiction in the city of New Orleans of political cases, and it was decided by him that he had no jurisdiction and could afford no relief. Nay, more than this, it is made the duty of the supervisors, by section 39 of the said act, to appoint suitable persons without limit as to numbers, at each poll or voting-place or precinct, who shall have the power of constables during the time of election and of counting ballots cast, and whose duty it shall be to convey the box to receive the votes to the place of holding the election and to deliver the same to the commissioners of election, and to attend the commissioners of election during the whole time of holding the election and obey all legal orders of such commissioners. And the said constables are entitled to receive as compensation the sum of $5 for a period not exceeding three days.

In addition to constables without limit appointed by the State authorities, the United States marshal in compliance with the instructions laid down by Hon. Mr. Taft, Attorney-General, appointed United States deputy marshals, without limit as to number, throughout the city of New Orleans and the State of Louisiana to protect the citizens in the exercise of their political rights. In the ward in which I reside in the city of New Orleans I have reason to believe that of the republican votes cast more than half were constables and deputy marshals and officers of the Government, and I doubt not one-fourth the voters of the republican ticket in the State were acting in some official capacity.

The supervisors of registration are clothed with the power under the law to deny absolutely to any citizen the right to register, and to strike from the registration the name of any citizen whom they shall determine has been improperly registered. They have the authority, as has been seen, to summon to the aid of the commissioners of election the entire physical power of the State to preserve order and protect the polls.

At the recent election in Louisiana every person who voted was required to produce his title to the right in the shape of a certificate of registration, and every certificate of registration issued in that State was from the hands of the appointees and adherents of Governor Kellogg. Surely, then, there can be no complaint by the party which calls itself republican in Louisiana against the fairness of the registration. Every return and statement of the ballots actually cast, which was placed before the returning board, was made up by officers appointed by the party in power and came up from citizens who had been thus qualified, and who had exercised their right to vote thus supervised by the Kellogg officials.

ELECTION LAWS.

If we now turn to the machinery of elections we will find it to be not less complete, not less independent of the control of the people or of their supervision, and equally well adapted to retain for the party in power complete political supremacy.

First, the election is conducted by certain officers called commissioners of election, whose power and duties are somewhat similar to the judges of election in other States. They are appointed by the assistant supervisor of registration in each parish and in the city of New Orleans by the supervisor of registration.

Under the act of 1872 the mayor and administrators of the city of New Orleans appointed commissioners for the parish in which it was situated; but that was amended by an act of the Legislature, and the power of appointment was taken away from the said officers, who were conservative, and conferred upon the supervisor, who was a republican. (See sections 7 and 8 of act No. 98, 1872, amended by act 128 of 1874.)

The commissioners of election are required by section 43 of the act of 1872 immediately upon the close of the polls on the day of election to proceed to count the votes as provided in section 13 of this act.

And after they shall have so counted the votes and made a list of the names of all persons voted for, and the offices for which they were voted for, and the number of votes received by each, the number of ballots contained in the box, and the number rejected and the reasons therefor, duplicates of such lists shall be made out, signed and sworn to by the commissioners of election of each poll, and such duplicate lists shall be delivered, one to the supervisor of registration of the parish, and one to the clerk of the district court of the parish, and in the parish of Orleans to the secretary of state, by one or all of such commissioners in person, within twenty-four hours after closing the polls.

It is also made the duty of the commissioners, by section 26, if on the day of election there shall be any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences, so as to prevent or tend to prevent a fair, free, peaceable, and full vote of all the qualified electors, to make in duplicate, and under oath, a clear, full statement of all the facts relating thereto and of their effect in preventing a fair, free, peaceable, and full election, and of the number of qualified electors deterred thereby from voting; which statement shall also be corroborated under oath by three respectable citizens, qualified electors of the parish, which shall be forwarded in duplicate to the supervisor of registration of the parish, and if in the city of New Orleans, to the secretary of state. This completes the duties of the commissioners.

Second. The duties of supervisors of registration are not less clearly prescribed and defined.

In section 43 it is provided that within twenty-four hours after the receipt of all the returns for the different polling-places he shall consolidate such returns, to be certified as correct by the clerk of the district court, and forward the consolidated returns, with the originals received by him, to the returning officers provided in section 2 of this act; the said report and returns to be inclosed in an envelope of strong paper or cloth, securely sealed, and forwarded by mail. He shall forward a copy of any statement as to violence or disturbance, bribery or corruption, or other offenses specified in section 26 of this act, if any there be, together with the memoranda and tally-list used in making the count and statement of the votes. It is also made his duty not only to forward but to make up as well an official statement by section 26, as follows:

If in any parish, precinct, ward, city, or town, during the time of registration, or revision of registration, there shall be any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences at any place of registration or revision of registration, it shall be the duty of the supervisor of registration of the parish, if they occur during the time of registration or revision of registration, to make in duplicate and under oath a clear, full statement of all the facts relating thereto, and of the effect produced by such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences, in preventing a fair, free, peaceable, and full registration, and of the number of qualified electors deterred thereby from registering, which statement shall also be corroborated under oath by three respectable citizens, qualified electors of the parish. One copy of said statement shall be so annexed to his returns of election by paste or wax or some other adhesive substance that the same may be kept together. And the other copy the supervisor of registration shall deliver to the clerk of the court of his parish for the use of the district attorney.

This completes under the law the duties of the supervisors of registration.

POWERS AND LIMITATIONS.

Second is the returning board. It is made the duty of the presiding officer of the returning board "to open in the presence of the said returning officers the statements of the commissioners of election, and the said returning officers shall, from said statements, canvass and compile the returns of the election in duplicate."

When the returning board meet they have nothing before them except the aforesaid envelopes of strong paper or cloth, securely sealed, and their contents. The law does not direct anything else to be sent.

The returning officers are required to observe the following order according to section 3 of the act: "They shall compile, first, statements from all polls or voting-places at which there shall have been a fair, free, peaceable registration and election;" which manifestly means returns not accompanied by the official statements of undue influences, "riot, tumult," provided for by section 26 of the law. Hence in the absence of such statements their duties are merely ministerial, involving no discretion, and they are bound to declare the result according to the face of the returns. But when such statements shall be received by them in form as required by section 26 of this act, then, and in that case only, they may proceed to investigate said statement of riot and tumult. They are required, first, to investigate the statement itself, and if upon its face they are convinced that the riot or tumult referred to did not materially change the result of the election, then they shall canvass and compile the votes with those previously canvassed and compiled, showing conclusively that they have no discretion in the absence of such statements. Secondly, if, after considering the statement, they are not fully convinced, it shall be their duty to examine further testimony in regard thereto. In this investigation they are required to allow any interested candidate a hearing, and are authorized to send for persons and papers; which shows that they are not to act on ex parte affidavits, but should have witnesses before them with the privilege of cross-examination and subject to the well-established rules of evidence.

Now, it is very clear what the statements as required by section 26 of this act are. They must be made by a commissioner or commissioners of election within twenty-four hours after the close of the polls or by a supervisor of registration within twenty-four hours after the receipt of all the returns for the different polling-places, and in either case must be corroborated under oath by three respectable citizens, qualified voters of the parish. The commissioners' statement is limited to what may occur on the day of election, because it is only on that day that they are officers under the law and conduct the elections. The statement of the supervisors is confined to acts occurring during the time of registration or revision of registration, for it must be observed that they are the supervisors of registration, not of election, and conduct the registration. In either case it must be a clear, full statement of all the facts relating thereto and of the effect produced by such riot or tumult, and of the number of qualified electors deterred by such riots or tumults from registering or voting. Whenever such statements have been placed before the board and they have become convinced from the examination of further testimony in regard thereto, by sending for persons and papers, of the truthfulness thereof, it is made their duty not to canvass or compile the statement of votes from such poll or voting-place, but to exclude it from their returns.

It has been seen that the election is actually conducted by duly appointed officers called commissioners, whose qualifications, powers, and duties are clearly expressed. The supervisors do not conduct the election, nor the returning board, but the commissioners. Their powers are separate and distinct. They possess extraordinary powers, with an unlimited number of constables to do their bidding. Moreover, they are on the spot, three at each poll; they hold the ballot-boxes, look every voter in the face, have the right to challenge, and are the official witnesses of the occurrences at the polls over which they preside. The supervisors and members of the returning board cannot be present at the polling-places, there being only one supervisor for each parish and five members of the board for the whole State, while there are hardly ever less than ten and often more than twenty polling-places in each parish, many miles apart, in the fifty-seven parishes in the State.

It is therefore made the duty of the commissioners to send up statements, corroborated by three citizens on oath, showing what transpired at their polls. These statements are to be forwarded by the supervisors of registration, with their own consolidated returns, within twenty-four hours after the receipt of all the returns from the different polling-places, and so annexed to their returns of election that the same can be kept together in an envelope of strong paper or cloth, securely sealed, by mail to the returning board at the city of New Orleans. (section 43.) Every fact essential to a clear understanding of the election is before them from official sources provided by law; the legal foundation for further investigation must be found here or it does not exist.

REASONS FOR THE LIMITATION.

Now, the reason of the law requiring the board to canvass and compile the statements of the local commissioners, and that all the supervisors should be engaged simultaneously in their several parishes in completing their returns and statements on the spot where the election was held, within a limited time, and that an official copy of the statement and returns should be filed with the clerk of the court so that it might be of record, is plain and indisputable. It was that they might know precisely what had occurred at each poll from officers who were present, and to prevent the supervisors from omitting or disregarding the statements of the local commissioners or substituting their own; it was to compel the returns and statements to be completed before communication could be had with other parishes or the general result was known, so as to remove the temptation to doctor their returns or set forth false and frivolous protests solely with the view of securing the triumph of their own party; it was that the local candidates might be able in due season to ascertain whether there was a statement against them, and the grounds of it, so that they might prepare their evidence and appear with their witnesses before the board in the distant city of New Orleans; it was that the officers conducting the election should prepare a solid basis for the disfranchisement of their fellow-citizens, according to law, if it was to be done at all! But for these limitations the supervisors, regardless of the report of the commissioners and the voice of the people, might quit their parishes, assemble in the city of New Orleans, compare notes, and perfect a conspiracy by which they should cast the vote of the State through the returning board, or bitter partisans might file mere protests or affidavits from wholly irresponsible and unknown persons and thus consume the time of the board and change the result without the candidates or people really concerned, being notified or heard.

And why was it that the commissioners were required to complete their statements within twenty-four hours after the close of the polls and forward them to the supervisor of registration? And why was the supervisor of registration required, within twenty-four hours after the receipt of all the returns from the different polling-places, to consolidate such returns and to send them to the returning board, together with the official statement as to intimidation?

It was manifestly because that was ample time within which to perform these duties fully and completely, and, if much delay occurred, they might not reach the city of New Orleans in season for the board, soon to assemble. Public policy requires that the result should be proclaimed so as to prevent a lapse of the government and for the information of the people; and prompt action, while the occurrences were fresh in their minds, would secure more accuracy and leave less room for collusion and fraud.

The reason for the provision requiring the board to meet in New Orleans "within ten days after the closing of the election" is equally clear. Within ten days there would be ample time for the returns and statements to be completed all over the State, if the commissioners and supervisors followed the law, and to reach the board by due course of mail. More was not necessary, less would hardly be sufficient.

And not less reasonable and proper is the mandate that the board shall canvass and compile the undisputed polls first. The postponement of the contested parishes would allow candidates in remote parts of the State time to secure their witnesses, and to appear with their cases thoroughly prepared before the board. It would also prevent the members of the board from ascertaining the final result, and from afterward allowing or rejecting particular polls with the view of changing that result one way or the other.

The intent of the law was that the canvass and compilation should be poll by poll, parish by parish; those uncontested first in order and then the disputed ones, as the investigation showed that they finally were to be rejected or compiled and tabulated, one after the other. But for this the board might reserve all the contested polls and parishes and decide them en bloc, and thus after reviewing the entire canvass, swayed by partisan temptations, throw out enough to meet the exigencies of their party. The undisputed polls and parishes are to be compiled one after another, and there is no provision of the law requiring or permitting the disputed polls and parishes to be decided differently; each case, as presented, should be investigated and disposed of finally. This is the manifest intent of the law.

Is there any State in this Union with such safeguards against undue influences in elections or in which there are so many officers of the law clothed with so much power?

First. Look at the supervisors of registration, with power to deny any citizen in the State the right of registration and to strike his name from the list of the qualified voters even after registration. Some of the most honorable and eminent citizens of the State were so disfranchised in the recent election, and among them my colleague, Mr. ELLIS. I believe that not less than five thousand were so deprived of the right of suffrage in the city of New Orleans, all conservatives.

Secondly. Look at the commissioners and their army of paid constables, with power to challenge, arrest, imprison, conducting the elections, and authorized to send up any statement of undue influences at the polls.

Thirdly. Look at the United States marshal and his countless deputies, all of one party, swarming around the polling-places.

Fourthly. Look at the sheriffs and police charged to preserve the peace.

Fifthly. Look at the military forces of the Federal Government, standing ready to render succor at a moment's notice.

And finally look at the returning board in the city of New Orleans, with the tremendous power in certain specified cases of rejecting returns. It is true that the conditions-precedent to the exercise of this extraordinary power are plainly laid down, as well as its modes and methods and limitations, showing precisely in what cases jurisdiction arises, so that nothing is left to implication or inference. But it is an anomaly in our system that any four or five men should have the power after the election is over, under any circumstances, to deprive hundreds and thousands of American citizens, American freemen, of the dearest right inherited from their forefathers the right to choose their rulers.

I can understand how individuals may be disfranchised for rebellion or crimes after trial by the law of the land, but it shocks our ideas of justice to be told that this power may be lodged with four partisans in a great State, to be exercised against thousands of men without a hearing in the midst of a heated political struggle. Under these circumstances, at least the board should be required to observe the ancient safeguards of rights and privileges immemorial and hallowed. Will any fair-minded man hold for one moment that they may stretch their authority beyond the limits prescribed by the statutes and enlarge their jurisdiction according to their own views of the exigencies of the case.

It was this very assumption on the part of the board to amplify its jurisdiction that was condemned by Messrs. HOAR, WHEELER, and FRYE in their report in February, 1875. In commenting upon sections 3 and 26 of the act of 1872, they say:

Upon this statute we are all clearly of opinion that the returning board had no right to do anything except to canvass and compile the returns which were lawfully made to them by the local officers, except in cases where they were accompanied by the certificates of the supervisor or commissioner, provided in the third section. In such cases the last sentence of that section shows that it was expected that they would ordinarily exercise the grave and delicate duty of investigating charges of riot, tumult, bribery, or corruption on a hearing of the parties interested in the office. It never could have been meant that this board of its own motion, sitting in New Orleans, at a distance from the place of voting and without notice, could decide the right of persons claiming to be elected.

The board took a different view of its powers and proceeded to throw out the votes from many polls where they found intimidation and violence to have existed. The result was to defeat persons whom on the returns they should have declared elected and to elect persons who should not have been declared elected.

We have no doubt that they believed they were defending the people of Louisiana against a fraud on their constitutional rights. But there is no more dangerous form of self-delusion than that which induces men in high places of public trust to violate law to redress and prevent what they deem public wrongs.

But it may be concluded, indeed it has been, that these express provisions of the law are merely directory, not mandatory or imperative, and that therefore the board might disregard them. It has been declared upon the floor of this House that these wise and necessary limitations were mere questions of red-tape and sealing-wax, and that they were not entitled to serious consideration. The power to disfranchise a mere question of red-tape and sealing-wax! Why, sir, in the history of this country it has ever been the most important question that could be considered, a question above counting-rooms and ledgers or ships or lands or goods, a question of liberty or slavery. It may well be doubted whether a returning board can consistently with self-government, a government by the people, exercise this power of political excommunication against whole communities, even when treading clearly within the lines of the statutes; but to say that they may pass over and beyond is simply monstrous. Now I will admit that there are certain provisions of the law that are not sacramental, and when not complied with may not be fatal to the ascertainment of the result.

The object of an election is to declare the will of the people. Commissioners, supervisors, returning boards, constables, troops, these are intended as the fitting instruments by means of which the people may attend the polls, deposit their ballots, and make known their choice of the men to be intrusted with the public offices. Cushing on Legislative Assemblies, section 201, says:

Provisions of law which are introduced upon affirmative propositions are commonly, unless essential in their character, merely directory, but if accompanied also by negative words or their equivalent they are of course, without regard to their character, always peremptory.

SEC. 202. In the application of this principle much embarrassment will be prevented by keeping in view these two considerations: First. That it is the language rather than the nature of a statutory provision which makes it imperative or directory. Second. That whether a neglect of the requisitions of a directory statute will be fatal or not to the proceedings does not depend so much upon the nature of the neglect as upon its influence in producing the result of the election. Irregularity in the proceedings of returning officers, though not sufficient of themselves to authorize a presumption of fraud or corruption, are nevertheless always looked upon as strong corroborative circumstances.

SEC. 203. The following cases are selected from a much greater number as examples of irregularities in the conduct of the returning officers, and the observance of the requisites of statutes, and which have been held to be merely directory statutes, and which have been considered as insufficient to invalidate elections: Where the ballot-box was not locked as required by law, but was only tied with tape, and was also placed in the custody of a person not authorized to have charge of it; where, instead of "a box locked or otherwise secured," a gourd carefully stopped and tied up in a handkerchief" was used; where there was an omission to give the notices required by law to two inconsiderable places within an election district; where the returning officers did not meet for the purpose of making their returns until after the time appointed by law; where the poll clerks appointed by the sheriff were not sworn until after the election, or were not sworn at all; where the number of votes being required by law to be set down in writing, was set down in figures; where the return of votes was unsealed, instead of being sealed up as required by law; where the votes were returned after the time prescribed by law; where the opening of the meeting was delayed for two hours beyond the time fixed; where the officers presiding at an election, in the belief that illegal votes had been received, stopped the balloting and commenced anew; where the warrant calling the meeting for the election did not specify the time when the poll would be opened; where the poll was not kept open each day the number of hours required by the law. In all these cases, there being a substantial and good election, notwithstanding the irregularities complained of, the proceedings were not invalidated.

But it is one thing to ascertain and declare the will of the voter and it is a very different thing to proceed to disfranchise the voter. Surely it must be held that the forms of the law should be rigidly complied with in the process of setting aside an election. Section 3 is an example of the use of "negative words or their equivalent," spoken of by Cushing, the section using the word exclude in the sense that the board shall not count returns when protested in the form required by the act until investigated and satisfied of their fairness. Sections 2 and 26 provide how the basis for an investigation shall be laid, and unless the requirements of the law be complied with, namely, that the commissioners submit a statement, corroborated by the affidavits of three respectable citizens made at the time of the election, or a statement submitted by the supervisor and corroborated by the affidavits of three respectable citizens, made at the time of the registration or revision of registration, and attached to and returned with the statement of the votes, it is out of the power of the returning board to raise the question of disfranchisement.

Judge Cooley says in his work on constitutional limitations, page 612:

A great constitutional privilege the highest under the Government is not to be taken away on a mere technicality, but the most liberal intendment should be made in support of the electar's actions.

Page 616:

That one entitled to vote shall not be deprived of the privilege by the action of the authorities, is a fundamental principle.

All regulations of the elective franchise, however, must be reasonable, uniform, and impartial; they must not have for their purpose directly or indirectly to deny or abridge the constitutional right of citizens to vote or unnecessarily to impede its exercise; if they do, they must be declared void.

It cannot be pretended that the board is a court of general and unlimited jurisdiction over all political questions or elections in the State, or is competent to try any cases of intimidation that private parties may bring before it. The board do not claim to be a court. They declare "this board is not a court, but a commission appointed by the Legislature with special and limited powers." Now it is an elementary proposition that a commission cannot exceed the letter of its mandate. Moreover, the constitution of the State of Louisiana, article 73, declares:

The judicial power shall be vested in a supreme court, in district courts, in parish courts, and justices of the peace.

ART 94. No judicial powers, except as committing magistrates in criminal cases, shall be conferred on any officers other than those mentioned in this title.

It cannot be pretended, then, upon any theory of the case that the board can exercise any general judicial powers, any powers at all, except those indispensable to canvass and compile the statements of the commissioners of election and the quasi-judicial powers conferred by the statute only when the conditions in which these cases may arise have been strictly complied with.

If, then, the board has exceeded its jurisdiction it must be admitted that it has usurped power, not abused it merely. It might be held that a mere abuse of power could not be inquired into, but no man in America can be found bold enough to insist that a returning board in any State may defy the laws, may stifle the voice of the people, may set up its own will as the supreme law and compel governors and Legislatures, and Congress, and President, and not only the people of a State but the American people, to bow to its behests.

Cooley says, page 621:

Each board is to receive the returns transmitted to it, if in due form, as correct, and is to ascertain and declare the result as shown by such returns; and if other matters are introduced into the return than those which the law provides they are to that extent unofficial, and such statements must be disregarded. If a district or State board of canvassers assumes to reject returns transmitted to it on other grounds than those appearing upon its face, or to declare persons elected who are not shown by the returns to have received the requisite plurality, it is usurping functions, and its conduct will be reprehensible if not criminal. The action of such boards is to be carefully confined to an examination of the papers before them and a determination of the result therefrom.

INIQUITOUS RULES.

Before proceeding to business the board announced certain rules for its guidance.

Rules 4 and 5 declare that they will first canvass and compile the returns from the parishes where no objection is made to the canvass, and after disposing of these they will then take up the parishes in which objection is made to the vote of any or all polls in such parish.

This opened the door to fraud.

Anybody might offer an objection to the canvass and compilation of the statements of the commissioners before the board; but the law authorized no such procedure. It has been seen that the function of the board was merely ministerial, and it was bound to canvass and compile the statements unless accompanied by a statement from the commissioners showing intimidation on the day of election, corroborated by affidavit of three respectable citizens, or from the supervisor showing intimidation during registration or revision of registration, likewise corroborated by three respectable citizens accompanying the returns. Now the board held that an objection, no matter how slight, or by whom made, or how and when or in what form, was sufficient to arrest the canvass and compilation in any case.

But Rule 8, "requiring when any candidate or his attorney, or other person authorized to do so, shall present a witness before the returning officers, he shall present interrogatories to be propounded to such witness which he shall have previously submitted to his opponent to be crossed at least twenty-four hours, unless such time be named or the cross-interrogatories put before the expiration of that time," is a more flagrant violation of fair dealing and of the law.

This was known in New Orleans even to the newspaper boys to be a system for drilling and debauching ignorant and depraved witnesses or shielding false witnesses, repugnant alike to the laws of Louisiana and to any civilized State! And yet distinguished gentlemen, borne away by prejudice and party passion, have been heard to defend this extraordinary procedure adopted by the returning board as peculiar to the jurisprudence of Louisiana, and have asserted that decrees of courts involving large plantations have been based upon evidence taken in this fashion.

It is a proceeding peculiar to the returning board, which it never devised until the committee of distinguished strangers came to witness them make a fair count of the ballots actually cast!

Rule 10 equally violated the rules of evidence and of justice. It provided that "the evidence for each contested poll in any parish when concluded shall be laid aside until all the evidence is in from all the contested polls in the several parishes where there may be contests, and after the evidence is all in the returning officers will decide the several contests in secret session."

This was to close the door against detection.

Why hold in reserve all the contested cases to be decided together? Why not, as in the uncontested parishes, make the examination in each case separately, hear the witnesses, and decide each one on its own merits, independent of the others, as common justice would require? Why go into secret session? Where is the clause in the law authorizing or permitting it? No conservative was present to tell what actually took place in these secret meetings; whether they deliberated or whether the result had not already been "settled," as it was in 1874, before going into the secret sessions.

There is but one explanation of these unwarranted proceedings. The presumption is they sought secrecy, and they held under advisement all the contested cases together that they might consummate the projected wrong at the conclusion of the canvass, so that there could be no reconsideration, no rehearing, no redress, no exposure.

If further evidence were wanting to show evil intent, it may be found in the practice of the returning board refusing to allow any knowledge of the protests and statements that had been filed until the last moment, and in permitting ex parte affidavits to be filed and then rejecting them, and in steadily declining to settle in advance the order in which the contested cases would be disposed of, and in changing and modifying the rules so that parties were taken by surprise. Even in the mode of taking testimony adopted it was impossible for any one to know in advance the facts to be rebutted or the time when a particular contest would be investigated, or the mode of procedure in certain cases.

Mr. McGloin represented the injustice of this policy, and observed, addressing the board, protesting against its action:

If you will remember, our committee requested that you open all the parishes, so we might see all the protests at as early a stage of proceedings as possible. If you remember, that application was repeated several times and refused, and that the papers were only opened not very many days ago; and I call attention to the fact that a large number of parishes are under general protests, and these are the least accessible, and we have been utterly unable to get the testimony from some of them. Under the rule there were some of these parishes that we were informed were not protested, but when the returns were opened protests were found, and it was too late for us to get our witnesses.

And one of the most striking illustrations of this practice was the infamous Pinkston case. The attorneys for the conservatives protested against the unfairness.

Judge SPOFFORD. We were thrown off our guard on yesterday when the gentleman stated that no affidavits would be received from the other side. It was stated to me by the chairman then that all ex parte affidavits would be excluded from the record hereafter, and although we had made all preparation to have these affidavits sent down here, the rule was changed, and we were compelled to telegraph to our witnesses to be here in order that they may be examined before commissioners, and now for the first time we are made aware the board intends to hear oral testimony.

Mr. MCGLOIN. When your rule stated that affidavits would be taken, we made preparations to have those affidavits. The rule was modified by the chairman announcing that no ex parte affidavits would be received. This new change of the rule has made it so we could not get witnesses down.

Governor WELLS. We shall not delay.

The parish of Ouachita is several hundred miles from the city of New Orleans, and this poor, ignorant, depraved, and unfortunate woman had been brought down, unknown to anybody but to the parties in the plot, to be introduced with all the dramatic effect possible to startle and shock the whole country with the story in which she had been drilled. It is now admitted by all men that this pitiable woman is wholly unworthy of belief, and that the particular persons charged with abusing and torturing her were miles away from the scene at the time the occurrences took place.

Sir, I do not stand here to defend inhumanity and cruelty, and I long for the day when a just government in my State shall bring every wrong-doer, however wealthy or powerful, to punishment, and shall extend the shield of the laws over every person within her borders however humble. But hardly less culpable than the fiends who murdered the husband of this woman, and foully abused her, were the reckless and wicked men who planned this conspiracy to blacken the character of worthy citizens in the parish of Ouachita and to excite sectional hate against the southern people for political effect. They might be guilty of the crimes charged, but none others among the educated or civilized men in my State, white or black.

WHAT THE BOARD DID.

Under these rulings and interpretations of the laws the board conducted the canvass and compilation of the returns of the recent election.

First. The board began by violating the law which created it in two important particulars. There is no limit to the term of office of the members of the board; it is immortal. But the law says expressly, (section 2, act 98, 1872:)

In case of any vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise, by either of the board, then the vacancy shall be filled by the residue of the board.

It provides also that the board "shall represent all political parties," and "shall be composed of five members."

The four members who call themselves republicans alone composed the board that assembled November 13, 1876, in the city of New Orleans. Not one of these members ever offered a motion to fill the vacancy, and no effort was made to do so; and yet an honorable member of this House had the hardihood to stand up before the country and declare upon the information of the members of this board that they had offered the vacant place to six conservative citizens! So that the canvass was begun by gross and confessed violations of the law and of justice, coupled with a false assurance to the gentleman from Maine.

There were only four members of the board, all republicans, and no conservative was elected to fill the vacant place. But how came the place vacant? By the resignation of the conservative member during the canvass of the returns in 1874. Mr. Arroyo was then the conservative member of the board, and he tells us what took place in their executive (secret) sessions, how carefully they deliberated, how conscientiously they weighed the testimony; with what pains they concluded their long investigations, with what grace and courtly dignity their proceedings were conducted. Hear what he says before a committee of this House:

Question. What was done in the executive sessions?

Answer. In the executive (secret) sessions I must say this: Mr. Wells was a very arbitrary man. He was the most arbitrary man that I ever met in my life. He browbeated and bullied me, and the reason I bore it so long was respect for the State in which I have lived all my life. His conduct was most arbitrary. He would take off his coat and walk up and down the room, abusing me and browbeating me, crying "White League, White League, White League!" Nothing but White League. I never suffered so much in my life as I did in the third story of the State-house in a little bit of a room in the Saint Louis Hotel. The room was not more than fourteen feet square, surrounded by police, and I could have been murdered there without anybody ever knowing it.

Q. What was done in those executive (secret) sessions; did they deliberate?

A. It was browbeating me all the time. Nothing but White League, White League, White League!

Q. Did they not consult in regard to what result was to be reached?

A. The result had already been settled. I had nothing to do but to go there and enter my protest. I was never more browbeaten in my life than I was in that room by Governor Wells.

This gentleman resigned, but he remained long enough on the board to tell us what they did in their secret sessions in 1874. Who shall disclose the story of their secret proceedings in the year 1876? To prevent this they violated the law. They shut out the only avenue by which we were permitted to look into the recesses of this secret conclave, but in closing the doors in our faces, and hiding from public view, they trampled the very law into the dust by which they could act at all, and stood before the people in the attitude of conscious guilt.

Second. The board did not canvass and compile, and did not pretend to canvass and compile, the statements of the commissioners of election at all. They announced time and time again that they would be bound by the returns of the supervisors of registration and not by the statements of the commissioners of election. And from the beginning to the close of their work every hour and every day they defied the law. "Said returning officers shall meet in New Orleans to canvass and compile the statements of votes made by the commissioners of election." They took an oath to do this, and yet they never in one instance, observed it.

But what did the returning board do?

They counted out 10,269 conservative votes and 1,763 republican votes. In addition to those counted out by the returning board, thirteen polls were not returned or counted out by the supervisors of registration, and to cap the climax the board counted in or added to the republican vote 88 votes in the parish of Saint Charles, and 179 in the parish of Vernon and deducted that number from the democratic vote. The grand total uncounted, made up and counted out, shows 13,236 conservative, and 2,178 republican.

The annexed table marked A contains the statements of the votes sent up by the commissioners of election.

The table marked B contains a list of all the polls and parishes rejected or suppressed by the returning board and the supervisors.

And the table marked C shows the votes rejected, suppressed, and manufactured by the returning board, exclusive of the five parishes alleged to have been intimidated.

Now every one of these votes, every one of these 15,416 ballots was cast by persons qualified under the law by Kellogg officials and counted by officers appointed by Kellogg and so returned. If they were false or fraudulent, these officers and not the people who voted are to blame.

Now I assert that there was not a single instance throughout the State, with one exception, where the statements required from the commissioners of election or supervisors of registration were made and presented to the board according to law, and throughout their entire proceedings there was not a single instance in which the board rejected the returns from one single polling-place that they did not do so by the exercise of a power in excess of their lawful jurisdiction.

INTIMIDATION.

I challenge any gentleman who was upon the visiting committee of distinguished statesmen, or any attorney for the board, or any gentleman in this House, to produce a single case in which the commissioners of election or the supervisors of registration sent up a statement alleging intimidation in the form, within the time, and in the manner required by the law. Every act therefore in relation to the question of intimidation was a palpable violation of the law, and can only be justified on the ground that there was no limitation to the jurisdiction of the returning board, or that the limitations, if any there be, might be set at naught.

What is the single exception I have referred to? It occurred in the parish of Concordia. The commissioners of election at polls 2, 3, and 4, in that parish made up their statements properly, and the supervisor forwarded them with his own consolidated returns and protest, republican commissioners and supervisor, against polls at which there were republican majorities showing intimidation and unlawful conduct. This was the only poll in the broad limits of the State challenged under the law.

What did the returning board do in this instance? They did not even institute an investigation as the law required. They did not send for persons and papers. They simply counted the returns for their own party.

The only intimidation then, set forth as the law requires so as to give the board jurisdiction of the question at all, during the last election in the State of Louisiana, was republican intimidation alleged by republican officials.

Is it to be supposed that all the other commissioners or supervisors were ignorant of their duties? Had not these very questions arisen in the election of 1874? Why should they neglect to report intimidation now, at the time and in the manner required? The registrar for the State at large had issued circular after circular, impressing upon his officers their duties. Why, then, should they have universally failed to comply with the plain, reasonable, well-known, and simple provisions of the law?

The legal presumption is that the officers understood their duty, and when it is ascertained that no statements were made by them as required by law, the presumption inevitably follows that there was no basis of truth for the statements required; that there was no intimidation or violence for them to report.

But it is alleged that the reason why the officers did not make the statements was because they were afraid to do so; that by so doing they would have forfeited their lives. This is certainly a grave charge and one easily made. But it will not be satisfactory to the American people. Was a single commissioner or supervisor injured on the day of election, or since then, after having made their affidavits in the custom-house in New Orleans and returned to the people whom they had libeled? Not one has been harmed throughout the State.

How are you to ascertain whether their fears were well grounded, or assumed merely for party purposes? The law does not provide that the officers shall be excused from the performance of duty on account of apprehensions of danger. The people have a right to the services of intelligent, brave, and efficient officers; and it will not do to allege cowardice as a good reason for failure to do duty. Are States to be disfranchised because governors and sheriffs and constables and commissioners, backed by the Army of the United States, allege that they were afraid to enforce the laws, and on their responsibility as officers to do their duty? If we have descended to this depth of degradation and base cowardice, away with your mockery of self-government. You have offered a premium upon deceit and falsehood and cowardice, and would breed disorders and distempers sufficient to undermine all the virtues and all the manhood of the people.

It is alleged that though the officers failed to make their statements according to the law, nevertheless there was intimidation; that the returning board, passing over the boundaries of their legal jurisdiction, ascertained the fact, and that was sufficient justification for all they did. Leaving out of view the ill effects, the disastrous consequences sure to flow from permitting officers when called upon to discharge delicate and difficult political duties to substitute their own discretion for the law, let us see how they could ascertain in any satisfactory manner precisely how many voters were deterred from voting and precisely what persons had been guilty of intimidation.

In the first place the invention of the secret ballot was to protect the weak and timid from undue influences of any kind, and it is simply impossible, if the voter desires to conceal his preferences, to ascertain the particular candidates for whom he may vote. The advantages of the ballot were described long before the American Union was dreamed of, by Cicero, who says:

"The ballot is dear to the people, for it uncovers men's faces and conceals their thoughts. It gives them the opportunity of voting as they like and promising all that they are asked."

Who, then, shall define or measure intimidation? How easy to carry an election by arranging in the event of defeat at the polls for the unhappy minority to cry out, "Our friends did not vote; many of them because they were afraid to vote," and so change the result in their favor!

How easy, with efficient political organization in certain parishes where there may have been local disturbances, or where the drift is against your party, to arrange in advance that these disorders should be turned to political advantage by abstaining from the polls altogether on the plea of universal intimidation! How imposing such a spectacle! How it will touch the sympathies of the North! It is not difficult to detect frauds or irregularities, but it is impossible to tell what measure of intimidation may produce results. It is a noticeable fact that in Louisiana few, very few witnesses came forward and testified that they themselves had abstained from voting on account of fear. In nearly every instance they testified as to others; that they believed that so many hundred citizens would have voted, and voted their ticket, if they had not been afraid to do so. Why did not the intimidated come to testify? The answer is, they were afraid to do so. So that intimidation goes so far as to disable witnesses from speaking the truth, and thus makes out its own case without evidence, without proof, without witnesses.

Now, I submit if elections may be carried upon this process of intimidation—if a thousand good men or ten thousand or fifty thousand good citizens may be disfranchised because a few disorderly men create a disturbance, with whom they are not acquainted and have no connection, and a few other timid men refuse on account of fear to exercise their political rights, you have put an end to all government of the people and laid down a foundation for arbitrary power.

It cannot and will not be pretended by any fair man acquainted with the facts that there was not a full vote in the recent election. The last census shows 87,066 white males over twenty-one years and 86,913 colored males over twenty-one years, an aggregate of 173,979. Leaving out of question the causes and the blame, it cannot be denied that the State of Louisiana has possessed few attractions to invite immigration; that its most fertile lands along the Mississippi, once cultivated like gardens, have been for years given over to annual inundations; that taxation has been oppressive, and that government has been inefficient and corrupt, and society in many parts unsettled and disordered. The registration cannot be depended upon; it is utterly without credit. There were 18,145 colored votes registered in the city of New Orleans in 1874 out of a total of 13,341 colored males (over twenty-one;) and the registration of colored votes exceeded by 4,000 the total number of colored adult males returned by the census, while the registration of white males was 10,000 less. Certainly then there can be no complaint of intimidation during registration. There was a total population by the last United States census of 726,275, white and colored, and 173,979 males over twenty-one years. Out of this number in 1874 146,523 votes were polled, and the returns show that a vote of 161,033 was polled in the recent election, an increase of 14,510.

In Massachusetts, in a recent election, with its restricted suffrage, 100 votes were cast only to every 162 males over twenty-one; Illinois cast 100 votes to every 127 males over twenty-one; Maine cast 100 votes to every 120 males over twenty-one; and New York cast 100 votes to every 118 males over twenty-one years, while the returns show that Louisiana, with bad roads and distant polling-places, cast 100 votes to every 119 males over twenty-one years.

Now it must be admitted by all reasonable men that these facts do not leave a very wide margin to intimidation.

ARBITRARY, ILLEGAL, AND FRAUDULENT PROCEEDINGS.

In 1874 the board filled the vacancy which existed then as now, and they admitted counsel representing the candidates to be present from the beginning. In these respects they were much more considerate of public opinion and much more disposed to obey the laws than in 1876, when graver responsibilities rested upon them, and they were surrounded if not sustained by the leaders of the party to which they belong. But the undertaking was more difficult and the prize more dazzling. And it will be demonstrated that throughout their proceedings in the year 1876 violations of the law and disregard of justice were more frequent and flagrant than in 1874, when a committee of this House, composed of the ablest men belonging to the republican party, unanimously condemned their interpretation of the laws and the results pronounced by them.

In 1874 there were contests in twenty-eight parishes, and in 1876 in twenty-four parishes. In 1874 the official statements of the commissioners showed a conservative majority of from three to five thousand, while in the last election they show a majority of from six to eight thousand. In 1874 146,523 votes were cast, while in the last election, notwithstanding the fact that the city of New Orleans containing one-fourth of the population of this State polled but a very slightly increased vote, 161,033 votes were cast, showing an increase in the country parishes of nearly 14,510 in two years.

Let us look at facts and instances.

IBERIA.

It is not pretended that there was any intimidation. It was alleged by the supervisor that the commissioners at poll 4, third ward, had not written the word "voted" across the certificates of the voters as soon as they had deposited their ballots; but the republican commissioners made no such statement or protest. The supervisor was not present, nor could he have seen the certificates, for they are retained by the voters. There was no evidence of the fact. There was no proof that any one of them had voted or attempted to vote more than once; but it was in proof that this was the largest democratic poll in that parish and it was rejected by the board; 322 democratic votes and 11 republican were thrown out. Even had this charge been true it would have shown merely that the republican commissioners failed in one part of their duty, but that no blame or fault attached to the voters. The charge was not investigated, much less established. But against the largest republican poll in that parish, the statements of votes themselves showed on their face that they had not been sworn to by the commissioners, as the law directs—an indisputable irregularity—and yet this poll was counted.

More than this, in the presence of the distinguished visitors, both the president and Mr. Anderson ordered the compilation of the returns from this parish, which was tantamount to saying there is no dispute; nothing to investigate; but the result showed that when in secret session they reversed this action, resolved to count in the republican poll, giving 377 votes for Packard, and to cast out the democratic poll, with 322 for Nicholls.

WEBSTER.

The only statement or protest before the board was that there were twelve double ballots cast and that they had been rejected. There was not one word of complaint, and yet the returning board threw out a poll containing 436 conservative votes and 194 republican—a conservative loss of 242.

VERNON.

The returns were received by registered letter on the 17th. The slight irregularities, touching only the tally-sheets, were declared by President Wells himself to be "trifling." He said they were merely "technical." But, while in secret session, the board cast out 179 votes for the conservatives and added 179 to the republicans, causing a loss to the conservatives of 358 votes.

The republican candidates for the local offices rejected and scorned the fraudulent returns of the board and declared that they had been fairly defeated.

SAINT CHARLES.

There was a question as to the legality of two polls. It was settled neither way, but the board in secret session simply added 67 votes to the republican majority, increasing it thereby.

RICHLAND.

There was nothing from the supervisor or commissioners. The remarks on the tally-sheets are with reference to scattering votes, and nothing else. Certain protests were on file and said to be by President Wells "democratic protests." These returns were received by the board on the 18th of November with these statements only in evidence. They were opened and canvassed on the 24th day of November. On November 30 it appears that the supervisor of this parish turned up at the custom-house in New Orleans, appeared before F. A. Woolfley and made an affidavit embodying a protest against the election in a parish several hundred miles away, without notice to the candidates or people in that parish, couched in vague and general terms, with no allegations showing specific disorders or that a man was hurt. The returning board in secret session threw out 619 conservative majority. This parish was held over by the board on a general protest filed by Kellogg until the supervisor could reach the city and be induced to file a protest manufactured in the custom-house.

FRANKLIN.

In the absence of all statements, the board in secret session reduced the conservative vote by 46, and against this parish, several hundred miles from New Orleans, there appeared an affidavit, also manufactured in the city of New Orleans, as late as the 24th of November, so vague and general as to be simply ridiculous.

The returns from this parish remained for some time in an express office in New Orleans and were produced by Mr. Cavanac, who volunteered to pay the express charges, the board declining positively to do so.

DE SOTO.

The board also in secret session contrived to throw out 692 conservative votes and 181 republican, causing a loss to the conservatives of 511 votes.

The supervisor swore to his returns over five hundred miles from New Orleans on the 10th of November, and they were received by the board on the 18th, duly stamped, post-marked, and sealed, and when opened were found to contain affidavits dated in the city of New Orleans November 25.

The republican candidates for the Legislature and sheriff would not accept the offices tendered them by the board, and came out in letters declaring they had been fairly defeated, and that the election was quiet and peaceable.

The secretary of the returning board was detected by one of the gentlemen present, Mr. Cavanac, changing his receipt from the 18th to the 25th of November.

TANGIPAHOA.

The commissioners' statements were placed before the board, and yet, though no protests or statements were filed against them, the board cast out 118 democratic votes and 13 republican.

LIVINGSTON.

They threw out 378 conservative votes, with no protests and statements from supervisor and commissioners, but on affidavits not filed until 28th November, frivolous in themselves, though this parish is but a few hours from New Orleans.

NATCHITOCHES.

When the returns were received Mr. Anderson observed: "The compiled statement is sworn to by E. K. Rose, supervisor, before John Barlow, deputy clerk. The remarks give a list of scattering votes cast for certain persons. Everything is in form. The result is as follows."

Thereupon he announced the result.

Concluding the matter, President Wells said: "Send the returns over to the clerk to be compiled." Such was the official order taken. Now this was an announcement to the visitors that the matter was decided, for compilation was the last and final disposition to be made.

But what did the board do? Why, in secret session they threw out two polls at which the conservatives had 339 majority.

Now, although it appeared that by the State supervisors' returns three of the republican electors had not been voted for, the board disregarded the statements of the commissioners of election and supervisors as well, and changed the returns in secret session, giving all the electors (republican) an equal vote.

LA FAYETTE.

Their conduct while in secret session with regard to this parish was still more glaring and indefensible. The supervisor swears to his returns, including those of the commissioners of election in his parish, on the 14th. But on the 28th of November, the very day he delivered them to the board in the city of New Orleans, he files an affidavit against his returns. The supervisor omits, on his own responsibility, and without the shadow of authority or right, 436 conservative votes, and the board threw out 83 conservative votes and 4 republican votes, making a conservative loss in that parish of 515, and yet there was placed before the board the affidavit of Mr. Clegg, the supervisor's clerk, showing that the supervisor himself had declared there was nothing to object to in the parish. But, without notice to the people or candidates in that parish, the board and supervisor conspired to change the result.

PARISH OF ORLEANS.

Ward 2. Poll 6 was cast out by board.

No allegation of intimidation. Supervisor A. G. Brim said the return made by commissioner was so indistinct and imperfect he could not embrace it in his consolidated return, and so he forwards the tally-sheet, statement of votes, &c., having omitted to include it.

It was hard to say whether at poll 6 De Blanc got 247 or 249. Tally-sheet shows 249. It is very plain.

Burke suggested sending to the office of the secretary of state to verify figures.

Board, with the tally-sheets before them, cast out the poll—248 democratic votes; 93 republican votes; 155 democratic loss.

Ward 11. Lewis Bachers, supervisor, sworn to on 13th before P. G. Deslonde.

Supervisor left out poll No. 2, stating, under the head of remarks, that the tally-sheets and statements of votes were not delivered to him by the commissioners.

This was contradicted by Mr. Burke, and United States supervisor and commissioners themselves contradict him. Upon examination the tally-sheet was found to be all right.

Board cast out the poll—413 democratic votes; 94 republican votes; 319 democratic loss. Even if they had not been delivered, the board could have procured the duplicates.

Ward 7. Supervisor omitted poll 3 because he had not received statement from commissioners within twenty-four hours. Board rejected this poll in final compilation on this ground, causing loss of 173 to democratic party, although they had frequently held that that was no valid ground for rejection, and in the case of parish of Saint Landry had so acted. (See Anderson's remarks, report.)

CALDWELL PARISH.

Returns received November 14; sworn to November 9.

The only protest disclosed at the opening, November 27, was the general protest of Messrs. Packard, Brewster, and others, filed November 25. No copy of same with the clerk of the district court.

The vote cast in this parish was 631 democratic and 285 republican, and the board threw out poll 1—141 democratic.

PARISH OF SAINT LANDRY.

Opened Monday, November 27, four packages, three of them not sealed and in very bad order, signed and sworn to on the 15th of November, before the clerk of the fifteenth judicial district court.

Mr. Wells remarked that there was a pile of protests, but they are for the local officers.

The protests in the case of this parish were dated November 27, the same day the returns were delivered to the returning board, and were made in the city of New Orleans.

This parish cast 3,746 democratic and 2,432 republican votes; and the returning board threw out 120 democratic and 38 republican votes.

Mr. Anderson of the board assured the visiting committee that the returns were in the city on November 18, and yet they were withheld and only delivered to the board on November 27.

CATAHOULA.

Returns were received November 16 and opened on November 27 There were no statements alleging intimidation, or violence, or any irregularities. The board threw out 97 democratic votes and 14 republican votes.

CLAIBORNE.

Received by mail, November 14, two packages; one mailed from Homer, November 10, and one mailed from Homer, November 11; seals broken at the end and attention of the board called to the fact by Colonel Zacharie. Only remarks were as to scattering votes, so said Kenner, of board, and Green, clerk.

The votes cast in this parish were: democratic, 1,576; republican, 432; and the returning board threw out poll No. 3—democratic votes 184, republican none. Colonel Zacharie asked:

Is there any protest in that package?
Mr. KENNER. No, sir.
Mr. GREEN, clerk. Are there any protests in the parish of Claiborne?
Mr. GREEN. No, sir; none, sir; none except a general protest.

Governor Wells said there was a lengthy statement from the supervisors not attached to returns and dated November 24, accompanied by two affidavits, which were entirely rebutted before Mr. MEADE'S committee.

The supervisor of this parish is a clerk in the New Orleans post-office, resident of New Orleans, and was sent to the parish to do such work; drew his pay from State and from Post-Office Department same time.

GRANT.

The statement of votes made by the commissioners of election in this parish was returned to the republican and the democratic United States supervisors by the commissioners at the request of the chairmen of the executive committees of the republican and democratic parties in Grant Parish, and by the consent of the candidates of both parties.

The State supervisor had designated the polling-places, appointed the commissioners of election, and had then absented himself from the parish on the day of election, in collusion with Governor Kellogg—as was proved before the Morrison committee—and the republican and democratic United States supervisors made out a consolidated return, and forwarded the same, together with the statement of votes of the commissioners of election, to the returning board, and Mr. Richardson, United States supervisor, delivered all the returns to the returning board in person, November 29, and the vote was announced.

After Mr. Richardson made a full explanation of all the facts concerning the election, the board laid the parish over for consideration. The statement of votes of the commissioners of election and tally-sheets were all in perfect order, according to law, and the board threw out the vote of the entire parish, seven polls, 515 democratic and 95 republican votes. (See testimony before Morrison committee, and full testimony filed before the returning board from D. A. Ward, supervisor; W. L. Richardson, United States supervisor, and E. A. Burke, fully refuting all charges of irregularity except as to the absence of Ward, and proving Kellogg's complicity.) The Sherman report contains all the testimony and interrogatories against the parish and none in its favor.

BOSSIER.

The returns were received on Monday, 27th, and on that day opened. No statement attached or submitted, alleging intimidation or violence, and yet the board cast out 280 democratic votes and 78 republican.

LA FOURCHE.

The returns from this parish were opened on November 22, and though no statements were filed with the clerk of the district court or laid before the board, yet in secret session, without notice to the people of the parish, the board cast out 314 democratic and 176 republican votes.

I exclude from this table every one of the polling-places in the five parishes alleged to have been intimidated. Without reference to these parishes, and allowing the republicans all that they may claim elsewhere, the conservatives carry the State, if you give them the 5,464 votes thus illegally and fraudulently disposed of.

In the foregoing nineteen parishes a democratic majority of 5,464 was thrown out in violation of law and of justice.

These proceedings were wholly indefensible. I repeat, strike out the five parishes, alleged to have been intimidated, altogether from the count and the conservatives carry the State.

THE FIVE PARISHES ALLEGED TO HAVE BEEN INTIMIDATED.

But what are the facts with regard to the five parishes, namely: East Baton Rouge, East Feliciana, West Feliciana, Morehouse, and Ouachita?

The total vote of these parishes in 1874 and 1876 is as follows:

Parishes.	1874.	1876.
Morehouse	1,671	2,168
Ouachita	2,460	2,658
East Feliciana	2,535	1,742
West Feliciana	1,859	2,096
East Baton Rouge	4,102	3,864
Total	12,627	12,458

In three of them, Morehouse, Ouachita, and West Feliciana, there was an increase of 862 votes, while in two of them there was a falling off—East Feliciana and East Baton Rouge.

EAST BATON ROUGE.

The supervisor of this parish had been manager of a snake show on the levee at New Orleans, but moved to Mississippi and was a member of the Legislature of that State at the time he was acting supervisor. This officer refused to consolidate with his returns the statements of the commissioners of election for five polls, thus taking it upon himself arbitrarily to disfranchise 1,147 democratic voters and 147 republican.

His returns were sworn to on November 11. No statement or protest was filed with the clerk or sworn to. He kept his returns in the custom-house until the 24th, and upon affidavits and protests not authorized by the law, and every one of which were refuted and disproved, the board threw out 304 democratic and 10 republican votes, so that between the supervisor and the board 1,451 democratic and 157 republican votes were rejected. This officer filed his returns with the clerk of court as correct under oath, and afterward confessed that he had subsequently changed the face of the said returns by placing thereon a protest against them.

WEST FELICIANA.

The returns were sworn to on November 13 and opened on November 25. There were no protest or remarks on the face of the consolidated returns, but affidavits and protests made up subsequently in the custom-house in New Orleans.

It was alleged in June last that outrages had been committed in this parish and a resolution was adopted by this House directing the special committee then sitting in New Orleans to investigate and report upon them.

Your committee by a unanimous vote have adopted the following report of this subcommittee:

GENTLEMEN OF THE COMMITTEE: Your subcommittee proceeded to the town of Bayou Sara, in the parish of West Feliciana, and examined fourteeen witnesses. Among them, besides citizens of the parish, of both democratic and republican parties, were parish and State officers and officers of the Federal Government, military and civil.

The testimony discloses that the only outrage alleged to have been recently committed in the parish was the murder of Max Aronson, on the 11th of May, 1876, and that the findings of the jury at the coroner's inquest were correct. We call attention to this document.

PARISH OF WEST FELICIANA,
State of Louisiana:

At the inquisition held before the coroner of said parish, L. S. McCrindell, on plantation of H. S. Perkins, over the body of Max Aronson, on the 13th day of May, A. D. 1876, the jury, whose names are hereunto subscribed, upon their oaths say that Max Aronson came to his death by gun-shot wounds in head by the hands of a body of armed negroes, unknown.

L. S. McCRINDELL, Coroner.

MAY 15, 1876.

CLERK OF THE SEVENTH JUDICIAL COURT,
June 21, 1876.

A true copy.

CHARLES J. HOWARD, Clerk.

It appears that Max Aronson was believed to have chastised a colored man for stealing a beef, and that the colored people of the vicinity regarded this punishment as an outrage upon and a wrong to their race. A number of them, supposed to be twenty or thirty, met together, sought Max Aronson at his own house, and shot him down in his doorway. It appears from the evidence that politics had nothing to do with this crime. Max Aronson was identified with neither political party, and had but recently arrived in the neighborhood.

Much of the testimony taken incidentally relates to the character of the local officers, the disposition of the people, and the political condition of the parish. A part of it refers to a disturbance of considerable magnitude in an adjoining county of the State of Mississippi, growing out of the attempt of the officers of the law to arrest the murderers of Max Aronson.

As these matters were beyond the scope of the inquiry and duty of your committee, and the evidence taken incomplete, owing to the absence of many of the principal witnesses, who were in attendance upon the Senate committee at Jackson, Mississippi, your committee do not feel justified in making any comments upon them.

R. L. GIBSON.
C. B. DARRALL.

This report was unanimously adopted by the committee.

It was in evidence that at the very time the local politicians were calling for troops, and reporting that the streets of the village were running with blood, the United States officer on the spot, Major Bascom, telegraphed to his superior officers that it was as orderly as a New England town.

It was also in evidence that there were local disorders and disturbances, but that most of them might be ascribed to the supervisor of the parish and his brother, who having the leadership of the ignorant negroes, had for several years lorded it over the property and intelligence of the community, breeding discontent and creating ill-feeling and disorders, thus rendering life and property insecure.

MOREHOUSE PARISH.

The consolidated statement of the supervisor was dated November 11, and was received on November 27. Many affidavits and protests were filed charging intimidation and violence, but most of these were proved to be forgeries and to have been manufactured to order in the custom-house at New Orleans, but none of them were in form as required by section 26. The people of the parish had no knowledge of any protest or statements, and the republican candidate returned by the board to the senate withdrew, declaring he had not been elected.

EAST FELICIANA.

The supervisor of this parish swore to his returns on November 10 and they were received by mail on November 13. The affidavits and protests were dated as late as November 21 or 23.

The supervisor introducing himself to me on the streets in New Orleans some time before the election told me his name was Anderson and that he had been driven from the parish. I said to him at once, "Sir, I will go with you to the parish and investigate this matter to the bottom. I am glad you have given me an opportunity to thoroughly look up a case of intimidation. We will start this evening or in the morning." He replied that he would like to introduce me to two citizens from the parish. We went across the street and met two gentlemen. They told me that Anderson had a difficulty with his own clerk who was a republican and that he was afraid of him.

Anderson told me afterward that he would return, that he had no fears of the people and that it was not necessary for me to visit the parish, that the parish would go overwhelmingly democratic and he was at a loss what to do, as he would be held responsible by his party friends. I repeated that I would cheerfully go with him now if he thought there was any necessity for it, that I knew the people of that parish and that it grieved me to hear them charged with intimidation, and that he ought to perform his duties honestly and fearlessly and let the consequences take care of themselves.

It has been proved since the election that no tickets were sent to this parish, but that instructions were sent to the leaders that the republicans should abstain from voting, with the view of rejecting the vote of the parish on the plea of universal intimidation. All the republican tickets used in the State are issued in the city of New Orleans and sent to the county parishes by special messengers and where none were sent no election could be held, that is, no republicans could vote.

OUACHITA.

The supervisor swore to his returns before the clerk of the district court on November 11. No protests were filed with the returns nor any statement as required by law. Certain statements were filed by the commissioners at certain polls, and by the United States supervisor, to the effect that the election was fair and peaceable.

Certain protests and returns were filed as late as the 24th, and the supervisor, Grady, wrote to secretary of the board inclosing affidavit of Eliza Pinkston, dated November 23, showing that the returns had been received by the returning board before the 23d, though they were entered as received on the 24th. Here is the letter:

NEW ORLEANS, November 23, 1876.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed please find affidavit of Eliza Pinkston, which was received too late to file with my returns. Please say that it was brought in with the returns mentioned

Very respectfully,

M. GRADY, Supervisor.

Mr. ABELL, Secretary of the Board.

The affidavit of Eliza Pinkston was dated the 25th! It appears that the people in this parish were in an excited state about the election; that, before the election, difficulties had occurred between certain leading men, which resulted in creating distrust and apprehension, so that many of the citizens formed associations to protect their lives, their families, and their property.

This condition of affairs resulted from the want of an honest and firm government, willing and able to enforce the laws and to dispense justice with a steady and an inflexible determination.

NO JURISDICTION OF ELECTORAL VOTE.

Had the returning board authority to count the electoral vote? The Constitution of the United States (article 11, section 1) provides that "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress."

The meaning of this is obvious, for the language is affirmative and simple. Each State shall appoint the electors. Now, what is a State?

It will not do to turn to Vattel or Burlamaqui or other writers upon international law for a definition of an American State. We know pretty well what the true notion of a State in the American Union is. The highest and fairest conception of the State is the people thereof acting through a government, popular in form and in substance. The people constitute the state. L'état, c'est moi was the exclamation of Louis XIV. To-day the people exclaim "We are the State." This is the fundamental and dominant idea of our institutions. We know then, when the Constitution says the State shall appoint, it is meant that the people shall appoint. How shall they exercise this power? The plain, simple, and constitutional answer is "as the Legislature may direct." Either then the Legislature may appoint directly, acting for the people, or provide by proper legislation the manner in which the people of the State may do so.

Could the Legislature delegate this power to some other agency independent alike of State and of itself? If so, then the presidential office might be filled, not by the State or the people of the State acting through their Legislature, but by some alien or foreign power. Nevertheless, it has been held that it was competent under this provision of the Constitution for the Legislature to direct, not how the State shall appoint electors, but to take this power away from the State and to create a returning board of four or five men who should select the presidential electors.

If the Legislature should direct any other power or persons to appoint the electors, such direction would be clearly in violation of the Constitution and such appointment invalid, for the Constitution says the State shall appoint. And so again, if the State should appoint in some other mode than as directed by the Legislature, such appointment would be equally invalid, for the Constitution is peremptory that they shall be appointed as the Legislature may direct; and should the Legislature fail to direct how the appointment should be made, the State could not appoint. The two things must then concur. The State must appoint, but the Legislature must direct the manner of appointment. Should either element fail, no valid result can be produced.

If this view be correct, it will not, it cannot be contended that a returning board of a State may be so constituted as to exercise plenary power and arbitrarily to reject returns on this side or that, so as in effect to substitute its own appointments for those of the people. Could that be regarded as consistent with section 4, article 4, of the Constitution, which imposes the following obligation: "The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government?"

The inference is that the States were already in the enjoyment of a republican form of government, for the word guarantee implies something already in existence, and not something to be procured. Hence it is clear that the States of the American Union in the contemplation of the Constitution were republican States enjoying the rights and privileges of self-government, the right to choose their rulers, to be represented in the Government that should tax them.

It is idle then to say that any Legislature in this Union can direct that the electors for President and Vice-President shall be appointed by four or five men in the State, and not by the people thereof.

If, then, it shall appear that the returning board of Louisiana, either in accordance with the law or in violation of the law, actually appointed the presidential electors, it must be admitted that such appointments are clearly invalid. They do not constitute the State. No such institution is known to the Constitution as entitled to the appointing power, for a returning board or perpetual council cannot for a moment be regarded as a State at all, or part of the State, in the sense of the Constitution. It is an oligarchy pure and simple, the most hateful of all forms of tyranny and the oldest and most persistent enemy of the government of the people.

It is manifest, then, that any electors that may have been appointed by the returning board, even though the Legislature may have so directed, hold by an invalid title. The defenders of the returning board claim that under the law they had the power, absolute and unconditional, to throw out the votes of one, two, a dozen, or fifty parishes (counties) in the State. One thousand or ten thousand or a hundred thousand voters might be by them disfranchised and only the votes of a few polls counted. And it is in proof that the voices of over fifteen thousand duly qualified voters were thus stifled.

Now, an election is not a mere formality. Its object is not simply to permit every citizen duly qualified to vote. The end and aim is to ascertain the will of the majority. The Government is controlled by a majority of the people, and however small that majority may be, it is charged with the responsibilities of administration and is entitled to carry out its policy.

Hence if the returning board or any body of men should be clothed with the authority either to disfranchise a large proportion of the citizens entitled by law to vote, before the election, without a hearing, or to reject their votes after the election, so as to turn the scale and give the majority to the side they might prefer, there really has been no election; no majority of the people has declared itself, and the result remains in doubt. An election means a decisive and final choice. But there has been no choice by the people in the case stated. The State acts and can act only by majorities, and it cannot be said that the State has appointed, for only a part of the State has been permitted to speak and until the whole body of the people who are entitled to declare their will has been heard from it cannot be said that the State has spoken—has appointed. But in place of her will has been substituted the preference of the returning board. I do not mean to say that this result would follow from the exercise of the canvassing functions by the board correcting manifest errors or frauds or irregularities of any kind, but the power of excommunication, not against individual voters but against whole communities, is an arbitrary power from the nature of the case and irreconcilable with the fundamental principles of American government as well as the written language of the Constitution.

But let us consider for a moment whether the Legislature has directed the manner in which the State of Louisiana shall appoint electors. The last act of the State was approved November 20, 1872, and the seventy-first section thereof provides that "this act shall take effect from and after its passage, and that all others on the subject of election laws be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

If it be held that this act repeals all the previous laws relating in any manner to the subject of elections, we are forced to find provision for the appointment of the presidential electors in the act or to reach the conclusion that no provision was made by the Legislature for their appointment. What, then, are the provisions in the act of 1872 bearing upon the subject matter? The first section provides "that all elections for State, parish, and judicial officers, for members of the General Assembly, and for members of Congress, shall be held on the first Monday in November, and said elections shall be styled the general elections." "They shall be held in the manner and form and subject to the regulations hereafter prescribed, and no other."

Section 2 provides "that five persons, to be elected by the senate, from all political parties, shall be the returning officers for all elections in the State, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum and have power to make the returns of all elections."

It will be admitted that no elections could be held by the people in any State for electors unless provision were made for the same by law. Our liberty is not a wild, stormy South American liberty, nor the chaotic license of the French communists, but is secured to us and regulated by law. The people do not govern themselves directly, but through the agencies of courts, executives, Legislatures. The phrase "all elections," then, means all elections that are provided for by law. I ask gentlemen, then, to point out the provisions in this act directing the manner in which the State shall appoint presidential electors. The first section enumerates carefully the offices. It says distinctly that all elections for State, parish, and judicial officers, for members of the General Assembly, and for members of Congress, shall be held in the manner and form and subject to the regulations hereafter prescribed. These are "all elections" for which legal provision is made in the act. Now not a word is said about presidential electors anywhere in the act. The power to appoint presidential electors is derived from the Constitution of the United States. It never belonged to the States or people of the States until the Constitution was adopted and conferred it upon them.

Nor can the appointing power be exercised unless the Legislature shall direct the manner in which it shall be done in obedience to the fiat of the Constitution. The only reference to the matter in the act of 1872 may be found in section 20, which provides that in every year in which an election shall be held for electors for President and Vice-President such election shall be held at the time fixed by act of Congress; but no provision is made as to the manner and form. Such an election, it will be seen, was excluded from the catalogue in the first section, and is referred to in the twenty-ninth section as if provision had been made for it in some previous act and it now only remained to provide that such election shall be held at the time fixed by act of Congress. Hence the conclusion is irresistible that either no provision exists at all in Louisiana, or it must be contained in some act anterior to that of 1872.

Has, then, the general election law of 1872 repealed the special provisions of antecedent acts for the appointment of electors for President and Vice-President?

By act of 1868, re-adopted in the revised statutes of 1870, the Legislature directed the manner of these appointments.

SEC. 2824. Every qualified voter in the State shall vote for electors as follows: Two persons shall be selected from the State at large and one person shall be chosen from each congressional district in this State; and in case any ticket shall contain two or more names of persons residing in the same district (except the two chosen from the State at large) the first of such names only shall be considered as duly voted for.

SEC. 2826. Immediately after the receipt of a return from each parish, or on the fourth Monday of November if the returns should not sooner arrive, the governor, in presence of the secretary of state, the attorney-general, a district judge of the district in which the seat of government may be established, or any two of them, shall examine the returns and ascertain therefrom the persons who have been duly elected electors.

SEC. 2829. The electors shall meet at the seat of government on the day appointed for their meeting by the act of Congress, the first Wednesday in December, and shall then and there proceed to execute the duties and services enjoined upon them by the Constitution of the United States in the manner therein prescribed.

SEC. 2830. If any one or more of the electors chosen by the people shall fail from any cause whatever to attend at the appointed place, at the hour of four p. m., of the day prescribed for their meeting, it shall be the duty of the other electors immediately to proceed by ballot to fill such vacancy or vacancies.

Here are the ample, necessary provisions for the appointment of electors for President and Vice-President. But in the act of 1872 the only allusion to the subject is as to the time, but not a word as to the number of electors, not a word as to whether they shall be elected by districts or for the State at large, or whether by the Legislature or the people. Not a word as to how vacancies that may happen in the electoral college shall be filled. The republican members of the electoral college in Louisiana did proceed to fill two vacancies, and thus recognized the act of 1868–'70. If it be held that this act was repealed by the law of 1872, then clearly no electors have been appointed by the State of Louisiana. If, on the contrary, the act of 1868, re-adopted in 1870, remains in force, the governor of Louisiana is to examine the returns of the election, and the returning board have no duty to perform in respect to them.

The special provisions of the act of 1868–'70, with regard to a special subject, under the well-established rule of construction, will not be held to be repealed by the general terms or phrases in the general law of 1872 Sedgwick upon Statutory and Constitutional Law, page123, says:

In regard to the mode in which laws may be repealed by subsequent legislation, it is laid down as a rule, that a general statute without negative words will not repeal the particular provisions of a former one, unless the two acts are irreconcilably inconsistent.

Whatever view may be taken of the subject, and whichever interpretation may be adopted, it must be admitted that the returning board were not authorized by law to canvass and compile the returns for the electors for President and Vice-President.

WHAT JURISDICTION IN STATE ELECTIONS?

But has the returning board any legal jurisdiction over the returns for members of the General Assembly and for governor and lieutenant-governor? The constitution of the State, article 45, provides the returns of all elections for members of the General Assembly shall be made to the secretary of state, and article 34 provides that each house of the General Assembly shall judge of the qualifications, election, and returns of its members.

But section 44 of the act of 1872 requires the clerk of the house and secretary of the senate to place on the rolls the names of persons returned as elected by this board, and declares that they and "none other shall be competent to organize the house or senate."

It has been seen that there is no limit by law to the term of office of the members of the board, and that they have the right of succession—the power of filling vacancies.

The only mode in which the board might be dissolved is by a repeal of the law creating it; but if it possesses the power to determine who shall be members of the General Assembly, if they can arbitrarily decide who shall constitute the General Assembly, it follows that they could compel an obligation from the members they might consent to return not to repeal the law, or they might make their returns so as always to retain a majority of their own political partisans in power.

Nor is this idle speculation. In 1874 the returning board, instead of allowing the returns of all elections of the General Assembly to be made to the secretary of the State, merely canvassing and compiling them ministerially, assumed to pass final judgment upon them, rejecting many altogether, so as practically to reverse the result in eight parishes and to suppress all the returns and deny representation in four parishes.

In that year the statement of the commissioners of election showed seventy conservative representatives to have been elected by the people to the lower house out of a total of one hundred and eleven members. In the parishes of Assumption, Caddo, Iberia, Jackson, Rapides, Saint Tammany, Terre Bonne, and Avoyelles, electing fourteen conservative representatives, the returning board threw out a sufficient number of polls to reverse the entire result and return as elected the thirteen republicans and one independent candidate that had been defeated at the polls. In the parishes of De Soto, Bienville, Grant, and Winn electing five conservative representatives, and in one of which (Bienville) there was not even a republican candidate, the returning board failed to make any returns at all and sought thereby to prevent the members elected in those parishes from participating in the organization of the house of representatives; and this house was thus packed in the interest of a party, the party willing to perpetuate the board.

This wrong, it is true, was partly remedied by the intervention of certain leading republican members of the House of Representatives, who carried through an adjustment called the "Wheeler compromise," under which most of the fraudulently returned members withdrew and the representatives elected by the people took their seats. But who shall intervene now? Who shall correct the wrong done to the people of Louisiana in the last election? Shall another committee of this House intervene and find a remedy?

It is necessary that a roll should be made up; that the returns should be canvassed; that the returning board should canvass and compile the statements of the commissioners of election; but under this provision of the Constitution its duties must be merely ministerial. It is reserved for the General Assembly to pass final judgment upon the merits of each case contested, procuring all the information through its appropriate committees.

The members returned have only prima facie title to their seats, and the board can confer no other. They can only give a prima facie title. To do this it is only necessary, it is only right, that they should make an examination to establish a prima facie title, and this may be done by the face of the returns. Why go into the merits of the election? Why ascertain all the facts back of the returns when at best they can only furnish a prima facie right; and how can they take jurisdiction of the whole question, on the merits, when this power is reserved in the very language of the constitution and therefore prohibited to the returning board. "Each house of the General Assembly shall judge of the qualifications, election, and returns of its members."

But article 48 of the constitution also reserves to the General Assembly the determination of the election of the governor and lieutenant-governor. It provides that—

The members of the General Assembly shall meet in the House of Representatives to examine and count the votes. The person having the greatest number of votes for governor shall be declared duly elected.

Now will it be seriously contended that another body may be interposed by mere legislative enactment between the commissioners who conduct the elections and make up the statement of the votes at the polling-places and the General Assembly, with power to reject votes, to quash the returns; not merely to canvass and compile the votes, but to change the result according to their direction? What then will be left to the General Assembly? For if this vast power be confided to the returning board, there is an end of the whole question, and the General Assembly would be powerless to correct error or to escape from the binding force of a fraudulent count and canvass of the board.

Nor can it be maintained with any show of reason or authority that the General Assembly and the returning board possess concurrent and equal jurisdiction over the returns for members of the General Assembly, and for governor and lieutenant-governor; for the exercise of the power by either precludes the other, and is wholly inconsistent with such pretensions by the other.

And a conflict ensues the moment the returning board passes from a consideration of the face of the returns, the prima facie case, to the investigation of the actual occurrences at the polls and the merits; that moment it ceases to exercise ministerial functions and assumes to pass judgment upon facts outside the record. If this power be lodged with the returning board, its voice would be binding and final upon the representatives of the people; but no legislative enactment can convey power in derogation of the supreme law, the constitution.

FEDERAL RELATIONS.

In bringing these remarks to a close, I will merely add that the problem to be solved in Louisiana was no ordinary one in political history. The population was almost equally divided between the white people and the colored people. From time immemorial the latter had been held in slavery, and the former were their masters. Suddenly, at the close of a gigantic war, the slaves were not only made free and not only endowed with the right of suffrage but the leading white men in the State were disfranchised. Livy and Dionysius tell us that when Tarquin the Proud was asked what was the best mode of governing a conquered city, he replied by beating down with his staff all the tallest poppies in his garden. (Livy, 1, 54.)

It was a hazardous experiment to attempt to govern a proud American Commonwealth through its former slaves, without the slightest training to fit them for the weighty responsibilities of self-government. It will not be held by those at least acquainted with the institution of slavery that it was one to form statesmen in, or to develop among its subjects those strenuous virtues essential to the maintenance of freedom.

If it had been foretold sixteen years ago that the white people of Louisiana within eight years would be overcome in a fierce struggle, and that a few strangers from the North, uniting with their slaves, should have complete control of their government; that they would quietly accept a denial of all representation in it, endure a taxation equivalent to confiscation, and witness a carnival of crime and imbecility in which the guarantees for order, life, and property alike well-nigh perished, it would have been regarded as the delusion of a disordered mind. That there should have been outbreaks during this transitional period, so sharp, decisive, and overwhelming, is not to be wondered at.

Sir, I feel that I express the true sentiments of the white people of Louisiana when I say that, while they may regret the large pecuniary losses arising from the emancipation of the colored man, they would not under any circumstances consent that he should be remanded to slavery or be deprived of one jot or tittle of his political rights and privileges. For all the losses they have incurred and for all the disasters they have experienced, if there can be any compensation, it is in the fact that the institution of slavery has been extirpated, root and branch, from the soil of my beloved State. I thank God that to-day every man in my State is as free as I am and that the whole people is in the full enjoyment of equal political rights and privileges.

Nor, sir, do I stand here to denounce the North or northern men who may cast their fortunes with us. While I claim no ancestry that may boast of Pilgrim or Puritan origin, I would be the last man to decry the hardy virtues of the men who landed on Plymouth Rock or to detract from the merits and excellent traits of their descendants.

The city of New Orleans is no stranger to New England. You can hardly mention a name dear to New England that has not its representative in the great southern metropolis, or within our borders, upon the banks of the great Father of Waters. How many men honored and beloved in every walk of life do I recall whose birthplaces were in the mountains of New England. They assisted to lay the foundations of civil society in Louisiana and to strengthen them with the best elements of New England faith and culture.

And so long as the majestic figures of Washington and Lafayette look down upon us from yonder canvas, I shall feel that their descendants, mingling together with those of Adams and Winthrop and Palfrey and Eustis on the soil of Louisiana, may not plead in vain before an American Congress for simple justice.

These are the people that you would stigmatize as barbarians! Is that the spirit in which to meet the grave issues of the hour? Would you deprive the people of property, of intelligence, the law-abiding and Christian elements in society of the hope of building up the waste-places, of securing a vigorous and wise administration of the laws, of establishing upon a firm basis a system of free schools for the benefit of all classes and races? Would you take away the power of amendment? That is the chief merit of our institutions. They rest upon the conviction, not that the people are perfect, but that, seeing their mistakes, their errors, their faults, they may on the true theory of self-government apply wholesome corrections.

The people of Louisiana have elected with Governor Nicholls men who represent all the respectable elements and the conservative forces in society—men of property, of intelligence, of character—who embody the policy of reconciliation and enjoy the confidence of all classes, white and colored alike. Their government is universally recognized and respected throughout the State, except in one single public building in the city of New Orleans, in which the recent United States marshal, surrounded by a few ignorant negroes and United States troops, awaits the intervention of the Federal power to install him as governor. Sir, I can imagine no calamity that could equal the recognition of this Packard government. It has no element of stability. It would not live one minute but for the hope of Federal support. Its only prop is the bayonet, its only adherents tax-gatherers and spoilsmen. We have endured much in Louisiana, because we hoped that the day of our deliverance would surely come, but the attempt to force this government upon the people would fill them with utter dismay. An outbreak of an epidemic of yellow fever, small-pox, and cholera, all combined, would be an insignificant calamity in comparison with the doom of submission to the régime that threatens our peace, our property, our most cherished hopes for ourselves and for those to come after us.

Instead of an upright magistracy, confidence, contentment, happy homes, returning prosperity, gladdening every heart and tinging every prospect with light and hope, extreme, ignorant, and corrupt men, with nothing at stake, would control the Government; every interest would be blighted, every industry paralyzed, society become still more disorganized, and crime and poverty and ignorance prevail more and more.

> Regions of sorrow, doleful shades, where peace
> And rest can never dwell; hope never comes
> That comes to all.

Sir, it cannot be done. It will not be done as long as there remains any respect for free government or any sympathy for human suffering or for human progress in the minds of the American Congress.

Louisiana from the depths of her sorrow and despair may well exclaim:

> Spare us the inexpiable wrong, the unutterable shame,
> That turns the coward's heart to steel, the sluggard's blood to flame,
> Lest when our latest hope is fled, ye taste of our despair,
> And learn by proof in some wild hour, how much the wretched dare.

SPEECH OF HON. BENJ. T. EAMES,

OF RHODE ISLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decisions of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. EAMES. Mr. Speaker, the questions involved in the report of the committee of the House to determine its powers and privileges, and in that of the Senate and House upon counting and declaring the votes in the recent election for President and Vice-President of the United States are of vital importance. The correct decision of these questions may determine, if not the existence, the continuance and stability of the Government under which we live, which is a government of law and not of men.

Any departure from this fundamental principle of a free government as a government of law and not of men, upon which we all depend for protection of reputation, liberty, life, and property, involves the very life of the Government. Liberty and law, and liberty regulated by law, are essential requisites of a free government. If we would preserve such a government it is an indispensable condition to stand by and preserve intact the law of the land until changed in the mode prescribed by law. And it is fortunate that the consideration of the vital questions involved in these reports occurs at a time when there is no occasion to determine them otherwise than upon principle and in accordance with the fundamental principle of law upon which a free government rests and upon the adherence to which its continuance depends.

The great political parties of the country in this Congress are so divided, and in the next Congress will be so evenly divided that it will be impossible, whether Mr. Hayes or Mr. Tilden shall be President, at least for a period of two years, to change the existing law so as to disturb the business interests of the country. With a republican Senate and a democratic House, whether the President is republican or democratic, no change in the law can be made unless agreed to by both political parties, and hence no fears need be entertained by any one engaged in any business pursuit that any change in the law will be made which will disturb the business of the country, as no change can be made unless assented to by both the great political parties.

It is true, however, that the uncertainty as to the result of the recent presidential election has created in the public mind an uneasiness which interferes with the business of the country, through a vague apprehension that it may result in disturbing the peace which now exists, and the continuance of which is essential to the prosperity of the industrial and commercial interests of the country. This vague and, as I think, unfounded apprehension of another civil war is the only thing in the way of a dispassionate and calm consideration and determination of the great questions involved in these reports, in accordance with the law of the land.

But whether this apprehension is well founded or not, the question is here and before us, and as members of this House, upon our consciences and our oaths, we must express an opinion upon it; and it is a question of vital importance not only as determining the result of the recent election, but as establishing a precedent in all presidential elections which may hereafter occur. In this view it is the solemn duty of every member of this House, so far as he may, to divest himself of political or partisan bias, and to decide the question upon a careful and thorough consideration of the provisions of the Constitution and the law of the land; constantly keeping in mind that the Government under which we live is a government of law and not of men, and that if the law is in any respect wrong there is a mode prescribed by which it may be changed peaceably and without resort to arms.

Where, then, under the Constitution and the laws of the United States is the power vested to determine the election of the President and Vice-President? Is it in the President of the Senate, in the House of Representatives, in the Senate, or in Congress? Let us, so far as we can, examine these questions upon principle and aside from appeals to party, and without regard to the apprehension that our material interests seem to require and demand a settlement in the present, without regard to either principle or the future, but simply and solely upon the principles of law upon which all our rights under a free government depend and without which a free government fails and falls. This is the question to which our attention is invited and which we are called upon to decide, and upon its correct solution, as I have said, may depend the permanence and stability of our feee institutions.

The provisions of the Constitution upon the election of a President and Vice-President are expressed in language so simple and plain that there ought not to be any dispute about their intent and meaning.

Article 2, section 1, declares that—

> Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

It also prescribes that "Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes; which day shall be the same throughout the United States," and declares also the qualifications which are necessary for a President and a Vice-President.

Congress has by law prescribed the time when the electors shall be chosen, and the time when they shall give their votes, and the Constitution prescribes the manner in which they shall give their votes and how they shall be certified, and the officer to whom they shall be delivered; and provides that the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and that the votes shall then be counted, and declares that the persons having the greatest number of votes for President and Vice-President shall be the President and Vice-President if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed.

Now under these provisions of the Constitution each State has the right to appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, the electors to which it is entitled, subject only to the limitation as to eligibility and the time of election and when the electors shall vote. And under these provisions of the Constitution and the laws of the United States and the laws of the State the only question which can arise, wherever the power rests to determine it, is whether the electors have been chosen in the mode prescribed by the State law and were eligible to the office of elector under the Constitution, were elected on the day prescribed by law, and on the day fixed by law cast their votes for persons eligible to the offices of President and Vice-President of the United States.

It is the right of the State under the Constitution to appoint the electors in such manner as the Legislature may direct. If these electors, having the requisite qualifications, have been appointed in accordance with the laws of the State where appointed, the vote must be counted, for neither the House nor the Senate nor Congress can either deny or abridge the constitutional right conferred in this respect upon the States.

The only question then is whether the law of the State has been complied with and whether this law is in accord with the limitations prescribed as to time and place and qualifications by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

This leads to the question by whom, under the law, is the vote certified by the State to be counted?

The power of the President of the Senate to count the vote is found in the provision of the Constitution which directs the votes to be delivered to him, and directs him in the presence of the Senate and House to open all the certificates, and declares that the votes shall then be counted.

What power does this provision of the Constitution confer upon the Vice-President of the United States or President pro tempore of the Senate? It certainly, by its terms, confers no powers in this respect either upon the House or the Senate or Congress. Neither the House nor the Senate nor Congress is named in this connection, except as witnesses to an act which is to be done by some other person who is named.

The act to be done, which is not only to open the certificates but also to ascertain who has been elected President and Vice-President, is by the express language of the Constitution to be done in the presence of the Senate and the House, and of necessity to be done by some one besides the Senate and the House, and, by necessary implication, as no other person is named, by the person to whom the vote was directed, who had the custody of the votes, and who by express language was directed to open the certificates in which the votes were inclosed. Otherwise the whole ceremony is idle. The President of the Senate has the legal custody of the votes. He is directed to open them on a certain day in the presence of the Senate and the House. The two Houses meet. The President of the Senate opens the certificates in their presence. What is to be done with them? Who is to count them? Surely not the House, nor the Senate, nor both Houses, for what is to be done is to be in their presence, and by necessary implication not to be done by them. It surely was intended that the votes should then and in that presence be counted to ascertain who if any one had been elected as President and Vice-President.

And although the Constitution does not in so many words say that the votes shall be counted by the Vice-President, inasmuch as the votes were to be counted then and there, the inference is almost absolutely certain that the act was to be done by the person who was specifically named as the custodian of the votes and who was directed by name to have them on a certain day at a fixed place, and then and there to open the certificates. And such has been the construction placed upon this clause of the Constitution from the organization of the Government.

But if the power to count these votes and to declare the result is not in the Vice-President, or the President pro tempore of the Senate, in whom is this power vested by the Constitution? Is it in the two Houses, in the presence of which the Constitution directs the President of the Senate to open the certificates? No one makes this claim, because each House has its separate organization, and when they meet, they meet as the Senate and the House and not as a joint convention to determine any question which may arise. And under the uniform practice, when any question has arisen on such an occasion, the two Houses have separated and acted separately upon it. Is it in the House? If so, upon what provision of the Constitution or the law? Where in either case can any authority be found for the exercise of any control by the House in such case? Indeed no pretense of this kind has been made. The only claim is that the House may by its action prevent the count of a vote of a State. If this is the true construction of the Constitution, then it follows that the House may at any time defeat the election of a President and Vice-President, although it may be demonstrated that the election has been made in every respect in accordance with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the laws of the States. Is it vested in the Senate? If so, the same thing follows. It cannot therefore be claimed that this power exists in the House or the Senate separately, and, if not, is it vested in Congress? And it is just here that the doubt arises.

The Constitution prescribes that after the certificates of the votes have been opened by the Vice-President the votes shall then be counted. It does not in terms say that they shall be counted by the Vice-President, and it surely does not in language say that the votes shall be counted by Congress. The necessary implication, as I have said, is that, inasmuch as the votes are then to be counted in the presence of the Senate and House, it excludes the idea of the count by the Senate and the House, because the body in the presence of which the act is to be done, by the very language of the Constitution, is not the body to do the act required. And yet I freely admit that the language of the Constitution in this respect is open to doubt. It does not say that the count is to be made by the Vice-President, nor does it say that the vote is to be counted by Congress.

It is upon these few words that the claim is made that the power is vested in Congress, and that it has power to count the vote under the general provision of the Constitution "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." But in putting a construction upon this general provision of the Constitution, it should be borne in mind that it does not apply to the special question under consideration any more than to any other subject to which it may apply. And besides this it should also be remembered that as to the choice of President and Vice-President the Constitution does make special provisions, and among these precludes either a Senator or Representative from acting as an elector for these offices, and especially provides that such electors shall be chosen in such manner as the Legislatures of the States may direct; and also specifically prescribes that, if there is a failure to elect a President or Vice-President, the House shall elect the President and the Senate the Vice-President, and that, in vesting these specific powers in the Senate and in the House, it precludes the exercise upon this subject of any other powers, and therefore excludes any power supposed to be derived from the general clause of the Constitution, on which solely rests any reasonable claim in this regard by Congress. Moreover no fair mind can read the law of the land, as expressed in the Constitution, without coming to the conviction that it never was intended by the framers of that instrument that Congress should, under any circumstances, have the power, either directly or indirectly, to interfere with the constitutional right of the States in the mode prescribed by the Legislatures thereof to choose the President and Vice-President of the United States.

It surely was never intended that the Legislature should elect the Executive, any more than that the Legislature should elect the judges of the Supreme Court.

The true intent of the Constitution was to keep so far as possible each of the great departments, the legislative, judicial, and executive, separate from each other, the one to adopt, the other to interpret, and the other to execute the laws.

In this view certainly it is more than doubtful if Congress has any power over the question now pending before the House. If it has any power, that power is subordinate to the express authority given to the States to choose electors for President and Vice-President in such manner as they may prescribe. This is the constitutional right conferred upon the States. It cannot be denied or abridged by any act of Congress, and if the States under their respective laws in the exercise of this right have acted within the limits of the Constitution and the votes of their electoral colleges have been duly authenticated and sent to the President of the Senate, as required by law, they must be counted, whoever has the power to count. And whenever so certified, they must stand, prima facie at least, as the vote of the State, and every such vote should be counted, if Congress has the power, unless it is rejected by the concurrent vote of both Houses.

The only power that Congress has, if any, is to determine whether the vote of any State has been cast for persons eligible under the Constitution in the mode prescribed by the Legislature thereof, because the Constitution confers upon the States the right within certain limitations to choose electors of President and Vice-President in such manner as the Legislatures may prescribe, and no act of Congress can deprive the States of this constitutional right. And any attempt to do it is an usurpation of power, and in its very essence revolutionary. If, therefore, any law is to be adopted by Congress for the purpose of ascertaining who in the recent election has received a majority of the votes of the electoral college of the State, it ought to carefully recognize and guard these unquestioned rights of the States under the Constitution. And whatever power is granted by any such act should be limited to Congress. If the power to count the vote is not by the fair construction of the Constitution vested in the Vice-President, and if it is so vested, Congress has no power to divest it, it is vested in Congress, and if vested in Congress it is a personal trust, which can be delegated to no person or body except Congress. It might as well be claimed that the power to make laws under the Constitution could be delegated as to claim that this power if in Congress can be delegated.

Applying these views to the reports of the committee of the house as also to the report of the committees of the two Houses, it will be seen that, in my judgment, the power to open and count the electoral vote is vested in the President of the Senate. If, however, there is doubt upon this proposition, the power is in Congress, to be defined by law; and if in Congress it must be exercised so as not to infringe on the constitutional rights of the States, and that in the exercise of this power the only question which can be inquired into in any case where the vote has been duly authenticated is whether the vote is by persons eligible and upon the face of the returns duly elected to the office and whether such election was at the time and the vote of the electors was cast at the time required by law, and that any authority which Congress has over these questions, if it has any, cannot be delegated.

I dissent, therefore, to the report of the House committee, which claims that it is in the power of the House by objecting to a vote to defeat the provisions of the Constitution which confers on the States the right to choose electors of President and Vice-President in such manner as the Legislature may prescribe. And if Congress has any power over this subject, I claim that Congress should exercise that power, and not attempt to avoid its duty by delegating that power to others upon whom no power in this regard or for this purpose has been conferred by the Constitution.

Aside from this legal view of the question before the House upon these reports, it seems to me as a question of expediency the bill of the committees of the two Houses ought not to be approved. If there are questions upon which doubts exist, these questions relate to a political office; and the judges of the Supreme Court before whom these questions may come for adjudication ought to be kept free from any bias in their decision.

But aside from this view, it appears to me that questions of this kind may as well be determined by the President of the Senate as by a fifth judge, who is to be selected by the four judges of the Supreme Court, who have, as acknowledged by the report, been named because two of them are democrats and two republicans. In either case, practically, we have a commission of five republicans from the Senate, five democrats from the House, four judges, two of whom are republican and two democrats, and the fifth will decide who is to be President and Vice-President of the United States. It is submitting the whole question practically to one man, and the question is whether it would not be wiser to submit it to the man who is named in the Constitution to receive and open the certificates, rather than to any other person, however eminent, who is not recognized by the Constitution as having any power over the subject.

Convinced, as I am, that under the Constitution the Vice-President has the power to open and count the votes, it seems to me that the best course to pursue is to allow him to exercise this power as such officer always has, rather than to submit the question to any one not known to the Constitution for any such purpose. And if the Vice-President in the exercise of this power shall commit any error, to leave the final determination of the question, not to five persons who are judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, but to the Supreme Court, before which the questions in dispute may be judicially determined.

I think, therefore, that the bill reported should be amended so as to provide that the President of the Senate shall open and count the votes and declare the result, and that his decision upon all constitutional questions should, if desired, be left, under the last section of the bill, to be determined by any court which has jurisdiction to hear and determine such a case.

In adopting such a course we will have complied with the provisions of the Constitution as it has been understood and acted upon in the early years of the Republic; will have protected the rights of the States under the Constitution; will have secured a remedy for any wrong which may have been done; and shall have recognized and acted upon the great principle upon which we depend for the protection of life, liberty, and property, that we live under a Government of law and not of men.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. E. S. SAMPSON,

OF IOWA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, 1877.

Mr. SAMPSON. Mr. Speaker, the more I have thought on this question of the electoral count and the more carefully I have reflected on events which have crowded themselves upon our attention the last few months, the deeper has become the conviction in my mind that agreement by the two Houses on this question is an absolute necessity.

Eighty-eight years, save a few days, we have been moving on under our Constitution. We have had twenty-two presidential elections prior to the present. Seventeen times have questions been raised in the two Houses or at the joint meetings touching the validity of electoral votes; seven times have the questions been evaded; three times decided by or under joint resolutions, signed by the President, which had the force of law; seven under the rule which provided no question should be decided in the affirmative nor vote be counted unless both Houses concurred therein.

And through all these objections and questions and through all this time, three great facts stand out prominently before us. First, the time has never been till now when a disputed electoral vote would change the result; second, the two Houses have never failed to agree on how they would dispose of disputed votes except in cases where they have skillfully evaded decision; third, repeated warnings have been uttered all along down our history to beware of the day when the vast powers, patronage, and political policies of this Government would depend on disputed electoral votes, and we should be without a law, constitutional provision, or tribunal to say who should decide. If it has been of such importance to agree before, and we have never failed to do so, how much more important is it now.

Let us look calmly at the situation, view things as they are. Party feeling and pride is a sensitive element. But yesterday, on the other side of this Hall, a member and a friend of this measure, too, used the word war in such a connection and manner that I could almost feel my strong friendship for the bill slipping away in spite of me. The situation demands calmness and reflection. Since the first day of the meeting of this the Forty-fourth Congress the lurid flames of party strife have been burning brighter and brighter in this country—schemes and counter-schemes to the extent of human ingenuity to make and unmake Presidents, to drag down and build up parties have been the general order of the day; the principle of the equality of all men before the law, both white and black, and the sentiment that in the Anglo-Saxon race of the South rests the superior right to rule those States, have been writhing in mortal strife for the mastery; and after this long, fierce, and exciting conflict, and party passion has been wrought up to well-nigh a white heat, crisping and consuming trade and industry, and even patriotism, what do we find? Almost a drawn battle; the massses of the people divided nearly equally in political sentiment; eighteen States republican; eighteen States democratic, dual governments in two; South Carolina has her republican governor and her democratic governor, her republican legislature and her democratic legislature. Louisiana has her republican governor and her democratic governor, her republican legislature and her democratic legislature; parties there literally standing to arms with a handful of United States soldiers at each of the two capitals, watching to see who dare fire the first shot; the sands of the present Administration almost run; in the hands of the officer the custodian of the electoral votes for the candidates for the incoming Executive 391 votes, instead of 369 as there ought only to be—22 more than under the Constitution can be cast; double returns from four States; the two Houses of Congress divided politically, one prepared to stand by the republican returns as expressing the true voice of the people, the other by the democratic returns as being based on the actual vote—these votes to be counted in a few days; the 22 spurious electoral votes that now corrupt the national ballot-box to be rejected; the Constitution failing to provide expressly who shall say which is the true vote and which the false; no law fixing this power or regulating it; an irreconcilable difference; in the absence of law who shall exercise this most delicate and important duty? Shall we hesitate to enact a law that shall solve the difficult, surely not, if we have the constitutional power?

Congress has the power to provide all necessary legislation to carry into execution all other powers given the Federal Government by the Constitution. Three times has Congress exercised this power by joint action, twice approved by the Executive, which had the effect to exclude or receive electoral votes; twice by joint resolution, once by joint rule. The majority of our greatest and best men of the past and present have held to the right to legislate upon the subject. And this seems now with all the exciting surroundings to be the only square inch of common ground upon which the two parties can unite.

I have examined so far as I could, reflected upon, compared, read, and thought over the reasons for and against its constitutionality with a due regard, as I believe, to the weight and solemnity of the oath I have taken to support the Constitution of my country, and believe it to be a measure to protect and preserve the Constitution, not to violate it. It constitutes a tribunal absolutely fair, even to the avoidance of a shadow of a shade of partisan bias so far as man can devise, and it does seem to me that the party or the individual who would refuse, in the present state of doubts, of fact, and differences of law, to submit to the arbitrament of so fairly constituted a tribunal must lack confidence in the righteousness of his cause.

I find, sir, from my brief experience here, that it is always hard to yield, even in the slightest degree, what any of my own party may regard as an advantage, believing as I do that it is the only party which stands firmly by the immortal doctrine that the rights of all our citizens as granted by the Constitution shall be maintained; and I am not unmindful that, in a crisis like the present, reflections like these might come to members: "Through this measure defeat must come to one party or the other, but woe unto him by whom the defeat of his party cometh; better a millstone be tied about his neck and he be cast into the sea. If I vote 'no' and my party is defeated by the bill, it will not be my fault; if it is sustained, I have done it no harm; it can never be known, but it would have been so in any event, and I I am politically intrenched." But he who, if his judgment is convinced that this is a measure in the interest of truth, righteousness, and peace, would let personal or mere party considerations turn the weight of a hair in the scales, is not worthy to occupy a place on the floor of the American Congress.

I believe no one has a higher respect for the judgment of the noble and patriotic men who compose the republican party of Iowa than I, and I have regretted to find they were not more earnestly for this measure; but the last word I received, a telegram on yesterday, has the true ring. It was:

Hold the fort! Country before party. The people will sustain a peaceful solution.

This was signed by men whose republicanism is as strong and pure as exists in that republican State which gave to Mr. Hayes, whom we hope to see by fair and righteous means President of these United States, near 60,000 majority.

I am heartily for this measure, and doubt not it will pass and demonstrate to the world that this great American people are yet capable of self-government.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. W. F. SLEMONS,

OF ARKANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. SLEMONS. Mr. Speaker, could I avoid the responsibility which attaches to me as one of the Representatives of the people, I would be slow (even with my solemn convictions against the pending bill) to dissent from the well-matured judgment of the distinguished gentlemen in this and the other end of the Capitol for whose high legal attainments I have so much respect and in whose patriotism I have most unfaltering confidence.

I am not unmindful, sir, that the gentlemen who have reported the bill now for consideration were inspired by a patriotism as exalted, and filled with a courage as sublime as can be boasted on this continent; and that they believe that ruin and rescue are alike concealed in the near future. To avert the one and reach the other we are called upon for action to-day and now. But, sir, they fail to discover to my short-sightedness precisely where the obstacle, if any, is situated from which I am asked to turn aside.

I have not gathered sufficient inspiration from the declared perils of the hour to consent to weigh anchor, abandon the port in which we have sheltered for three-quarters of a century, and drift away on a sunless sea before a gale unequaled in fierceness in the lives of any of us.

It is true, sir, that the echo of artillery on the Eastern Branch of the Potomac sounds a little warlike, the concentration of munitions of war and the hundreds of spies that swarm in the city and about this Hall look just a little suspicious. But, sir, when we remember how unwise in their glory and base in their fall these conspirators have been, we should not be surprised at the feint they make to cover their return to obscurity, or perchance to Canada, where their treasures have preceded them.

I have seen it announced in the Government organ that the representatives of the people would be arrested and tried for treason if they should chance to demur to the ruling of the Senate's presiding officer. I have heard it predicted that a hundred thousand men would be here to count the vote per contra. I hear it said that a very distinguished and personal friend of one of the rivals for the Presidency said that no blood should be spilt by his troops; so I take it, sir, the war ended before it began. I have heard it said that the President said "Damn the courts." But who supposes he meant to be disrespectful to the judicial department of the Government? I am glad that some of these utterances are not authoritative.

Sir, let me ask in all seriousness whence comes this panic and whence the danger from which we flee? Sir, who is it that tells us that a rock is discovered in the safe harbor of so many years, around whose concealed but rigid top the mad waters dash and roar? Does this ominous cry come from the outlook in the foremast or does it come from bondholders or boards of trade concealed in the hull? Whence comes the cry to lower the life-boats; that we have "struck?" And can they tell me whether there are sharks in that sea into which we are requested to lower this frail craft now being prepared?

Does the cry of terror which breaks upon the calm repose of the American Congress come from the millions of freemen harnessed to the soil, the bench, and forge, who on November 7 peacefully and legally determined the presidential election so far as an honest government could require, or does it come from those of the cottage home who toil not?

Sir, by what means has it been discovered that the strong arm of the people by their Representatives cannot protect the ballot cast on November 7 as they have for the past long years? Sir, who has asserted that the House of Representatives, together with the Senate, cannot exercise the power so long and so safely exercised without the interposition of an umpire? Both Houses have repeatedly and unequivocally asserted the power and authority to count the vote concurrently. The Senate has declared that the presiding officer of that body has not the right to count the vote; then the power given by the Constitution must be where this House has located it. Has not the unbroken precedents of fifty years located it in Congress assembled in joint convention? Then, sir, why seek a new tribunal that shall dispose of the highest and dearest interests of the whole people?

Sir, to-day the American people are face to face and are confronted with the cruel wrongs to which Southern States have been so long subjected. To-day the American people are in hearing of the piteous appeal of peace, long exiled peace, in behalf of her prostrate subjects. To-day they can, if they choose, witness the spectacle of prostrate States pinned to the dust by the bayonet, while that miserable spawn of reconstruction, the illicit offspring of legislative and judicial cohabitation, the loathsome, cancerous wart, (the returning boards,) feed upon a prostrate people like the vulture upon the chained Prometheus.

I am unwilling, sir, that the American people shall turn away, withdraw their sympathy from the people of that blighted, blackened, and ruined land, and leave them to the mercies of a new returning board unheard of in this or any other country. Sir, the pending bill does not provide the time when this joint high commission shall render its decision.

Sir, no man, I take it, at this time seriously doubts the power of the two Houses to count the vote in whatever shape it may come. Then, sir, why drag the judges of the court of last resort from their seats to mingle in this political wrangle? Why do you cut off the last hope of redress either one of the presidential aspirants have? When they have failed in this, what court will consider their grievances by quo warranto or otherwise? Not the court that sits in judgment with the high commission. Certainly not, for they are disqualified. Then who shall create the court before whom this question may be finally settled? Congress, I suppose.

Sir, Congress (under the Constitution operating ex propria vigore) has the power to count the vote, and has, in my judgment, no right to dart with it. And if it can delegate it, now is not the time to let go. Sir, Congress can perform whatever it has authority to perform under the Constitution. "Both Houses," in the language of Senator CONKLING, "may do whatever is committed to them," but they cannot delegate to anybody else legislative powers, "or any other power which is reposed in Congress and nowhere else." And this, I take it, sir, is the matured judgment of all good lawyers who have examined the question or heard it discussed.

Mr. BOUTWELL, in March, 1876, said in the Senate:

The power and duty to count the vote was in the Congress and that Congress must execute it, and that it cannot under the Constitution be transferred.

Says Mr. MERRIMON, in 1874:

Congress has the power to count the vote, and no other power can do it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said in the Senate, February, 1875:

I believe the tribunal to count the votes is the Representatives of the people in Congress assembled.

Mr. BOUTWELL in March, 1876, when the question of counting a disputed vote was being considered, said:

There can be under the Constitution no other tribunal to decide that or any other question arising in the course of the proceeding. The duty is imposed upon the two Houses of Congress, and they alone can perform it and have not the power to transfer it to any one else.

Senator MORTON in the Senate, March 16, 1876, said:

Then the question arises which is the more reasonable, which is the better, which is the safer of the two; to adopt the construction which gives this great power to one man, the President of the Senate, who may be counting for himself, or would it be safer to leave it to the determination of the two House of Congress, representing the States and people? If we can agree to adopt either one of these constructions, I say the latter is the safer; it is the more reasonable, it is in conformity with the spirit of our Government and of popular institutions. I then adopt the latter construction.

Who, sir, I ask, denies the authority of the Congress to count the vote? And why are we asked to abandon that time consecrated mode of settling the question, and travel away from the landmarks of fifty years, if not away from the Constitution? Sir, all the woes which have overtaken my people, all the refined cruelty that has been visited on the ruined South, is the result of great straining if not absolute fracturing of the Constitution; and any departure from precedent and law fills them with alarm.

It is a matter of little consequence to my people what man happens to be the President of these States. They expect and desire nothing but peace at home. While the limping cripple, the widow, and orphan struggle on to rebuild their lost fortunes, they only desire to see elevated to power that party who will cling to the Constitution as it is as firmly as the rock which crowns the thunder-scarred brow of the everlasting mountains. I shall therefore cast my vote against the pending bill with the firm conviction that I am at least not far in error.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. BURWELL B. LEWIS,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, in the short space of ten minutes I can only state without amplifying some of my reasons for supporting the bill to provide a mode for counting the electoral vote reported by the joint committee. Those members upon this floor who come from the South occupy a peculiar attitude in relation to this measure. They are the only southern Congressmen elected since the war who may be considered as true representative men of the people of that section; and hence their views and actions are not only closely scrutinized and criticised, but, as we are painfully conscious, are liable to misconstruction and misrepresentation. While they should never surrender their convictions or their manhood, they should remember that a mind that wisely and voluntarily submits to the inexorable logic of events loses none of its independence.

This bill embodies the result of the conference of the ablest constitutional lawyers now in public life, and it has passed the Senate. It is a measure on the side of peace and order and is demanded by the best interests of the whole country. It is entirely constitutional; it is fair and just. The country is not prepared for the shock of its rejection; the South cannot afford to oppose it. The Constitution wisely leaves it to the States respectively to appoint in the manner designated by their Legislatures the requisite number of presidential electors. In our early history these appointments were directed to be made either by the governors or the general assemblies of the States; but in latter years, in deference to popular rights, these electors have been chosen directly by the people. It is a great historical public fact that such an election was held by the people of all the States on the 7th day of last November. Each State has appointed its electors, and these electors have voted for one or the other of the national candidates. It becomes this House, it is our imperative duty, to use strenuous efforts to uphold the legal votes of all the States instead of to endeavor to make an opportunity to elect a President ourselves through a disagreement of the two Houses.

The people know that the President of the Senate has no power to count the electoral vote, and yet they believe that the contingency contemplated by the Constitution for the House to elect a President and the Senate a Vice-President has not arisen. One party of the people know that their candidates have a large popular majority, and they sincerely believe that they have a decided majority of legal and honest votes in the electoral college; the other party believes that according to the forms of law and a strict construction of the Constitution their candidates have a majority. This controversy has assumed immense proportions, enlisting the feelings and passions of a great people and involving the most momentous issues.

Let neither party be swift to assume extreme positions. Let us be careful not to adopt the ingenious vagaries of heated, immoderate, and interested men for constitutional doctrine. Is it best for the House to take one position and the Senate another entirely antagonistic; or is it not wisest to provide by their concurrence a mode of procedure fair, constitutional, and peaceful? The first course is in the interest of revolution, disorder, and anarchy; the latter is in the interest of peace, law, and liberty. From the very beginning of this controversy I have had no hope for a satisfactory solution of the grave difficulties involved except in an agreement by a joint committee upon a lawful plan of counting, in execution of the general power to count lodged by the Constitution in the legislative department of the Government.

We are often asked, what will be the result if this bill becomes a law? To this I answer, no man can foretell. I hope and believe it will eventuate in the inauguration of Tilden and Hendricks; but in this I may be disappointed. We are told if Mr. Hayes is to be inaugurated the more violent the procedure by which it is done the better for the democratic party. For my part I feel assured that this is a serious error. If he is to be inaugurated at all, far better will it be for him to come in under the reign of law and the auspices of the best men of his own party. This will insure the supremacy of reason, order, and moderation. But if he should become Chief Magistrate of the country by force and violence, and at the hands of the extreme men of his party, then his administration must necessarily drift into arbitrary and despotic measures, and the South will be the principal victim.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. M. C. HUNTER,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, a solution of the question as to how the present electoral vote shall be counted, so as to satisfy the people and restore confidence in the business interests of the country, is one of the most difficult problems that the American Congress has ever been called upon to solve. As I am limited to ten minutes in the consideration of this important question, it will be impossible for me to undertake a discussion of the real merits of the question within that time; I can do no more than to indicate the vote I shall give upon the question and my reasons for so doing.

I believe that Mr. Hayes has been fairly and honestly elected President of the United States and Mr. Wheeler Vice-President thereof, and that each is as much entitled to his seat as such as any member of the Forty-fourth Congress is entitled to the seat he now occupies on this floor. I am equally satisfied that most, if not all, the members on the democratic side of this House as firmly believe that Mr. Tilden and Mr. Hendricks have been fairly and honestly elected to the positions of President and Vice-President and should be inaugurated as such, as I believe the reverse of it.

The friends of Mr. Hayes and Mr. Wheeler having a majority in the Senate, and those of Mr. Tilden and Mr. Hendricks a majority in the House, and the Senate and House having an equal say as to how the votes shall be counted, and neither willing to yield its honest convictions, in such a case how are the votes to be counted so that one set of the candidates can be declared duly elected? Says one, count them under the provisions of the Constitution as they have always been counted. There is just where the trouble arises. The language of the Constitution is indefinite. One party insists that it means one thing, while the other insists that it means another. The two Houses being equal so far as making the count is concerned, and each contending for a different construction of the Constitution, how is it possible to decide the question as to how the vote shall be counted unless one House yields to the other, which it is certain not to do? The provision of the Constitution in reference to the counting of the electoral vote is as follows:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

What votes shall be counted? It must mean the legal votes from each State. The electoral vote from each State is now deposited with the President of the Senate, but from each of the States of South Carolina, Florida, Louisiana, and Oregon there are two sets of electoral votes, one for Hayes and Wheeler and the other for Tilden and Hendricks. Which are the legal votes from each of these four States? The republicans insist that the Hayes and Wheeler votes are, while the democrats say that the Tilden and Hendricks votes are. Which party is right? That is the question to be decided. Now who is to decide it? A large number of the republican Senators and Members of the House insist that under the provision of the Constitution above quoted, that as the President of the Senate is the custodian of the electoral votes and must open the certificates containing them in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives for the purpose of having them counted, and there being now no law on the subject of counting them except the above provision of the Constitution, therefore the President of the Senate must count the votes, while the democrats and many of the republicans insist that the votes being opened in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, it is the duty of the Senate and House to decide what votes should be counted and what not.

Now, the Senate and House being equally divided upon this question of the legality of the electoral votes from the four States above named, it is impossible for the Senate and House, therefore, to decide the question. And as a majority of each House insists that the President of the Senate has not the power to decide what votes shall be counted and what not, then what is to be done? The votes must be counted, and no one has the power to count them, unless the Senate and House of Representatives shall provide by law a mode for counting the same. Many of the republicans say no legislation is either necessary or proper on the subject, as the President of the Senate under the Constitution has the power to count the votes, and that he should go forward and do so, and if the votes thus counted by him show that Hayes and Wheeler are elected he should so declare them elected, and that in pursuance of such election they should be inaugurated as President and Vice-President in spite of what the House might say or do in the premises. On the other hand the democrats contend that, if the Senate and House fail to agree as to the count of the vote, then there would be no election by the electoral vote, and that the House should go forward under the Constitution and elect a President in accordance with the provisions thereof. The Constitution on that subject provides as follows:

The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President.

From the above brief statement any one can see the real difficulty with which Congress has to contend in the counting of the electoral votes. And every one can see the condition in which our country would be placed if the vote is not properly counted and some one legally declared elected, in whose election the people will have confidence and respect his Administration. It is the duty of every true man in a great struggle like this to rise above mere party prejudices and do under the circumstances what is right and for the best interests of the country.

Some insist that it has been the uniform practice since the foundation of the Government for the President of the Senate to count the electoral votes, and that he should therefore count them now; but such is not the fact. The history of each count from 1789 down to 1865 shows that, whenever a question arose as to what were legal and what illegal votes, in each case a controversy sprung up as to who had the power to decide upon the validity of votes, whether it was the President of the Senate or the two Houses of Congress; and for the purpose of settling that vexed question the old fathers from the year 1800 down to 1824 discussed the question at great length and at various times for the purpose of remedying the difficulties that were likely to arise in counting the electoral vote, introduced bills on the subject, which in every case provide for a mode of counting the electoral votes other than by the President of the Senate, but each election having from time to time passed off quietly, as no question arose in reference to disputed votes that changed the result of the election, count the disputed votes as you would, and hence all legislation on the subject was dropped until 1865, at which time both Houses of Congress were republican. In that year the republican party passed what was known as the twenty-second joint rule, which took away from the President of the Senate the power to count the electoral votes and conferred that power upon the two Houses of Congress, and the rule not only provided for the counting of the votes by the two Houses, but it also provided for throwing out the vote of a State where both Houses did not concur in counting it. Under this joint rule the electoral votes were counted in 1865, in 1869, and in 1873. In 1876 this joint rule was repealed by the action of the Senate. The rule in my judgment was wrong and never should have been adopted, but as the republican party adopted it and counted the electoral votes for President and Vice-President at three different times under it, and thereby refused to permit the President of the Senate to make the count, I feel that it is too late now for the republicans, as a party, to contend that the President of the Senate, and not the two Houses of Congress, should count the vote.

I am a republican from principle, because I believe the republican party to be the purest and best party, and has done more for the people and the country than any other party that has ever existed. I further believe that that party fairly and honestly elected Messrs. Hayes and Wheeler President and Vice-President of the United States at the late election, and so believing I am willing to submit the count of the electoral vote to a fair and honest tribunal, as provided for in this bill, as I see no other way to make a count, for the reasons above stated, that will give satisfaction to the country. I believe, in thus submitting to a count of the votes, that Hayes and Wheeler will be declared duly and legally elected, and will go into office with the approval of the people, without respect to party, and the country be saved from the destroying effects of a political contest which could only injure and in no way benefit the great and growing interests of the country, a contest that would so divide our people as to destroy all confidence in the future perpetuity of the Republic.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. L. B. CASWELL,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. CASWELL. Mr. Speaker, so much has been said upon this question so important to the country, I can hope to bring nothing new to the consideration of the House which will very much aid us in our conclusions. I feel it my duty, however, to state in my own way some of the objections I have to the passage of the pending bill, and enter my protest against such innovation upon an unbroken line of precedents, if not upon the Constitution itself.

I ask the members of this House, the representatives of a great people, to pause and consider well before we strike a blow to the very foundation of our electoral system which cannot be repaired for many years to come. This bill wrenches from the States that delegated power which is so important to them, the selection of a President of the United States. It not only destroys that most important provision of the Constitution but it disregards the precedents established and so well settled by its framers, and by those whose duty it was first to execute its provisions. While it may be true that never before was occasion so great for raising these issues or did the election of a President depend so much upon their construction, yet it is also true that the interpretation of men free from the bias that now gives rise to these questions is a much safer one for the future of the Republic than that given as the result of a heated partisan discussion in which every one feels an intense interest. We may now search in vain for a single arbiter who is not suspected at least of some bias upon these questions.

With much relief, then, and I trust with greater safety, do we return to the ways of our fathers when they looked coolly and with unflinching fidelity upon the rights of the people, as they themselves took care should be preserved to them in this great conpact between the States.

It is a well-settled rule that when a statute or other instrument contains doubtful or uncertain language, we may with great propriety inquire for the intention of the framers; and who can ask for a safer guide than the real intention of those who drew and adopted the Constitution? Shall we say they did not understand its meaning, that it was left for the Congress of the second century to interpret this instrument?

To pass this bill is to assume that every count of the presidential vote from Washington to the present time has been irregular and a usurpation of the duties devolving upon Congress. Are we to suppose there are not ample means by which the election of a President can be consummated without permission or interposition of Congress?

The Constitution delegates to the States the power to appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives. These electors are State officers. To them is committed the duty of electing a President of the United States. They have no other duty. They exist as an electoral college only one day. Their mission is ended at once. The certificate which they make of the vote cast is is as complete and binding as the decree or judgment of any court of last resort. If we go behind it, or attempt to, we invade a most sacred right which belongs to the State alone. Neither Congress nor any branch of Congress nor the presiding officer of either House can annul or reject it. The State alone may deal with it. These electors are appointed in such manner as the Legislature shall direct.

There can be but one return from a State; one which bears the imprint of State authority, that one which emanates from the State government. That certificate must be opened by the President of the Senate; all others are irregular and out of place. The only question that could be raised is one of State organization. Has the State a government or has it not? If so, it has an executive and a Legislature, and the electoral vote is the one cast as this Legislature has directed. This the President of the Senate may know as he knows the officers of a State. He knows from whose hands the returns are received. He knows by the certificate upon the back of the return. He open this, the official return, and the counting which follows, whether by tellers or otherwise, is but a mere compilation of figures.

All contests as to who are the electors, whether they have been chosen by fraud or otherwise, whether eligible under the restrictions fixed by the Constitution and are entitled to cast the vote of the State which selected them, should be raised and determined in the State prior to the meeting of the electoral college. The limited time fixed for their session, their contemporaneous action throughout the United States, and the short space of time which intervenes after the final count before the commencement of the presidential term confirm the theory that all questions relating to the electors are settled by State authority before the casting of the electoral vote. These colleges throughout the United States meet and complete their work on one and the same day, and they then cease to exist as a college.

The President of the Senate in the opening and counting the vote exercises only a ministerial duty. He is the agent of the electoral college, their chairman, their executive officer to count their vote. If he errs, if he opens and counts a return which is no return, which bears not the proper authentication, and which did not emanate from State authority, if he counts as votes those which are not votes, and thereby declares him elected who is not elected, the injured party or the people may have their remedy by quo warranto to try the title of the usurper.

There exists at this time ample authority to prevent all abuses, to defend our institutions from usurpations or encroachments; why then adopt a new remedy? What occasion has arisen that should require us to warp the Constitution and annul the precedents of so long standing?

Among the very last acts of the constitutional convention we find it resolved that the Senators in the Congress which would soon convene "should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President." Pursuant to this resolution the Senate did appoint John Langdon, who opened and counted, he certifies, the electoral vote and determined that George Washington was elected President. Here is an interpretation of the most positive character given as their understanding how and by whom the electoral vote was to be counted.

Story in his Commentary on the Constitution, volume 1, page 407, says:

> Contemporary construction is properly resorted to to illustrate and confirm the text, to explain a doubtful phrase, or to expound an obscure clause.

Chancellor Kent also says, volume 1, page 465, (note:)

> A contemporary exposition given of the Constitution of the United States, practiced and acquiesced in for a period of years, fixes the construction.

In 1797 we find John Adams as President of the Senate certifying that he had counted the votes which determined his own election.

Again in 1801, while Thomas Jefferson was President of the Senate, we find a similar certificate, both containing the fixed clause, as if it was essential, that they had counted the vote. The result of Thomas Jefferson's count gave him an equal number of votes with Aaron Burr for President, and this was so certified to the House of Representatives. Can it be supposed these men, who have been accredited with originating the whole theory of our Government, were so grossly ignorant as to perform an act, so great and important to the American people in those trying hours, which in no way belonged to them, and sign a certificate setting forth acts of the grossest usurpation, and especially when they on each of these occasions were the persons directly interested in the final result? Can we suppose these men would have performed a task so delicate unless it be to fulfill a plain, well-defined, constitutional duty which they could not avoid? Any other interpretation of their acts would be a sad reflection upon the good sense as well as the integrity of these great men.

I now, Mr. Speaker, desire to call attention to another principle so well settled in American jurisprudence that it needs no citation of authorities.

When a statute, or I may say a constitution, is adopted with a known interpretation or construction of its provisions, that interpretation or construction becomes also binding upon the people. Now in addition to the resolution adopted by the constitutional convention recommending the Senate to appoint a President to receive and count the votes, and in addition to the examples set by Adams and Jefferson in the cases above cited, we find that in 1800 a bill was introduced in Congress somewhat similar to the provisions of the bill now pending. Strong grounds were at once taken by members of both the Senate and House of Representatives, and by some of the men who framed the Constitution, that Congress had no control whatever over this question and that the passage of such a bill would be an innovation upon the rights of the States and a violation of the Constitution itself. After a long and protracted discussion upon this subject, involving the question of counting the votes as well as others, the bill was finally defeated; and the very next count which was had was made by the President of the Senate, and was the one made by Thomas Jefferson.

In the height of this discussion and the fate of this bill, and the great constitutional questions there raised, an amendment or substitute for that very section of the Constitution which provides for the electoral vote was adopted, but the clause relating to opening and counting the vote was left undisturbed and still remains as it then was. The country was satisfied with the way in which it had been interpreted and its provisions exercised, and with this interpretation, with the usage which prevailed at the time, this substitute was adopted and has become binding upon the American people.

The framers of the Constitution took special care to guard the Executive from legislative encroachment. Judge Story gives many reasons for keeping the election of President entirely free from Congress, one of which is the following:

> Compromises and bargains would be made and laws passed to gratify particular members or conciliate particular interests, and thus a disastrous influence would be shed over the whole policy of the Government. The President would in fact become a mere tool of the Congress.

If the learned commentator had had the present hour with the pending bill before his far-seeing mind he could not have used language more appropriate in its description.

The time has now come when the breakers have made their appearance. The effort is now being made to strike down this right, supposed to be reserved to the people beyond the reach of Congress.

It is well known that some step must be taken to turn aside the practice which has heretofore obtained and the interpretations given to the Constitution, and a diversion be made of the electoral vote from the usual channels, or we shall meet the frowns and disappoint an element unsatisfied with our laws and our institutions.

An emergency has arisen in which it is claimed we must barter away a most sacred right reserved to the people. This is the consideration for peace. So much of the foundation of our Government must be torn down and surrendered to "conciliate," as Judge Story says, "particular interests."

While I would sacrifice much, while I would yield almost any other consideration for the precious boon of peace and the prosperity which I trust may follow the final solution of these disturbing elements, I cannot consent to so palpable a violation and destruction of the people's rights as will be effected by the passage of this bill. If we may provide the means of rejecting the vote of one State, we may with equal propriety reject the whole. If we can defeat the will of the people of one State by depriving them of a choice in the election, why not deprive the people of their choice in every other State? If we can question, overturn, or reject the vote of a State, we may at once determine that no electoral vote shall hereafter be counted from any State. If it belongs to the States to determine in what manner the electors shall be appointed, what right have we to question that manner of choosing them? Whence came such power in Congress? Is it anywhere expressed in the Constitution? Is there one line or sentence in that instrument which gives Congress any control whatever over the election of a President except to provide the time for choosing the electors and their qualifications.

The Federal Government is a limited power. All authority not expressly delegated to it is reserved to the States or the people. Whence, then, comes the power to interfere in the casting or counting the electoral vote?

If the election of a President may depend upon the future action of Congress, it becomes a doubtful and uncertain event to be determined by a most doubtful and uncertain tribunal. If that body may determine by itself or by a commission created by it what are electoral votes, it may also determine that there are no votes and that none shall be counted. If it may so decide, what tribunal will administer the punishment? Who can save the people from this usurpation of power? Who will restore to the States this right so properly reserved to them?

An officer like the President of the Senate may be impeached or punished for his disobedience or refusal to consummate the will of the people and perform the duties of his high office, and he may even be commanded by the courts to discharge the duties imposed upon him; but who can define the duties of Congress if that body has control of this question and who will command or punish that body for a neglect of duty?

Mr. Speaker, if we have the power to determine all these questions ourselves we certainly have none to delegate, as this bill assumes to do. Gentlemen may say we are but following the practice of courts in appointing a commission or referee to discharge certain duties collateral to the main questions and that their decisions become the decisions of the court and that in this case the determination of this commission will become the act of Congress and that it is not an exercise of delegated power. The decisions of commissioners of courts and referees are of no binding force until confirmed by the court, but the decrees of this commission are binding and become the fixed rule of action unless set aside by the joint act of both Houses. Nor will it do to say we are but conferring additional duties upon officers already chosen when we select four of the associate justices of the Supreme Court to form part of this commission. They do not perform this task as judges, as a court. They cease to be a court when they become a part of this commission. They are but men. It is to this I object in part, as I believe to the courts belongs the duty to decide the questions of law, if any there be, involved in the present emergency; and if any way could be devised to hasten a speedy submission of these questions to the Supreme Court as a court, it would have my most earnest approval, and to the decision of that tribunal would the whole people bow in submission.

If we may delegate so important a trust to members of the Supreme Court, we may delegate such authority to any other class of men, to be selected as occasion may require and according to the necessities of the particular occasion. A grand chaos is here opened. Who knows the arbiters of 1881? Perhaps some military board will then be chosen, and thus from year to year as we attempt to elect a President we submit such questions as may arise to an unknown tribunal upon the theory that the Constitution of our fathers and the laws made in pursuance thereof are incomplete, and ours is a Government without a rudder, sail, an institution erected amidst a pending storm for temporary purposes only.

No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot consent to this departure. We had better meet the pending crisis with the Constitution which our fathers used, and which we have found to be a safe anchor, and let us use what power it has in preserving the rights of the people.

Counting the Eectoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. A. H. BUCKNER,

OF MISSOURI.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Speaker, I avail myself of the privilege accorded by the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] to those who desire to present the reasons of their vote on this bill, to submit some of the grounds of my approval of it. As an original proposition, disconnected from the circumstances surrounding us, few could be found who would favor it. It is by its terms temporary in its operation and obviously an expedient to tide the country and the Government over the perils of the next six weeks. Its necessity grows out of the fact that a gigantic conspiracy has been organized to defeat the popular will expressed at the late election by the use of any means, whether fair or foul, and that this conspiracy, organized by the worst element of the party in power, supported by the patronage as well as by the military and naval arms of the Government and defended by a corrupt and venal press, threatens to become a success. One of the chief props of this nefarious plot was the bold and impudent assertion that by the Constitution and by the practice of Congress in the past the President of the Senate was vested with the duty and powers not only of opening the certificates of the electors but of counting the ballots cast by them for President and Vice-President. It is this audacious "pretension," which, in the language of a leading republican Senator, "staggers human credulity," that gives to this conspiracy its formidable and dangerous character; and when it is well known that the President has determined to use the military power of the Government to protect and defend the candidate thus made President by the presiding officer of the Senate, the situation becomes full of peril and solicitude.

If the distinguished leaders of the republican party, who by the very terms of the bill now under consideration, as well as by their very conclusive arguments on the floor of the Senate, have repudiated and denounced this groundless pretension, had proclaimed their opinions as to the want of power of the President of the Senate at the opening of this session, in all human probability the desperate political tricksters who conceived and originated this conspiracy would have halted in their criminal course, and the presidential succession might have been settled without the passage of this bill. They were dumb when they should have spoken from the house-tops; their lips were sealed when duty to their country, as well as to their party, demanded that they should break their silence. But for this dereliction of duty, this miserable pretension would have died the death of the ridiculous, and Congress saved the necessity of this discussion and of the passage of this bill. Nor is it likely that this bill would have been necessary, certainly not in the form now presented, if the people who supported the candidates receiving nearly a quarter of a million majority of the votes at the late election, both in Congress and out of it, had shown the same boldness, determination, and pluck which their ancestors did when a similar attempt was made by the federalists of 1801 to defeat the popular will and inaugurate a revolution.

It is well known that Jefferson and Burr were the republican and democratic candidates for President at the election of 1800, the Constitution then providing that the candidate receiving the highest number of votes should be President and the next highest Vice-President. They each received 73 electoral votes, and, neither having a majority of the whole college, upon the House of Representatives, voting by States, was devolved the duty of electing the President. For several days the balloting went on, neither candidate having obtained a majority of States, the republicans voting for Jefferson and the federalists for Burr, when it was well known by everybody that the people, who voted for both of them, voted for the former for President and the latter for Vice-President. The progenitors of the present republican party determined to defeat and thwart the clearly expressed will of the people, and, finding that some of their party friends could not be brought to the support of Burr, they proposed to defer the balloting until the 3d of March, and then pass an act devolving the Goverment for the next four years on the President of the Senate, who would have been the creature of the federalists of that body. Mr. Jefferson and his friends made no secret of their purpose in the event of such an act, of revolution being attempted. They openly proclaimed their fixed resolution to resist any attempt of this sort by force, and it is a part of the history of the country that the governors of two great States of the Union were preparing to put the militia of their States on a war footing. The conspirators of 1801 quailed before the outraged indignation of a free people, and Mr. Jefferson was elected President by the House, notwithstanding then, as now, this opposition to him and his party had control of the Government in all its departments, legislative, executive, and judicial.

Mr. Speaker, I have never doubted that, if the democratic party had pursued the same course with our ancestors of 1801, if they had treated the pretension of the President of the Senate to count the electoral vote and declare who was elected President as a bold usurpation and an act of revolution that under no circumstances would be submitted to, if the resolution of the conventions of the 8th of January of the great States of Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana had been followed up by the States of the East and Northeast, this wicked and dangerous conspiracy of the men who have, by their misgovernment, peculations, and corruptions, brought disgrace and defeat to their party would have been abandoned and the will of the people as expressed last November carried out. But, sir, such seems not to have been the sentiment of those whose duty it was to act in this matter.

It is a mistake, however, to suppose that the pretension that the President of the Senate could alone count the electoral vote is the only difficulty to a peaceful and satisfactory solution of the difficulties surrounding the presidential succession. That "pretension" being admitted, all other difficulties vanish before the exercise of this one-man power. But consigning this pretension to the grave of forgotten follies, as the provisions of this bill in fact do, there are several disputed questions which make their appearance, and must find a solution. Conceding that the count of the electoral vote is to be made by the two Houses and that each House has equal power and prerogative in making it, the troublesome question arises whether it requires a concurrent vote of both Houses to reject as well as to affirm or count a vote. At no time in the history of the Government has this question assumed the importance or the character it now possesses. We have had the votes of States in dispute, but we have never had such disputes in a condition of things like the present, that is, when the disputed votes were decisive of the result and when both Houses of Congress differed in their political complexion. Up to this time the votes of disputed States were not decisive of the result or both Houses were of the same political faith. Hence it is that the question as to the power of each House to count or reject a vote must be decided or the probabilities are that no result would be reached by both Houses by the 4th of March. And this is neither a constitutional question—one that has been decided by uniform and unbroken precedent—or one about which any fair-minded reflecting mind can have any reasonable doubt. It is the rock on which the bill of 1800 was wrecked between the two Houses.

In the bill of 1824, passed in the Senate under the leadership of Mr. Van Buren, and approved by Mr. Webster, then chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House, each House must concur in the rejection of a vote, or it was entitled to be counted. The twenty-second joint rule, adopted in 1865, rejected the vote if either House failed to approve it. Amid the doubt and uncertainty on this mooted question, it is absolutely essential that some agreement should be had or we may drift into anarchy, an interregnum, the usurpation of the President of the Senate, or something worse.

Thus situated, as we are, it seems to me that there can be no excuse for a negative vote on this bill, unless it is believed that the two Houses cannot count the electoral vote under the Constitution or there is some other valid constitutional objection to it. If there were any doubt as to the phraseology of the Constitution, the long and unbroken line of precedent for seventy-five years ought to set this question at rest. A great jurist has said that—

Constitutions are not theories proposed for ingenious speculation, but fundamental laws ordained for practical purposes. Their meaning once ascertained by judicial interpretation and contented acquiescence, they are laws in that sense until the power that made them thinks proper to change them.

There is nothing settled or that can be settled by continuous and unbroken usage and by the opinions of statesmen of all political parties both living and dead, unless it is the power and duty of "the Senate and House of Representatives," sitting as "unmixed bodies," to examine and decide the validity or invalidity of the electoral vote and count the same. I assume that to be the mandate of the Constitution, as the bill before us concedes. But it is urged as an objection to this bill that it divests the two Houses of their power and authority to count the electoral vote and transfers it to the judges of the Supreme Court. But it is obvious that neither objection has any foundation in fact. It neither delegates its power and authority to the courts, nor does Congress in any way divest itself of its complete jurisdiction over the matter. The duties imposed on the judges are imposed upon them as citizens and not as justices of the Supreme Court; just as Justice Nelson was confirmed as one of the high joint commission that made the Geneva award. They are selected because of their judicial training, their pre-eminent learning, and exalted position and character; but if Congress had the same right to command their services, five judges of any of the States of the Union might have been selected just as well.

Nor does the bill divest the two Houses of their jurisdiction and control over the count. The commission of fifteen occupy the same relation to Congress that a master in chancery or referee bears to the court that appoints him. He is intrusted with the discharge of certain duties in aid of the court, and he may be required to decide both questions of law and fact, and make his report to the court by which he is appointed. But his judgment is subject to the confirmation or disapproval of the court; just as the opinion of the commission authorized by this bill is subject to rejection by the concurrent action of both Houses. The two Houses by concurrent action still maintain their control over the judgment of the commission, and it may be reversed if both Houses concur in so doing. But this is objected to, not because it is unconstitutional, but I suppose on the ground that either House, as under the joint rule of 1865, should have authority to reject a vote of a State. I do not purpose going into this mooted question. It is sufficient to say that it is one on which the two Houses may well compromise, and on which the Constitution is silent, and the usage far from being uniform. There is no superiority given to one House over the other, but each stands on the same plane, with equal right to judge and decide, to confirm or reject; and surely it is quite as competent for Congress to regulate its own action in this regard, as it would be to enact that where the circuit and district judges are sitting on a trial of a cause the report of a referee should not be disapproved except by the concurrence of both judges. By an act of the last Congress a commission was appointed by the two Houses, with power given to them to select two experts, who should report upon the remonetization of the silver dollar and other kindred questions. We have not divested ourselves of our constitutional jurisdiction over the silver question any more than the present bill divests the two Houses of their control of the electoral count, and I know of no law or constitutional prohibition which would have prevented Congress from providing that the recommendation of this silver commission should not be overruled except by the action of both Houses.

Mr. Speaker, the validity or invalidity of the disputed electoral votes are judicial rather than legislative or political questions. When once it is ascertained that the votes are legal, constitutional, and valid votes, the act of counting them is purely ministerial. And it is well that eminent judges, in connection with the best judicial minds of each House, be empowered to examine and pass upon the questions involved. They are required by this bill to be sworn to act impartially and decide the questions submitted to them to the best of their ability, and I have confidence that the judges selected, as well as the members of the two Houses that may be joined with them, will honestly and faithfully do their duty, not alone to their party, but to their consciences, their country, and their God.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. THOMAS C. PLATT,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, to me the following reasons seem to justify completely the vote I mean to cast for this bill:

First. While I firmly believe that Governor Hayes was fairly elected President, I cannot deny that a large number of citizens and of members of this House believe with equal sincerity that Mr. Tilden was elected. It is an election so close that all admit that the vote of one State and that one vote of that State must decide the result. It is a disputed election; the title to the office of President is not so clear in the minds of the people that Governor Hayes, if he were put into office without such an adjustment as this bill proposes, would have that general or universal consent to his administration which is necessary to the welfare of the country. In supporting this measure I do not conceive that I surrender any rights that are rights. If I held a piece of real estate the title to which was clouded, I should ask the proper authority to look into it and to give me a clear title. I should not thereby declare or confess that I had no faith in my own right, but rather that I had so firm a faith that I was willing to submit all the facts to an honest and proper tribunal and abide its decision.

Second. That the manner of settlement proposed in this bill is constitutional and legal, I cannot doubt, when I, who am no lawyer, realize the fact that it was framed by the most eminent lawyers of both political parties in both Houses, and that in the Senate it received the support and votes of the ablest constitutional lawyers who are members of that body. If I, a layman, should hesitate to take their opinion, I should only convict myself of rashness and presumption.

Third. I am a life-long republican, a strict party man, who has had and still has an abiding faith in the past, the present, and the future of that great party. Still, I am not of those who believe that in so important, so solemn, so vital a proceeding as is intrusted to the committee by this bill, the judges of the Supreme Court who are to take part in it will be actuated by partisan considerations. I do not even dare to entertain the belief that the other members of the committee, in the face of their grave and awful responsibilities, will act as partisans. I should be ashamed of myself and of my American citizenship if I cherished such suspicions. I grieve to think that there are any who are willing to impute such base motives to the eminent men who must compose this commission. If our cause is just, we, as republicans, have nothing to fear from the grand inquest of this tribunal. They will deal justly and honestly. If our claim is false; if our title to the Presidency is not true, I trust there is no republican in the land so base as to desire such a lease of power.

Fourth. The voice of the people of the country favors and demands the passage of this bill. Especially is this true of the business and commercial interests of the nation, and they it is who comprise the great majority of the thinking, working, patriotic people of the land. Every property-owner, merchant, trader, banker, farmer, mechanic, or laborer is personally interested in having a peaceful settlement of this difficulty which is depressing values, paralyzing trade, retarding industries, and destroying that confidence which is the foundation of business enterprise and prosperity. They want peace, they want prosperity, and they do not for a moment cherish the thought that they are securing it thus through compromise or dishonor.

Some of us, and many people outside these walls, have honest fears of civil war unless some such amicable settlement as this bill provides is adopted. I do not care to express my own opinions on this subject; but all will agree that short of civil war no greater calamity could befall our country than to inaugurate a President about whose title to the office a considerable part of the people, including a portion of the republican party, felt a doubt. Such a doubt, even if it did not provoke resistance to his authority, would yet maintain a condition of uncertainty and dissatisfaction throughout the country which would be unendurable; because it would paralyze all industry, intensify prevalent distress, and prevent entirely that revival of enterprise and commerce which we so sadly need, and to which, I believe, we may hopefully look forward if we can but secure a contented acceptance of the result of the presidential election. Such a result this bill will surely give us. I for one declare here and now that I am ready to abide by the decision of this proposed tribunal if this bill shall become a law; to accept its verdict, whatever it may be; philosophically and patriotically if against my own convictions and hopes, gratefully and joyously if it shall firmly establish the right and title to the presidential office of that brave soldier and true patriot, Rutherford B. Hayes.

I hope for the passage of the bill because it will avert from us as a nation a great calamity, and because by adopting this settlement we may hope to strengthen and continue the proud career of the republican party, prolong the peaceful life of the nation, perpetuate the existence of orderly and law-abiding liberty, and set an example to the world of which our children and children's children may well be proud—an example which will elevate us in the opinions of all good men everywhere, and show us to be a nation of freemen truly capable of self-government, because capable of self-restraint, patience, and forbearance under the greatest dangers and difficulties.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. JOSEPH H. RAINEY,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, the pending bill has doubtless attracted more general attention and awakened a deeper interest in its several provisions than any measure that has been presented before Congress since the beginning of the last century.

Not even the grave questions involved in the proposed war policy of 1860, a momentous period in American legislative discussions, could well cope in importance with the great subject now under consideration. At that time the idea of actual conflict was a novel one with the majority of the people, and its consequent perils were rather fascinating in their dim conception.

Now, already emerged from the horrors of civil strife, and its smoke nearly, if not entirely dispelled, we cherish yet closer by comparison the blessings of peace and regard with aversion all thought of future warrings. Hence it is that the pending measure has received such heartfelt indorsement from the masses, regarding it as they do as the means of averting a near resort to arms.

Granting this grim foreboding to wear a semblance of reality, can we, with even the slightest sense of fealty to the Constitution, suffer that anchor of our Government to become broken merely to stave off yet a little while longer an inevitable conflict? For it must come sooner or later. Once permit the Constitution to be made a mere piece of pottery to fashion as party exigencies seem to demand, and that moment we are cut adrift from safe moorings and carried beyond rescue upon the tossing billows of the political sea.

I have given time and close study to this proposed measure. I object to the bill generally, because, from even a common-sense standpoint, it is at utter variance with the fundamental law of our country—an equity which marks the distinctive features between the organism of our Government and that of other lands. Since my initial entrance into your honorable body no proposition has come before it in which I have taken so strong an interest. The report of the joint committee is singularly adroit, having the pleasing property of impressing the reader very favorably on a first and casual reading. But reflection thereon tends inevitably to arouse suspicion. It is evasive in tone and lacks a positiveness and firmness of expression which would seem to indicate a purpose or desire to shrink from responsibilities that should be assumed. This surely is not owing to its approximate omnipotent origin, as described in the following sentence taken from the remarks made by a distinguished Senator before the Senate at the opening of the debate on the pending subject. He said:

* * * There is no human agency, there is nothing short of the overruling providence of the Almighty that can furnish a juster test of human rights than this.

If such be true, in my judgment, every sentence should have been bold and well nerved with the consciousness of the purity of its origin and the sanction of Omnipotence. I object to the bill specifically because it is in open defiance of the Constitution, which provides that the executive, judicial, and legislative powers of the Government shall be regarded as entirely separate and maintained as such; the bill proposes to coalesce two of these three branches and make them judges of the rightful claim to the posession of the third. And further, in the event of an appeal from the decision of this tribunal, for which contingency the bill provides as follows:

SEC. 6. That nothing in this act shall be held to impair or affect any right now existing under the Constitution and laws to question, by proceeding in the judicial courts of the United States, the right or title of the person who shall be declared elected, or shall claim to be President or Vice-President of the United States, if any such right exists.

The only court to which an appeal could be made is crippled in its power to decide by the fact that a majority of its members will have already passed judgment upon the question, and thereby rendered nullify their subsequent vote.

And again the vaunted impartial character of this tribunal is somewhat dwarfed when we recollect that its aggregate is an odd number, and that the pairing of votes therein will leave yet one upon which the fate of a party must rest. It will prove, in fact, the election of a President by one man rather than by a majority of the people of the United States, and therefore the ignoring of the legal right of the people and a challenge of their lawful franchise; a franchise which, once assailed in this manner, Heaven alone can foretell what other infringements it may have to endure in the name of law and expediency.

Gentlemen refer to the necessity of this compromise plan as being of the gravest importance in order that the paralyzed industries of the country may be revived and renewed; as though, indeed, we were suffering more in such direction than any other country. Surely they must have overlooked the present dearth in business that is spread as world-wide as it is proving disastrous. This lack of business activity is not owing to any political cause incident to the present dilemma in which we find ourselves, but to the one fact that we have fallen upon a troubled period when, indeed, "the time is out of joint." Neither Hayes nor Tilden is able to change the mercantile situation nor to stem the tide of the logic or sequence of events.

I am opposed to the bill also because in my opinion it is a reflection and an outrage upon the wisdom of the authors of the Constitution who bestowed so much care and attention upon its construction. Framed at a period far removed from party strife, which has become so rampant during the last quarter of the present century, the spirit of toleration and impartiality has left its ineffaceable impress upon that instrument.

Finally, and with all possible earnestness, I venture to suggest that extreme caution be exercised in the premises, lest the passage of this bill be taken as an announcement to the world that, after the test of a hundred years, it has been found impracticable for a republican government of such magnitude as ours to exist upon a firm and peaceful basis; just, yet charitable, and equal always to any emergency. The demise of this Republic would be a calamity of no ordinary character. Such a result would increase the arrogance of potentates and plunge in the depths of humiliation and despair a large portion of the world's inhabitants, who have watched with unfeigned interest our steady rise as like a star unto its zenith, and who have cherished the best hopes for the perpetuity of our institutions and the life of the Republic; and we ourselves would be called upon to mourn over our rended country as did Antony of old over the prostrate body of Cæsar, when, slightly paraphrasing his words, he said:

O, mighty country! Dost thou lie so low?
Are all thy conquests, glories, triumphs, spoils,
Shrunk to this little measure? Fare thee well!

For these and other reasons which I could assign, did time permit, I feel constrained to vote against the pending bill.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. C. FREEMAN,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. FREEMAN. Mr. Speaker, in the settlement of all questions of constitutional law the primary and fundamental source of information, in a Government such as this, must lie in the examination and correct interpretation of that basis of all law, the Constitution itself. This is the root whence springs the life of all national law, and it is a strange matter indeed if, after nearly one hundred years of its study by the minds of some of the noblest specimens of intellect the world has ever produced, we are left now stranded, in the face of insurmountable danger, which all that time was liable, during any four years, to arise. Now, sir, what are the mandates of the Constitution in this behalf? They are, as regards the election of a President, first—

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.—Article 2, section 1, clause 2.

The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes; which day shall be the same throughout the United States."—Article 2, section 1, clause 4.

In these provisions of the Constitution, together with the twelfth amendment hereafter referred to, we must search for a clear and proper understanding of the whole question of the counting of the electoral vote. Under the reading of clause 2, section 1, article 2, the entire question of the manner of appointment of electors is placed within the control of the State Legislatures. No other power is found anywhere to infringe a hair's-breadth on this exclusive right. It is above and beyond Congress, and draws vitality from the very source of life to Congress itself. As well might the State Legislatures undertake to interfere with the constitutional rights and powers of Congress, as the latter assume to interfere, in whatever manner, under whatever claim, in whatever shape, or under color of whatever right, with the sole, supreme, unimpeachable power of the State Legislatures. The people of the States themselves, save in so far as they can elect from time to time their legislators, cannot interfere, and no other branch of the State governments have aught to say.

THE LEGISLATURES OF THE STATES ARE SUPREME

in this matter and they can provide any manner of appointment they deem best. This constitutional power being supreme, it follows that its exercise cannot be disputed or reviewed, for to give to Congress a right to review the action of the Legislature is to deprive it at once of its supreme authority and to nullify the mandate of the Constitution. But "the Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors and the day on which they shall give their vote, which day shall be the same throughout the United States." As this power is not in dispute and does not touch the merits of the question as at present presented, it is hardly necessary to dwell upon it. Any right Congress would have upon the subject is to be looked for, if anywhere, in the constitutional power given. But it would but go to the formality of the vote and not to its substance; and in the only case, that of Wisconsin in 1857, in which the question arose of the power of Congress to control the count, when it appeared on the face of the certificate that the electoral vote had been cast on the day succeeding the one prescribed by law, the vote was recorded and so stands to-day. It was a case much argued by some of the ablest men of that day; but the action then taken remains a record to this hour. The only argument adverse to the claim of counting the vote of that State was practically founded upon the express constitutional provision followed by the act of Congress itself.

Having thus seen that the manner of appointment is entirely and absolutely vested in the State Legislatures, we come to Article 12 of the Constitution, before referred to, which expressly directs—who? Not Congress, or either House thereof, but the electors themselves how they shall proceed until they are finally directed to certify and transmit sealed, not to Congress, or the Senate, or House separately, or to the President of the Senate, but to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to

THE PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

Now, just here let me ask who is the President of the Senate? For an answer we turn to clause 4, section 3 of article 1 of the Constitution, and we find that—

The Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote unless they be equally divided.

It is therefore in his capacity as Vice-President, or, in the case of a Presidency pro tempore, by his relation to that high office, that the electors are directed to act. As President pro tempore alone he could not act. There is no authority for it in the Constitution. But as President pro tempore, acting Vice-President, he can, for as acting Vice-President he becomes technically President of the Senate under the Constitution. And this marks the constitutional distinction between the President of the Senate as such under the Constitution, and as the mere presiding officer or organ of that body.

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

And this raises the question with regard to which hasty partisanship has filled the air with its thousand evil tongues, and sought, by devices well learned through long years of assuming power, to breathe into loyal hearts the thoughts of another scene of blood and ruin such as these same imbittered spirits conjured up into all the horrors of reality scarcely sixteen years ago. Why, sir, one is led to think we have already entered unconsciously into the first dread step of war. We pause to seek for the existence of a supreme court to expound the supreme law of the land and for an executive whose duty it is to enforce it. Have they passed out of existence or have we already reached that stage of independent government when, like unhappy Mexico and the unstable republics of South America, the solution of party questions is to be found only in individual supremacy and open revolution? Why is it, sir, that the law of the land is not permitted to take its natural course? What bird of evil omen has cast its shadow over this land of free people and awakened fears of the impending downfall of free government? It is the spirit of treason and rebellion already sending grumbling and muttering threats abroad, as sixteen years ago, of what is to be the result if such constructions of law and principles of action are not adopted in the present condition of the presidential election as shall suit the views of the defeated party. Sir, before looking into the legal merits of the question I desire, as solemnly as words can enable me, to enter with such a condition of affairs. If to-day, when the people of the whole world are singing hosannas to the glory and happiness of free government as carried to the remotest corners of the earth by the national gatherings here of the past year—if, I say, to-day and at this hour, with each day bringing to us the echoes of their greetings, we are forced to admit that we are living under law so shadowy and unreal as to be without the power of enforcement, then God take into his keeping the hope of the oppressed, for the future of free government is enshrouded in darkness. Sir, I believe in the law, and the life of the law is the execution of the law. When a citizen, or a body of men, or a great party cry out for the execution of the law in a certain form and threaten resistance if not heeded, their hearts are filled with treason, I care not who they are. No party can or will endure, in a government republican in form, which does not live up practically and earnestly to the forms of law; and no government republican in form can endure which does not live up to and enforce, in the hour of threat and danger, the law which is the foundation of its existence. Now, sir, let us turn to the question of the law for which, if any, is found in the twelfth amendment to the Constitution already referred to. Its words are:

A WARNING PROTEST AGAINST ANY COMPROMISE

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

Now, sir, what is the true intent and meaning of the words "certificates" and "counted?" The word certificate means here "a written declaration legally authenticated," or "a written testimony to the truth of any fact." The word to count means "to tell or name, one by one, or by groups, for the purpose of ascertaining the whole number of units in a collection; to number, to enumerate, to compute, to reckon;" and to compute is to determine by calculation, to ascertain by mathematical process; and the count is the amount ascertained by numbering.

The language of the Constitution is not that the votes shall be counted by the Senate and House of Representatives, but "in the presence of the two Houses." They are entirely passive and clearly not active in the matter. On page 334 of the journal of the Federal convention the words "in presence of the Senate and House of Representatives" were moved to be inserted after the word counted, and this motion was carried. The journal of the convention does not show that any motion was made to strike out the words "in that House," which occur in the original draught, nor does it show why the words "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives" were inserted in the place of the words "in that House," instead of after the word "counted," as was voted by the convention.

This was in place of the words "shall in that House" open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted, which shows that the original idea was not even to have the lower House present at the counting. The electors were not intended to meet at the seat of the General Government, for a motion to that effect was negatived. Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors and of their giving their votes, but the manner of appointment of the electors remains in the local or State Legislatures, and only the manner of certifying and transmitting their votes is given to Congress. By what authority can Congress question the appointment? It has only to see as to the proper exercise of the powers granted, viz: The time of choosing the electors and of their giving their votes and of the proper certification and transmission. If their custody and opening are in the power of the President of the Senate and he is directed, "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives," he shall open all the certificates, and "the votes shall then be counted," and no reference is made to any other construction of the sentence, the common sense of the language, the implication of law, all show that the counting is to be by the custodian of the trust. It cannot be doubtful, or it would have read "shall open all certificates in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, by whom the votes shall then be counted." The new-born horror with which the idea of to count the votes is all at once investsd, seems to have no existence as to the faithful trust of their unlimited custody for months. If he could count them against the judicial dictates of his conscience, how much more readily could he alter them or destroy them altogether. A thousand excuses could be made for the secret act, while the other is to be executed with both Houses as witnesses of the wrong, if any be attempted, and with the punishment of impeachment before the wrong-doer.

By the Federal Constitution, as I before remarked, the manner of the appointment of presidential electors is in the State Legislatures. The question of how that right has been exercised is one for the State to decide. But the electors once appointed, the manner of the certification and transmission of their votes can alone be directed by Congress, and if properly done they are bound to be counted. The President of the Senate is directed to open the votes. There can be but one valid and correctly certified and transmitted certificate from each State. There may be many false and fraudulent ones. He is to open all the certificates. A false paper is not a certificate, and he is not directed to open anything but the certificates.* I would like to be pointed to the line in the Constitution saying this question must be submitted to Congress, and I would like to be pointed to the principle of interpretation by which when the Constitution delegates a power which requires the exercise of conscientious individual action, that is not the delegation of judicial power. If the certification is correct it proves itself; if it is not correct it is no certification. How in cases of dispute is the President of the Senate to determine whether he has opened the vote until he examines the certificates, and this again is the exercise of a judicial power co-extensive with and necessary to the execution of the power to open the votes. But the true intent and meaning of the Constitution upon this point is unanswerably shown by the interpretation put upon it by the actual framers of the document in the resolution in the nature of instructions of September 17, 1787, by which the Senate was advised how action should be taken on the first vote.

COUNTING THE FIRST VOTE FOR PRESIDENT.

The instructions were that the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President. In accordance with this interpretation of the Constitution by those who framed it and on undeniable evidence of the acceptance of the Constitution by Congress, at the election for the first presidential term, April 6, 1789, we find it was ordered in the Senate "that Mr. Ellsworth inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is formed; that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice-President of the United States; and that the Senate is now ready, in the Senate Chamber, to proceed in the presence of the House to discharge that duty; and that the Senate have appointed one of their members to sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; submitting it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their members for the like purpose." Then again in the form of the Journal of the Senate of the same date it is broadly stated that "the President elected for the purpose of counting"—here the word "opening" is omitted—"the votes declared the Senate and House of Representatives had met, and that he, in their presence, had opened and counted the votes," &c.

THE FIRST CERTIFICATE OF ELECTION FOR PRESIDENT, the one given to General Washington, contains these words:

Be it known that, the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America being convened in the city and State of New York the 6th day of April, A. D. 1789, the underwritten, appointed President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes of the electors, did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for a President and for a Vice-President; by which it appears that George Washington, esq., was unanimously elected, agreeably to the Constitution, to the office of President of the United States of America.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal.

JOHN LANGDON.

And so, too, the certificate to Vice-President Adams contains the same words; so that at that day, when the intention must have been clear and well understood, the matter of the opening and counting and declaring the vote was indisputably in the President of the Senate, for he exercised it without question or dispute. So, too, the Journal of the House is in strict conformity with that of the Senate. On the same day it appears therein recorded that Mr. Ellsworth, on behalf of the Senate, said:

Mr. Speaker, I am charged by the Senate to inform this House that a quorum of the Senate is now formed; that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice-President of the United States, and that the Senate is now ready in the Senate Chamber to proceed, in the presence of this House, to discharge this duty. I have it also in further charge to inform this House that the Senate has appointed one of its members to sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared, submitting it to the wisdom of this House to appoint one or more of its members for the like purpose.

And it will be noticed that each body elected parties "to make a list of the votes as the same shall be declared," showing that the act of declaration of the vote was to be recorded as the substance of the list. This seems to leave the question so utterly beyond argument at this period of time, that it would be a work of supererogation to say more in that connection.

HOW HAS THIS CONDITION CHANGED?

To ascertain we must follow the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof. Accordingly we next find a law passed by Congress in 1792 under and by virtue of the Constitution which entirely harmonizes with all these forms and actions, and one that shows that there was no thought at that time of Congress, as such, having anything more to do with the electoral vote than as witnesses. It clearly intends to keep even the custody of the votes out of the hands of Congress in case of the absence of the President of the Senate. Surely, if Congress were to pass upon the substance and validity of the certificates, their care and sole keeping would not have been deposited so studiously in other quarters; for, after in section 5 enacting (without referring to the Vice-President as if there was no thought of misunderstanding on this point) "that the said certificate," &c., agreeable to the Constitution, should issue to the President declared elected, section 6 goes on to provide for the custody of the votes in case of the President of the Senate, who was the Vice-President, not being at the seat of Government on their arrival, &c., by directing that they be placed, not in charge of the Senate President pro tempore or House of Representatives, or both, or as they might direct, but in the office of the Secretary of State as a place of safe-keeping, and to be delivered over, &c., to the President of the Senate. I desire it to be observed that so far, that is the

of the election for the first term, not an act committed or a word spoken in either branch of Congress is at variance with the plain language of the Constitution that the President of the Senate is to receive and open the certificates, which, ex necessitate rei, involves the determination of the fact as to what are the certificates, while every action unanswerably adopts the construction of the resolution of September 17, 1787, "that the purpose of electing a President of the Senate is for the single purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes." It was intended that thisquasi-judicial power should be in the hands of the Vice-President, who by the Constitution is President of the Senate, and as there was no Vice-President to thus act, it became necessary to appoint a President of the Senate, whose powers and duties were strictly limited to the necessities of the occasion. This view is still further strengthened if we look to the language used in relation to whose duties were merely clerical and in no sense indicative of any assumption of power by either House, namely, "the Senate appointed one of its members to sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes," not after they are opened, but "as they shall be declared," and by the House that two members "be appointed on the part of this House to sit at the Clerk's table with the members of the Senate and make a list of the votes as the same shall be declared." Is this not clear that the President of the Senate, as Vice-President or acting Vice-President, is to open and declare or announce the vote before the list is made, and that the list must be made in conformity with such declaration or announcement, and that such action, under the obligation of the Constitution, is of such a character as to be mandatory and it cannot be avoided by either Congress or the President of the Senate, and must from the very necessities of the condition require the use of the good conscience of the latter and to that extent be quasi-judicial?

THE SECOND ELECTION OF PRESIDENT.

At the election of 1793 the mode of procedure was identical, and I desire to call attention to the message from the House of Representatives of February 5, 1793, with regard to the appointment of a committee "to join," &c., * * * "of examining the votes," &c., for President and Vice-President. But after the two committees had ascertained the mode by examining the supposed law and the precedent, they reported "that one person," &c., * * * "make a list of the votes as they shall be declared," of course by the President of the Senate acting as a constitutional officer. Here the language is sometimes loose, but there nowhere exists a thought of questioning the powers of the President of the Senate under the Constitution. So the Journal of the Senate of February 13, 1793, reads "the certificates of the electors," &c., "were by the Vice-President," &c., (here the title President of the Senate is not even used,) tending to show more forcibly that it was in this character in which the presiding officer of the Senate derived and not simply as the officer elected by the Senate from its own body to preside. The Constitution makes the Vice-President the President of the Senate. At the first election there was no existing Vice-President and the Senate could not elect one, for there was no vacancy. It became, therefore, necessary to elect a President of the Senate for the purpose of executing the functions and duties in connection with the counting of the vote, but he was created, and his duties confined to that particular thing. It is in no wise as President of the Senate, but as Vice or acting Vice-President that his duties and functions under the Constitution arise, and in no one portion of that instrument, as I hope to convince the House before I close, is a more profound sagacity shown than in that where this high and solemn duty is placed in the hands of that officer. That at that early day the relationship of the Vice-President by relation of his office to the Presidency of the Senate was not in all minds is quaintly illustrated by the announcement of the Secretary of the Senate to the House of Representatives on the occasion of the second declaration of the electoral vote, that he was "directed to inform the House that a President of the Senate is elected," &c., whereas Vice-President Adams presided, declared the vote, and announced the result. The only other at this time was the proper and necessary one, they having been witnesses of the announcement of the result, of the notification to the parties elected. And here I desire to ask attention once more to the language of all these various resolutions. At the election for the third term a similar resolution "to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes" was adopted, which resulted in the adoption in the same united resolve for the appointment of tellers "to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared." And this was the only examination carried out, was the only one lawful under the Constitution. And in the declaration of the second and third electoral votes the Vice-President had to declare his own election, in the one case the Vice-President and in the latter as President, and no one had the hardihood to suggest at that early day when the practical workings of that instrument were upon trial before watchful minds that such was not the law. The terms were doubtless well considered and by their selection speak with double force the true intent. To read the vote or to declare it in connection with the sole custody and power and duty to open it, is to be compelled to pass upon its validity and is essentially judicial.

HIS CONSTITUTIONAL DUTY,

ASSUMPTION OF THE TWO HOUSES

TO COUNT IT AFTER IT IS DECLARED

is to sum it up, to obtain its result in numbers in accordance with the declaration, and is nothing but clerical and ministerial. No sophistry of language can make it otherwise, as no condition of circumstances changes the organic law. To view it otherwise is to say that either House had it in their power from the commencement to defeat the will of the people from whom they received their own existence. The manner of the appointment for electors is in the Legislatures of the States. If this be so, and it is so by the express words of the Constitution, all the incidents of the election must lie in the same direction and can by no distortion of power be assumed by Congress. It is essentially different from the election of its own members, for there the power is directly given to look into the qualifications, which include their due election.

THE FIRST DISAGREEMENT between the two Houses was shown by refusal to agree to the first bill, proposed to provide a mode of deciding disputed elections of President and Vice-President of the United States.

This disagreement was mainly on the point of whether the votes should be admitted upon the concurrence of the two Houses or whether no votes should be rejected save by concurrence of both Houses, and, strange as it may appear to the present House, it was the House that firmly adhered to the latter.

THE THIRD ELECTION FOR PRESIDENT.

Here, upon no agreement being arrived at as to the mode of examination of votes by the joint commission, on motion the Senate—

Resolved, That the Senate will be ready to receive the House of Representatives in the Senate Chamber on Wednesday next, at twelve o'clock, for the purpose of being present at the opening and counting the votes for President of the United States; that one person be appointed a teller on the part of the Senate to make a list of the votes for President of the United States as they shall be declared, and that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, which shall be entered upon the Journals; and if it shall appear that a choice hath been made agreeably to the Constitution, such entry on the Journal shall be deemed a sufficient declaration thereof.

On the next day the proceedings show that Mr. Wells was appointed a teller on the part of the Senate for the purpose expressed in the above resolution. On February 11, 1801, the next day, it was ordered by the Senate—

That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to meet them in the Senate Chamber for the purpose of being present at the opening and counting the votes for President of the United States.

In accordance with this order the Journal shows that the House and Senate convened in the Senate Chamber for the purposes expressed in the above resolution. Throughout the proceedings—was used instead of President of the Senate, showing that it was in the spirit of that character, rather than as presiding officer merely, he was recognized in the performance of this duty. Here again the words of the resolution appointing tellers are precisely as hitherto; "to make a list of the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States as they shall be declared"—by whom but by the Vice-President, and how, if he has not the power to determine what is a vote, and under what authority if not the Constitution!

No subtile logic of the brain can cloud so clear a fact. The Journals of each House show that the President of the Senate in presence of both Houses proceeded to open the certificates of the electors of the several States, beginning with the State of New Hampshire, and as the votes were read the tellers on the part of each House counted and took lists of the same, which, being compared, were delivered to the President of the Senate.

HOW PLAIN THE LANGUAGE,

"as the votes" (not names) were read; (here the word read is used in place of declared, showing that the first reading and the declaring are the same, and again implying in different terms an absolute necessity for the existence of a power to distinguish a vote from a pretense which is no vote at all;) and this, too, when the Vice-President who read and declared the vote was himself tied in the count by another candidate for President and one vote changed would have decided the matter in his favor. And again, stands recorded on the Senate Journal of February 9, 1801, in all the solemnity of irrepressible truth, the great fact that the then Vice-President and President of the Senate was by them directed to make out a certificate of election declaring that "he did in the presence of both Houses open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for President," &c. Thus far we have the fact of the plain, for though the terms and language might have been more definite, yet the action of the two Houses and the President of the Senate, uniform as it has been, has set a seal upon this construction which has made them the fathers of this most proper interpretation. Even at this early day the wisdom of the framers of the Constitution had been shown in giving the two Houses of Congress no part but that of witnesses to the solemn act of counting and declaring the electoral vote. For they had only been prevented from using unconstitutional power as has been already shown by difference as to the mode of use between the two. This brings us to the constitutional amendment, article 12. And here the whole line of reasoning heretofore adopted is still further indorsed. For though the question, or doubt, if any, could only arise from a construction different from that heretofore pursued of the words "the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted," yet in the face of based upon that clause by which the President of the Senate had always opened and counted the vote, as the certificates of election show, and though the question of what the result of pretended votes might be had been much discussed, the amendment re-affirms the practical construction of the power of the Vice-President by using the identical words. Nay, further, under the law passed to declare that under certain circumstances two sets of certificates, the same in substance but differing in form, shall be forwarded, it gives the Vice-President power to decide which shall be opened at the day fixed, which is a quasi-judicial action.

DIRECTIONS OF THE CONSTITUTION

THE FORMS OF PROCEDURE

under this amendment and the certificate ordered to be made by the President of the Senate of the result of the election for the fifth term contain the assertion that he had counted all the votes exactly in accordance with that heretofore adopted. On February 6, 1809, the following resolution in relation to the Massachusetts electors was offered in the House by Mr. Bacon, who said that he wished, in offering it, merely to give an intimation to the Senate that such petition had been received. The resolution was as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House do carry to the Senate the several memorials from sundry citizens from the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the mode in which the appointment of electors for President and Vice-President has been proceeded to on the part of the senate and house of representatives of said State, as irregular and unconstitutional, and praying for the interference of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States for the purpose of preventing the establishment of so dangerous a precedent.

In this connection, Mr. Randolph said it appeared to him that, under color of redress of grievances, the resolution might go in a very alarming and dangerous manner to enlarge the sphere of action of the General Government at the expense of the dearest rights of the States. In what manner, asked he, is the General Government constituted? We, as one of the branches of the Legislature, are unquestionably the judges of our own qualifications and returns. The Senate, the other branch of the Legislature, is in like manner the judge without appeal of the qualifications of its own members. But with respect to the appointment of President, on whom is that authority devolved in the first instance? On the electors, who are to all intents and purposes, according to my apprehensions, as much the judges of their own qualifications as we are of ours; and it appears to me as competent to the people of any part of this country to prefer a petition to the electoral college to set aside the returns of any members of Congress as to prefer petitions to this House to set aside the qualifications of electors. True, it is that for the convenience of the thing, and also for the prevention of cabals and intrigue, the electors assemble in separate divisions in the respective States; but they are to be considered, to all intents and purposes, as a body of men equal in number to the Senate and House of Representatives, charged with the election of President and Vice-President of the United States, and judges in the last resort of their own qualifications and returns. If not, they are a mere nullity. * * * This is a delicate subject; one which it is agreed on all hands there is no occasion to touch. The election is not only undisputed, but indisputable. * * * If we do away the decision of the electoral body, which is as independent of us as we are of them, the Constitution is, in my opinion, verging to its dissolution.

The resolution for the sixth term was identical with the former ones, and during the progress of the count attention was called to what appeared a defect in the returns from one of the States. But the matter was passed without even a consideration and the return duly counted. The same joint convention also refused to have an elector's reason for not having voted spread upon the Journal, it being contended that the House had no concern with the causes why a vote was not received.

Such it seems is

THE STRICT LEGAL POSITION

on the question of the counting of the electoral votes under the Constitution as construed and acted upon in every instance where a question had arisen up to the commencement of the civil war. The appointment of tellers by and under the inspiration of a concurrent resolution, so called, but not so in fact, can in no sense be taken as an act of law or having vitality under that clause of the Constitution authorizing the Government to carry out the powers herein delegated, for it needs what is essential under the third clause of section 7, article 1, of the Constitution, which says, "Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the two Houses is required must be signed by the President."

UNFORTUNATELY THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD

shows an innate desire on the part of power to arrogate to itself greater power, and in no form has tyranny and oppression and disregard of law shown itself more cruel and desperate than in unrestrained legislative bodies. They are safe in so far only as they are bound down and restricted to the exercise of powers wisely granted, and the argument against the exercise of power on the part of the Vice-President because of the danger from the nature of its extent is unreal and unreasoning. He is the second officer of the Government, yet removed from temptation because wielding no separate power. From his relations to the Government he shall be President of the Senate and absolutely free from the chance of individual gain. In any plan involving wrong he could only be gainer in the case by declaring himself President in the face of the decision of the people, which would be revolution, pure and simple. He would be in the immediate face of the Representatives of the people, with impeachment before him, and harmless to act; chained in as securely as it is within the power of man to be. Not so with Congress. Already its powers are vast and far-reaching. Already both branches have shown a full appreciation of their powers, and almost from the day of their creation the record will show a jealous spirit of aggression between the two, and a spirit of self-assertion such as has marked no other branch of Government. No one who has read the debates of the past touching

THE ELECTIONS AND POWERS OF THE TWO HOUSES

can fail to mark and appreciate this startling fact; for in the light and reason of history it reminds us with a voice that will not be stilled of the horrors and awful crimes which can flourish in an irresponsible body or one unconfined by something more than the specious reasonings of arbitrary desires. These things were well known to the fathers of the Constitution. It was not in the power of the executive or judicial branches arising from that august division they anticipated danger, but from the power of the Congress. Indeed the words originally adopted did not anticipate the presence of the Congress as such. They were "the President of the Senate shall, in that House, open all the certificates, and the votes shall be then and there counted." Surely if any intention had existed in the minds of the framers that Congress was to supervise or control the counting, it would have shown itself in different language than that. The operation of mind most natural was this, when put in words: The Vice-President is the proper officer to open and count the votes, but, as it is a high and solemn duty and one to be performed with all due formality, let it be done in the Hall of the Senate and before that august representation of States. When the words in their present form were adopted, so little attention seems to have been given to this that there is nowhere to be found a motion to strike out the words "in that House," and so little importance seems to have been attached to the change that it was substantially agreed to by the committee of revision.

But to illustrate more strongly the mind of that day in this connection, and as convincing of the overwhelming importance attached to the dignity and power of the States as such, and their rights in the premises, and not representatives of the people as such, when it had been decided that in the election of a President by the House "a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States," the convention refused to add thereto the words, "and also a majority of the whole number of the House of Representatives." So that while it was possible by the letter of the Constitution for nine members representing nine States to have been a quorum, yet it would not have been possible for sixty-one Representatives representing only eight States to have been so. True, such a condition was not probable, but the fact of the possibility being the essence of the reason of the law is an unanswerable illustration of the mode of mind from which the law received its birth. And the fundamental law on this subject thus fashioned and laid down in the Constitution has stood the test of time. It is a mistake to suppose the case presented at this late day, complicated as it is by the bitter results of relentless civil war, is in any sense graver in a legal point of view than those of the past. They were more or less founded on the institution of slavery and involved the deepest and most powerful appeal to the selfish passions of the human heart, for they were appeals founded on property rights and self-interest. Mr. Randolph, of Virginia, gave evidence of this in 1821, when he said he "recollected perfectly well in the celebrated election of Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr, * * * what were we then told? Why, that we must withdraw our opposition or there would be no election; that a dissolution of the Union impended; that volcanoes began to play; that earthquakes yawned beneath us; and recollect, sir, we had a President in the chair who had a majority in the House, small as it was. He treated the idea of giving away with derision and scorn. We said we will not give away, and you must take the consequences." Chancellor Kent also adds his voice to the view that the authority under the Constitution, in the absence of all legislation to count the vote, is vested in the President of the Senate. This distinguished jurist says:

> The President of the Senate, on the second Wednesday in February succeeding every meeting of the electors, in the presence of both Houses of Congress, opens all the certificates and the votes are then to be counted. The Constitution does not expressly declare by whom the votes are to be counted and the result declared. In the case of questionable votes and a closely contested election, this power may be all-important, and I presume, in the absence of all legislative provision on the subject, that the President of the Senate counts the votes and determines the result.

So, too, Senator BAYARD, in reference to this very subject, has said, and with most cogent force:

> The truth is, all my theories of government come just about to this: that if they are not to be honorably, honestly, and fairly administered, any laws that you make will be perfectly worthless to procure that justice and certainty, that proper record of the will of the people, which our scheme of government was intended to produce. I apprehend that there is no rule which you can frame that will not be open to defeat by some supposititous cases. * * * When the time shall come that a Vice-President of this country, or the Senate or the House of Representatives of this country, shall, from passion moving them act otherwise than honestly, of what use are your laws or your safeguards of statutes and Constitution? They will be of no value, and the Government will have failed, and another will take its place, because in all human experience there is one thing that will be necessary, no matter what form of government may exist, and that is that honesty and truth shall be its foundation-stone and enter into the administration of its affairs.

These, sir, are the words of a distinguished democratic Senator, and who can doubt their truth? So that the conclusion of all that can be said against the repose of trust or power in any one place applies with equal force to all. Especially does it apply to a body such as the Congress of the United States, where the danger of improper collective action is always to be guarded against, and where individual responsibility can so easily be shielded by the protection of party feeling. The words of Mr. Pinckney, who had better means of knowing the thought of the framers of the Constitution, for he was of them and of their day, seem to me unanswerable. He said, as early as the year 1800, in speaking of the power of Congress:

> Knowing that it was the intention of the Constitution to make the President completely independent of the Federal Legislature, I well remember it was the object, as it is at present not only the spirit but the letter of that instrument, to give to Congress no interference in or control over the election of a President. It is made their duty to count over the votes in a convention of both Houses and for the President of the Senate to declare who has the majority of the votes so transmitted. It never was intended, nor could it have been safe in the Constitution to have given to Congress thus assembled in convention the right to object to any vote or even to question whether they were constitutionally or properly given. * * * To give to Congress even when assembled in convention a right to reject or admit the votes of States would have been so gross and dangerous an absurdity as the framers of the Constitution never could have been guilty of.

In this consideration of this subject no attention has been given to the twenty-second joint rule. All of the legislation and action with regard to the States lately in rebellion, since 1861, has been legislation founded on or growing out of a state of war. It was a legislation of its own kind, and to meet the supposed existing necessities of a condition of war, or one resulting therefrom. It is not necessary to refer to that specifically here. If the twenty-second joint rule were ever a constitutional rule, it has, at least, no existence now. In the face of the almost unanimous vote to that effect in the United States Senate, comprising the most distinguished leaders of both political parties, it is not presumed any one will seriously contend otherwise. I fully agree with the remarks, in this connection, of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] upon the character of this legislation, if it be called such, and its results.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I believe, in the face of my oath of fealty to the Constitution, that I cannot support this bill. If the President of the Senate has not the power he exercised for nearly three quarters of a century succeeding the establishment of the Constitution—a sacred instrument which has been able to carry itself and this country through perils the like of which the history of nations does not reveal—surely the Congress has it not. If it has such powers as have been contended for, they are, from the very necessity of their being, judicial powers, and cannot be delegated. If it be dangerous to trust one man with such authority, for whose improper exercise thereof a dreadful penalty awaits, how much vaster and more probable the danger when that one man is to be selected, as it were, by the hazard of a die, and under no authority of law whatever. Sir, it is in the dark, impenetrable future that this bill sows the wind to reap the whirlwind. The distrust and collapse of business that is over us and around us is the result of years of shuffling with dangers, just as this bill proposes now to do, until they had grown into all the terrors of war. I find the patriotism of the democratic party, as far as this bill is concerned, to consist in the chance it affords to undo the results of an election duly decided in November last. As a member of this House, sworn to obey the Constitution, I cannot join in such a feast, and deeply as I regret it, and humiliated as I almost feel at not being able to view the subject as many able men have done, I shall obey the dictates of my conscience and vote against the bill.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF E. W. LEAVENWORTH,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877—

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. Mr. Speaker, deeply as I am impressed with the gravity of the subject now brought to our consideration and portentous as may be the consequences hanging upon our decision, I do not propose to myself at this late period of the debate the discussion of the various constitutional questions which the subject presents. The ablest constitutional lawyers in each House have presented their views at length and the subject may with great propriety be regarded as exhausted. No new light can be extracted from the history of the past, no new facts can be brought forward, and the various points presented will scarcely be more strongly fortified by any weight of argument hereafter to be offered.

But it is a privilege granted by the courtesy of the Houses, and one of which I think it a duty to avail myself briefly, to spread upon the record the reasons which impel me to give my support to the bill now pending before us. I feel the more strongly urged to do so for the reason that I entertain grave objections to two provisions of the bill. I desire to set forth the reasons which still induce me to give it my support.

The constitutionality of clothing the committee of fifteen with the power to make decisions upon questions growing out of the counting of the votes which are binding upon this House against our convictions and against our votes seems strongly to encroach upon powers which, under the Constitution, this House can confer upon no other body. It is certainly a very near approach to giving to the committee the power to count the votes and declare the result. But in a matter of this overshadowing importance I am not willing to set up my own judgment upon a question of constitutional law against that of the oldest and ablest constitutional lawyers of both parties and in each House. I yield my own opinion to their more full and mature consideration of the subject and their better judgment.

The other serious objection which I have to the bill arises from the fact that the commission have the power given them to go behind the regular certificates of the electors, authenticated in conformity to the law, and investigate any and all questions affecting the legality of the elections in the several States. Nothing could induce me to give my assent to any law, whatever public necessity might demand, which embodied such a flagrant violation of the sovereignty of the States and was in such direct antagonism to the great fundamental principles on which the electoral colleges are founded but the most unhesitating conviction that no five respectable lawyers can anywhere be found, and least of all five judges of the highest legal tribunal known to our laws, who, acting under the solemn obligation of their oaths, will hold that either this House or both Houses of Congress combined can go behind the certificates and investigate the legality of the elections held in the several States. To hold that the duly authenticated certificates of the electors are not final and conclusive, and can be set aside by Congress by any investigation into the conduct and character of the elections in the States, would alone be fatal to the very existence of the Republic for any prolonged period. No such doctrine can ever prevail and no five judges will ever indorse it.

What, then, is now the peculiar condition of affairs which renders this or some similar law an indispensable necessity? A presidential election was held on the 7th day of last November. The electors from the several States of the Union have sent in their certificates, and we are rapidly drawing near to the day when, under the Constitution, it will be the duty of somebody to count them. But how is this most important act in the making of a President to be performed? Shall the two Houses meet together and shall the President of the Senate, in their presence, open all the certificates, decide all the questions which we know will grow out of the duplicate certificates, count such as he shall decide in favor of, and then declare the result? Shall all these grave questions, shall the final result of this warmly-contested election, which for nearly three months past has agitated every community in the nation from the Atlantic to the Pacific, be decided by one man? And shall he so decide with an overwhelming majority of the members of each House believing that he has no power to do so? Would an election thus secured ever be satisfactory to this nation? Would any honorable, patriotic citizen be willing to accept an office thus obtained? Has the Vice-President any such right conferred upon him by the provisions of the Constitution? Allow me, Mr. Speaker, for a few moments to examine this all-important question, for this is one of the two great questions which divide the friends and the opponents of this bill.

First. No Vice-President has ever claimed that he was clothed with any such power by virtue of the Constitution. It does not appear, by all the records of the past, that he has ever asserted such a right. On the contrary, when this very question of the admissibility of the vote of Wisconsin arose, in 1857, Mr. Mason, of Virginia, then President of the Senate, again and again in the most emphatic language disclaimed any such power.

Second. A very large majority of the members of each House are, after the most mature reflection, fully satisfied that he has no such power, and would therefore never permit its exercise.

Third. No Congress which has been assembled within these walls has ever given its assent to any such proposition.

Fourth. This whole subject has been repeatedly before Congress and has been fully considered and discussed by many of the ablest statesmen who have ever given dignity and character to the American Congress. But neither the bill of 1800, which received the assent of John Marshall and of a large number of the very men who framed the Constitution, nor that of 1824, which was reported in this House by the ablest constitutional lawyer which this country has ever produced—the immortal Webster—and which received the assent of another eminent lawyer and statesman—Martin Van Buren—nor the law of 1876, which received the approval of every republican Senator except three, and also that of the distinguished Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] conferred any such power upon the Vice-President, but all by common consent ignored and repudiated it. Can any stronger evidence than this of the uniform sentiment of the best minds in the country, both in the past and in the present, be found?

Fifth. The language of the Constitution itself confers no such power. No fair reasonable construction of the language can extract from it any such right. On the contrary, it is a substantial denial of the right. It provides in so many words that the Vice-President shall "open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted." Now no body of men ever assembled on this continent who understood the precise meaning of words more accurately than the framers of the Constitution. Never was their significance more carefully weighed. Now, is it possible that such a body of men could have intended to invest the Vice-President with the greatest, the most responsible power ever conferred upon any citizen of the Republic, the power substantially to elect the President of these States by such language as this? Can any person in the perfect possession of his cool, unbiased judgment doubt that, had such been their intention, the language would have been substantially this: He shall "open all the certificates and then shall count the votes?" Can any gentleman attribute to that body such profound ignorance of the language or such gross carelessness in its use in an instrument of such immeasurable importance as the Constitution of these States as the construction claimed by the opponents of this bill would necessarily imply?

But farther, will honorable gentlemen claim that such a vast power shall or can be implied from the language of the Constitution? There is not one word on which such a construction can hang. There is absolutely nothing from which it can be implied. There is no intimation of the slightest kind as to the person or body by whom or by which the count shall be made. Why then give it to the Vice-President? Why not to Congress? Congress has always exercised this power. The Vice-President has in times past counted the votes only under joint rules of the two Houses. From them he has derived his power. He has not done it by virtue of any constitutional provision, but under the joint rules from time to time adopted by the Houses.

But even if the Constitution had in so many words given to the Vice-President the power to count the votes, as well as to open the certificates, it would by no means follow that he could arrogate to himself the right to decide a question as to their admissibility. To open the certificates and count the votes are ministerial acts; to decide upon the reception or rejection of the vote of a sovereign State of this Union, on the great question of the election of a President, is a judicial act of the most solemn character and of the very highest importance. True the votes cannot be counted until their admissibility has been passed upon; but the language supposed would still leave the main question just where it now stands, and would leave the power in the hands of Congress.

Sixth. During the year 1865, the now celebrated twenty-second joint rule was adopted by the two Houses of Congress, and continued in full force until three Presidents had been counted in under it. That rule expressly recognizes the power of Congress over all questions growing out of the counting of the electoral votes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with all these facts spread out before us, with a perfectly uniform construction given to this clause of the Constitution for almost one hundred years, and with a uniform practice in harmony with such construction, it must now be settled, if it ever can be except by an amendment to the Constitution, that the power to decide all questions growing out of the counting of the electoral vote is, and of right out to be, vested in the two Houses of Congress.

Such being the state and condition in which the subject rests, it becomes at once a matter of anxious inquiry, in what manner are we now to provide for the counting of the electoral votes?

It is quite clear to every gentleman before me that the two Houses can neither agree upon any joint rule, or any law under which the votes can be counted. The Constitution fails to give any hint as to the mode in which the count shall be made. Every effort which has been made thus far in our history to enact into a law clear and definite rules to govern in all the exigencies which may arise in the performance of this delicate duty have thus far failed. At this late hour we find ourselves far out at sea, without a compass or a chart to guide our way and insure our safety, and the storm rapidly approaching; shall we encounter it in this helpless condition, with no provision against its fury, and reckless of the consequences which may follow? or shall we, like cool, prudent, and wise men, make the best provision in our power to escape from the dangers which threaten us?

What mode of escape do the opponents of this bill hold out to us? Have they any bill to offer? Do they propose any joint rule under which we shall proceed? Has any feasible politic course whatever been suggested by any one of the very able gentlemen in either House who opposed the bill? Or do they blindly leave us to our fate, drifting helplessly down the rapid, dangerous stream, with the roar of the approaching cataract already sounding in our ears? Is any gentleman so deaf that he cannot hear that ominous roar? Is anyone so heedless that he will not listen to it?

We are all aware of the wide difference of opinion existing in the two parties in regard to the power of the Houses in the counting of the votes. Should we meet for that purpose, without any rule to guide us previously agreed upon, a fatal division must necessarily ensue. And what result would so naturally follow from it; what, indeed, so inevitable as the election of a President by each House of Congress? What a spectacle would this be to present to the world; what a disgrace to the Republic; what pain and mortification would it give to every friend of his country, to every admirer of our institutions throughout the civilized world! How would the confidence of the world be shaken in the strength and stability of our Government. But beyond, and even above all this, serious as it is, what doubts and uncertainties would fill every mind; what confusion and agitation would spread with lightning speed to every hamlet in the land; what bitter animosities would spring forth from day to day! The present appalling depression, which paralyzes every branch of industry throughout our broad country, would be only the prelude to other and greater calamities which no wisdom can foresee and no power can prevent.

In view of dangers like these, Mr. Speaker, I cannot hesitate for a moment in the decision which I make. The oath which I have taken, and the duty which I owe to the country independent of all oaths, compel me to elect that course which conducts the country in safety and honor to a peaceful and satisfactory result. The bill now before the House will secure this end, and all good citizens, East and West, North and South, will gladly bow to the final decision. Any other course will plunge us into a vortex of folly, if not of ruin.

And now, Mr. Speaker, before closing these hasty remarks I desire to call the attention of those of my political friends who oppose this bill to the very peculiar and embarrassing situation in which they are placed.

They propose no bill or rule as a substitute for the one now before the House; they suggest no way of escape from our dangers. If this bill does not become a law, we must count the votes with no other light than that which the Constitution sheds upon the subject. Shall the Vice-President decide the question which of the two certificates from Louisiana shall be counted? That is impossible. With two-thirds of each House denying his power to do so, it can never be attempted. Why, only last year not only did all the republican Senators but three vote for Mr. MORTON'S bill utterly ignoring any constitutional right in the President of the Senate to decide these great questions, but even Mr. FERRY himself, now President of the Senate, is found among the number of those thus voting. Shall he insist on his right to count the votes?

Shall the two Houses decide the question, then? We all know full well that they will disagree on that very question, as well probably as on some others of a similar kind. Shall the Senate insist that the votes of the three disputed States shall be counted, and thus elect Messrs. Hayes and Wheeler notwithstanding their rejection by the House? Is this the ground on which my political friends who oppose this bill are to stand? And can they, can the republican party stand there?

It should not be forgotten that in 1865 when the twenty-second joint rule was adopted the republican party had a large majority in each branch of Congress. This rule was their exposition of this very constitutional provision which we are now discussing. They have put themselves and their party on the record on these very questions. The twenty-second joint rule ignores all power in the Vice-President to decide on the admissibility of an electoral vote, and provides further that no vote can be counted without the concurrent action of both Houses. Mr. MORTON'S bill of last year, so unanimously voted for by the republican Senate, contains the same provisions.

We have now the President of the Senate. Shall the republican party for that reason invest him with this great power? Suppose for a moment that the President of the Senate was now a democrat; how many of those now so clamorous that he shall count in Messrs. Hayes and Wheeler would then urge his right to do so? Such sudden and radical changes as these ill become the republican party. They are the peculiar privilege of our democratic friends, and we ought never to encroach upon their well-earned rights. No somersault in politics is so low, none so high, but they can make it without the slightest danger to their party or themselves.

They can rise on this floor and for weeks attempt to justify and uphold the most naked and flagitious usurpation which this country has ever witnessed—the election of a Legislature for the State of Kansas by raiders and interlopers from the State of Missouri—and when the occasion which required it has passed, they can acknowledge and condemn it as freely as their opponents.

They can in like manner and by like means attempt to defend and uphold that great historic fraud and villainy the Lecompton constitution, and when the necessity for so doing has gone by they can turn round and denounce it as abhorrent to all that is honest or decent.

They could exhaust the vocabulary of vituperation and abuse to find words sufficiently bitter and debasing to express their feelings of contempt and hatred for the great benefactor of modern times. But now, when the whole world is vocal with his praise, they too can sing peans to his honor.

They could denounce in bitterest language and oppose with all their power in each of these Houses the last three great amendments to the Constitution; they could in every State of this Union resist and denounce them and vote unanimously against them; and to-day they can make them a fundamental plank in all their State and national platforms.

But where would such an exhibition of duplicity and inconsistency leave the republican party? We must not forget that we have behind us a constituency who not only read and think, but they act also accordingly to their maturest convictions. They require at our hands in the administration of the affairs of the country capacity, integrity, and consistency. When we fail in either particular, we forfeit their confidence and are held to a strict accountability. We cannot give one construction to the Constitution to-day and another and different one to-morrow, as the exigencies of the passing hour and the wants of the party may seem for the occasion to require.

The republican party can stand alone upon the rock of eternal truth and justice; but, standing on that immortal foundation, she may defy all the assaults of her enemies, and stand forever. The power of political tempests may sometimes disturb her equilibrium, but she will safely ride out every storm and remain still in the future as she has been in the past the salvation, the sheet-anchor of the country.

Truth, crush'd to earth, shall rise again,
The eternal years of God are hers;
But Error, wounded, writhes with pain,
And dies among his worshipers.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN T. HARRIS,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, varied have been the experiments and terrible the results in the effort of mankind to inaugurate that form of government best calculated to establish society upon a firm basis, and that rights essential to the protection and enjoyment of all should be sufficiently guarded and protected. Back to the prehistoric ages the struggle between the despotic few and the oppressed many illustrates all the movements of mankind. Since the dawn of Christian civilization the tendency of the mass has been upward. Their processes have been slow but sure. And while the reactionary principle in every great era has been represented, yet whenever principles of freedom have gained recognition, though they may for a while be obscured, they are never lost. If the lessons of history, either ancient or modern, are to be our guide, we must always avoid that class of men who when troubles surround us either arrogate to themselves or seek to confer on others extraordinary powers. For in state and church convulsions history teaches us that the most violent and most extreme have always been the most ambitious and the least patriotic.

Society has always been divided into two elemental forces. The one believing that mankind was not capable of self-government; the other contending against despotic assertion. In the past, in the slow movements of human advancement, the first class have used every bad instrument to perpetuate their theories. Under the Roman government the citizen held his thousands in bondage and proclaimed his government the freest in the world. So with the Spartan when the helot was made the victim of the fury of the young men to educate them to valor sufficient to contend against more dangerous enemies. While the civilization of to-day would not tolerate the Roman helot, there yet remains a reactionary force in society that scouts the power and the rights of the people and magnify themselves by self-contemplation into an importance they will never in the future secure. Without reason and not acknowledging equality, they proclaim that the people ought not to rule. But they are not of the people, and therefore assume in themselves the right to rule. The Mohammedan says "God is God and Mohammed is his prophet." This class say the people are dogs and we are their rulers.

Another, and perhaps the most powerful element to the injury of society, has sprung from the disposition of the governing classes to solve the question who shall govern and how shall the people be governed. The welfare of mankind has not been their guiding-star. Personal interest, the promotion of self, or the permanent establishment of certain families in the line of promotion, has done much toward retarding the will of the people in the attainment of the perfection of human government. With that class no government was good unless it recognized them as its rulers; hence from the beginning the world has been almost in constant turmoil and strife, and as the result government after government has been overthrown, society has been disturbed, and the perfection of civilization retarded.

The government of England from the stability and comparative permanence of her institutions has received the appellation of "the fast-anchored isle." From the first Roman invasion until to-day her history is full of instruction; for it shows the perils and the suffering through which mankind must pass in their struggle for liberty. Her soil has almost countless times been enriched by the blood of the foreign invader. Internecine wars have raged throughout her whole extent. Religious factions, petty despots, and contending chiefs have all preyed on the progenitors of the present Englishman. His knowledge, conservatism, and love of liberty have been purchased by the sufferings of centuries. While she is kind to those that inhabit her island, our rebellion resulted from her unwillingness to extend the same blessings to her own children. The right of self-government was asserted and won by us, our independence established, and a great nation is developed where a century since a wilderness, over which the Indian was the sole monarch, existed.

Mr. Speaker, let us look to our own Government for a moment. There is not one foot of territory in the United States now under control of its original government. England, France, and Spain each exercised jurisdiction over a part of the territory now within our limits. As every people think they are the best and their ancestors were the wisest and purest people that ever lived, so we think of ours. Yet, Mr. Speaker, they were but men at last, and had their ambitions and that desire implanted in the human heart to govern and not be governed. The stamp act of the mother country was grievously complained of, and the next year it was repealed. So in 1767 an act was passed imposing heavy duties on the colonies. Complaint and remonstrance went forth, and in 1770 the duties were remitted on everything except tea and the government of England made arrangements to import that to America direct from India so that it would be cheaper here than even in England. But this abated not the feeling of the leading men of the colonies. They had conceived the idea of freeing themselves from the mother country by throwing off the tyrannical yoke, and nothing less than that would satisfy them; hence cargoes of tea were seized in the harbors of Boston, New York, and Annapolis and thrown overboard. Preparations were everywhere made to resist the acts of England, then becoming more tyrannical and oppressive each day. The result the world's history tells—a republican government deriving its power from the consent of the governed; thus another signal illustration of the determination of man not to be governed, but to govern.

Let us for a moment retrospect in regard to the United States. In 1783 we made peace with England, and in 1789 we established our present form of government. In 1812 we had a war with England, in 1846 a war with Mexico, and in 1861 a war among ourselves, to say nothing of our Indian wars. Thus, Mr. Speaker, our new Republic had three wars in less than a century.

But, sir, the point to which I am coming is this: Since the organization of society and the formation of government among men there never has been a more critical moment in the history of any people than the present is with us.

It is then, sir, the duty of the Representatives of the people to rise to the importance of the occasion and apply the remedy ere it be too late. I know to see the danger afar off and seek to avert it is often only provocative of ridicule. If no means are used to preserve the country and its destruction follow, then an injured people have a right to complain of those who were unfaithful sentinels on the watch-tower. If patriotism, and not selfishness, control the hour and preserve the country in peace, then the selfish and bigot will say there had never been danger. Let that be as it may, we have high duties to perform; and, not looking to the right or the left, should fearlessly discharge them.

Sir, if we wait until the crisis is upon us, it is then too late. Let one drop of blood be spilled by military authority at this capital, and the country from Maine to California will be under arms and become a common battle-field, not such a one as that in which Louis XIV said he would engage when he exclaimed, "If I must needs fight, I will war against my enemies, not my children," but one in which father will be arrayed against son, son against father, brother against brother, and neighbor against neighbor, with no dividing lines to mark the home or the territory of either.

Mr. Speaker, who believed in January, 1861, that such a war was then in the near future? I was a member of the Thirty-sixth Congress and I remember well how the idea of a serious war was laughed at. The country remembers it. My friends from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR and Mr. SINGLETON,] the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] and the gentleman now from New York, then from Ohio, [Mr. COX,] the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] and myself were the only members of that Congress who are members of this; and they, I know, remember it. We all remember if any one ventured to express the opinion that the country was approaching a revolution he was regarded as a croaker and ridiculed for his anxiety. The country remembers the memorable words of Mr. Lincoln en route to this city to be inaugurated, "nobody hurt," by which he meant to convey the idea, and which was so understood by the people, that there would be no war.

Again, sir, after Sumter was reduced, when the President of the United States called for 75,000 men the news was received by the Montgomery congress with derisive laughter. How the North thought those troops would end the war then begun in ninety days, and how Mr. Davis said after the first battle at Manassas that the war was over. Yet the war was not over, but went on, on like a mighty wave, swelling as it rolled, until it swept over the fairest and best country on earth. Day by day the sun rose in all his splendor, not to witness a bright and happy people enjoying the blessings which God had so bountifully bestowed on them, but to behold the dread calamity of war, of armies marching and counter-marching; men of a common ancestry, bound together by a common interest, forgetting God bade them to love one another, seeking the destruction of human life and of all else that makes man happy. Month followed month, new year after new year greeted us, ushered in by the good on bended knee with thanks to God for the past and prayers for the future, but peace came not. War with its "grim-visaged front" continued to desolate our fair land for four long and weary years, carrying in its train all the horrors to which human nature can be subjected. War seldom comes when both parties anticipate it. It generally comes when neither does. But few people would willingly plunge their country into revolution if the result could be foreseen. Wars occur generally because each side thinks the other will not fight, and so thinking one side presses its opinions and views until it cannot recede and the other will not. Hence both are disappointed and conflict follows, and the poor and innocent people who took no part in its inception must bear all the horrors attending the greatest curse on earth to man. This day and hour, Mr. Speaker, we stand on the verge of that great calamity. God grant to this Congress the wisdom and patriotism to avert it. Will they be equal to the momentous occasion, and will they, like men and patriots, come to the rescue of their country and save all of earth that is worth living for? Will they preserve "peace on earth and good will toward men," with laughing mothers and prattling babes and happy homes, or will they turn this our beloved country into a charnel house and a land of desolation, with weeping mothers and homeless orphans? God spare us this calamity.

Mr. Speaker, on the 7th day of November, 1876, the people of the United States assembled at their respective places of voting to select a President and Vice-President to preside over our destinies for four years. The democratic party claim that their candidates, Tilden and Hendricks, were duly elected by the qualified voters for the offices respectively of President and Vice-President, while the republican party claim that their chosen leaders were duly elected under the forms of the law. Hence Hon. Mr. HEWITT, chairman of the national committee of the former, issues his proclamation announcing the triumph of the democratic candidates, and Mr. Chandler, the chairman of the republican committee, announces the triumph of the candidates of the party he represents. Here is an issue, square and unqualified, made between the two great parties of this country. How is it to be decided? The Constitution says the electors of the several States shall vote by ballot and shall place the same under seal directed to the President of the Senate, who shall open the certificates in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, when the votes shall be counted. The failure of the Constitution to say by whom to be counted produces all the trouble. If it had added that the President of the Senate was to count and adjudicate, or had said the two Houses should count and adjudicate, then the present difficulty would not exist. But the Constitution, being silent on that important point, leaves the whole question open for construction. The republicans, as a party, take the ground that the President of the Senate has the right to open and count the vote; while the democrats claim his powers are only ministerial, and that he can only open the certificates in the presence of the two Houses, who must proceed to count and adjudicate the vote. Here is an irreconcilable conflict which must be settled or the peace of the country is endangered and free institutions imperiled. If we drift along until the 14th of February without any agreement between the two Houses as to the mode of proceeding, when the disputed States are reached, the two Houses failing to concur, a double-headed President, it seems to me, is inevitable. Every democratic governor will declare for Tilden and Hendricks, and every republican governor for Hayes and Wheeler. The contest will be transferred from the Halls of Congress to the States. In democratic States the effort of the republicans will be to overthrow the lawful governments, and in republican States the effort of the democrats will be to overthrow the lawful governments. An internecine conflict will be precipitated the horrors of which are past human comprehension, and these institutions which we profess to love and have sworn to protect will become the first victim of the fury of party.

Sir, the remark is often made, "Tilden is fairly elected," followed by the question, "Why don't you inaugurate him?" My answer is: Sir, I agree with the assertion that Tilden is fairly elected, and if the democratic House had the power to inaugurate him it would be done promptly when the time arrives. But while the House denies the right of the Senate alone to count in the President it has never claimed that right for itself independent of the Senate. The democrats claim that the two Houses acting together can do it but neither can do it separately. The question is again asked, "Why do you not adhere to the old rules and count Tilden in as other Presidents have been?" The answer is, the old rules require the assent of both Houses, and the Senate will not give their assent; consequently we cannot proceed under the precedents. The Constitution says when there is no election by the people the House of Representatives shall proceed to elect, voting by States. At this point who is to judge when there is no election by the people? In the present contest both parties claim there is an election by the people. If this be true, then the House as a House has no right to elect, for it can only do so when the people have failed. As I said, who is to judge and determine when there is no election by the people? In 1801 and 1825 the President of the Senate, for and in behalf of both Houses, announced there was no election by the people and that the House would proceed under the Constitution to elect one. Does any sane man believe we could ever get such declaration now? Would the Senate ever agree that there had been no election by the people and thus devolve on the House the election? Then the result would be the Senate without regard to the House would declare Mr. Hayes elected, and the House without the concurrence of the Senate would proceed to elect Tilden. Thus we would have two Presidents. The 4th of March would come and with it the present Executive and Mr. Hayes. The latter would be sworn in and return to the White House under the escort of General Grant. What next? Mr. Hayes would at once convene his Senate and send in the names of his Cabinet, whose appointment would be confirmed. The sun on the 4th day of March would go down with Mr. Hayes in the White House, with a full cabinet, with the Army, Navy, and all the branches of the Government under his command. Mr. Tilden would take the oath of office somewhere, either in Washington or in New York. He would have no Senate to confirm his appointments. He would be powerless unless he could find some legal mode of getting into the office or accomplish the same end by the sword. If there be any other mode than war of contesting the right to the Presidency in such a case I have not been able to find it.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, it may be said this is talking too plainly. I do not think so. We ought to look events in the face and speak freely in regard to them. We cannot, if we would, conceal our purpose from the opposite party no more than they can conceal theirs from us. Unless there is an agreement, they know their plan to count Hayes in by the Senate, and they know equally as well that the democrats of the House will declare Mr. Tilden elected by the peop'e or proceed to elect him under the Constitution. They see the issue which would follow as well as we and know as little of the ultimate result. In this condition of affairs we would have two Presidents. One or the other must ignominiously give way, or resort to that most horrible of all arbiters, the sword. When that period arrives we would really have no President. The whole country would be a military camp, the musket and bayonet would be the law of the land, and after many years of toil, strife, and the loss of all dear to mankind we might bring form out of chaos with a dismembered country and petty States ruled by military dictators. Whenever the time arrives that the people are compelled to resort to arms to inaugurate the President that will be the end of our Government, and thereafter if we should ever have another popular election the inauguration would turn on force and would not be determined by law.

Mr. Speaker, when that time arrives—I say it here and now and after due deliberation—the sooner our form of government is changed the better. If fraud, false returns, and a subversion of the will of the people are to be enforced at the point of the bayonet, and there can be found no peaceable and honorable solution of the trouble, then let republican government in America be reckoned among the things that were and some other form substituted in its stead. Let the Stars and Stripes be buried beneath the tree of liberty and our national pass-words be "Vive l'empereur," or "Long live the king." Any government which respects the rights of persons and property is better than a republican government upheld by fraud and sustained by force.

Mr. Speaker, the Government of the United States with all its imperfections is the grandest structure ever devised by the wisdom of man for the liberty of the citizen and the enlightenment of mankind, and should not be abandoned while there is a hope of perpetuating it in its original purity. Let not unscrupulous and ambitious men destroy it. Ambition, the ambition to rule, has been the curse and cause of the downfall of all governments. "By ambition the angels fell." Then, ere it be too late, let us seize the helm of the old ship and steer her to a port of safety. In the language of the Delphic oracle to the lawgiver of Athens:

> Seize, seize the helm, the reeling vessel guide,
> With aiding patriots stem the raging tide.

Let us reason, then, while we can. In revolution men never reason; it is passion at whose shrine they worship. In this emergency, then, we would be false to constitutional liberty, false to the people we represent, and false to ourselves did we fail to adopt some plan to solve the difficulty. The situation is above party, and I would hold myself forever disgraced did I not resort to every honorable expedient in my power to avert the calamities impending.

Sir, I believe Tilden and Hendricks are honestly elected; yea, I know it as well as we can know any historical fact, and but for the obstacles in the way of ascertaining that fact and in their inauguration, and to which I have referred, I should never submit to any plan of procedure by the possibility of which the will of the people could be defeated. But under our form of government, and the omission in the Constitution to define who are to count and adjudicate the electoral votes, it has enabled a great conspiracy to produce the necessity of some adjustment or plunge the country into revolution. Either alternative is bad enough, but of the two I prefer the former and shall govern myself accordingly.

Mr. Speaker, early in the session the two Houses appointed the usual joint committees to report a mode of proceeding in counting the electoral vote. This has been done at every recurring presidential election since the adoption of the Constitution. These committees, recognizing the gravity of the occasion and the great responsibility resting on them, labored arduously, zealously, and faithfully to devise some plan by which the honor of both political parties could be preserved, the integrity of the Union maintained, and the rights of each political party referred to as fair and as impartial an arbiter as it is possible. The result of their labors is the bill now under consideration. It was the work of great minds and patriotic hearts. They gave the whole subject the most thorough and searching investigation, and the country owes them a debt of gratitude. The merits of the compromise have been discussed in an able and exhaustive manner. I could add nothing for public instruction in regard to it, and, inspired by the conviction that I am performing the most solemn duty of my life, I give the measure a grateful and hearty support.

None regret more than myself that the dread contingency has exposed one of the weaknesses of republican institutions. But, sir, if we under the forms of the Constitution and in pursuance of its spirit safely pass the breakers that now environ us, we have assured safety for another and a more glorious centennial, when our children's children shall with pride point to the past and the men who by their wisdom and patriotism rose above the passions of the hour and transmitted to them unimpaired the blessing that had been handed to us by our forefathers. Many a man now insignificant will then be on the roll of glory, and all history will be illuminated by our action with the conclusive refutation of that assertion of despots that mankind are incapable of self-government.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. WM. R. BROWN,

OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. BROWN, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, recognizing the magnitude of the crisis which called into existence the joint committee on the electoral count, and the integrity, patriotism, and great ability of the members of that committee, I came to the consideration of this measure with my predilections all in its favor and with the expectation that I should give it my hearty support. I therefore sincerely regret that a consideration of the bill and its provisions present to my mind such serious objections that I cannot give it my sanction; and while there is a universal demand on the part of the people for a speedy and harmonious settlement of the presidential question, this bill seems to me to present a remedy worse than the disease which it is designed to cure.

The provisions of this bill are substantially as follows:

First. That the two Houses of Congress shall meet together in convention on the first Thursday in February, 1877, with the President of the Senate as presiding officer.

Second. That the returns from the several States shall then be opened, and they read by the tellers.

Third. That such returns from States where there is but one set of returns shall then be counted unless objection be made in writing by at least one Senator and one Representative, and that when such objection be made the Senate and House of Representatives act on the question separately, but that no such vote be rejected without the concurrent action of the two Houses.

Fourth. That in case there are two sets of returns from any State, such returns shall be submitted to a commission consisting of five Representatives elected vira voce by the House, five Senators to be chosen in the same manner by the Senate, and four associate justices of the Supreme Court designated in the bill, and one associate justice to be chosen by the other four in such manner as they may determine. And the decision of this tribunal shall be final unless overruled by the concurrent action of the two Houses of Congress.

The Constitution of the United States provides in reference to the count of the electoral vote as follows:

> The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

There is no statement as to who shall count the votes; no provision that they shall be counted either by the President of the Senate or by the Senate and House of Representatives, but merely that they shall then be counted; but taking the language together, and especially viewing it in the light of contemporaneous interpretation, I have no doubt that the framers of the Constitution intended that that duty be performed by the President of the Senate. Let any one read the proceedings of the constitutional convention, the recommendation that the first Senate elect a presiding officer to count the vote, the proceedings of that Senate, and the certificate of election given by its presiding officer elected for the sole purpose of counting that vote, and the conclusion seems inevitable that the intention was to intrust the whole machinery for the determination as to who was elected President and Vice-President to the presiding officer of the Senate; and the whole course of proceeding for nearly forty years thoroughly sustains this view. These authorities have been so often presented to the House that I need not repeat them. Probably the framers of the Constitution in making this provision never anticipated such a state of affairs as that we now witness. The choice of electors was left to the States. They were to be appointed in such manner as the Legislatures of the States should determine. They were virtually State, not Federal officers, and hence the duty intended to be intrusted to the President of the Senate was almost purely ministerial, the mere counting of the votes of electors, the validity of which was to be settled by the laws of the several States. It was intrusted to the President of the Senate because he holds one of the most important offices in the gift of the nation, being usually the Vice-President, elected at the same time as the President of the United States then holding the office, or if not, elected by the most conservative of the two Houses of Congress, that which was intended especially to represent the sovereignty of the States.

A student of the Constitution cannot fail to observe the extreme care and anxiety of its framers to keep distinct the several departments of the Government, to make the legislative, judicial, and executive as far as possible independent, so that neither can be destroyed or impaired by the encroachments of the others; and hence we can readily see why, instead of being intrusted to Congress, this count is intrusted to a high officer like the Vice-President; and when we remember the dignity of the position, and that he like all others to whom responsible duties are intrusted is liable to punishment for any unwarranted or criminal action, the power of impeachment being vested in Congress, we cannot wonder that he was selected for this high and responsible duty. In the absence of law, I believe he must count the votes. But can this authority be changed by law? The language of the Constitution is indefinite in failing to state who shall count. Congress has the power to make needful laws to carry out the provisions and intent of the instrument, and I am not disposed to deny that Congress may by statute provide how this count be made which is so necessary to the preservation of the instrument and the safety of the nation. But even admitting this, I have been unable to discover how this power can be vested by law anywhere else than in the President of the Senate or in Congress, and in all the debates on the subject I have found no argument which satisfies me of the power to intrust the matter to any outside party or tribunal. The power is either with the President of the Senate because the Constitution primarily places it there, or it is a power belonging to Congress, and therefore incapable of being delegated. Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, thus states the law on this point:

One of the settled maxims in constitutional law is that the power conferred upon the Legislature to make laws cannot be delegated by that department to any other body or authority. Where the sovereign power of the State has located the authority, there it must remain; and by the constitutional agency alone the laws must be made until the Constitution itself is changed. The power to whose judgment, wisdom, and patriotism this high prerogative has been intrusted cannot relieve itself of the responsibility by choosing other agencies upon which the powers shall be devolved, nor can it substitute the judgment, wisdom, and patriotism of any other body for those to which alone the people have seen fit to confide this sovereign trust.

Coming now to a consideration of the bill itself, I am glad to say there are some features of it to which I can thoroughly assent. One of these is the denial in it of the right of a single House of Congress by itself to control the count, as has been claimed by a majority of a committee of this House which has been investigating the rights and privileges of the House in this regard, and which has been so strongly and ably combated on this floor by the minority of that committee and by other able gentlemen. No power more subversive to the endurance of the Government has ever been enunciated than that the body which must elect a President in case of a failure to elect by the electoral college itself possesses the power to determine whether that contingency has happened or not, and thus make the Executive wholly dependent for his position upon one branch of Congress. I am glad this measure forever destroys that heresy and enunciates a principle at least reasonable, that a vote can never be rejected except upon the concurrent action of both Houses, each acting separately.

But to the formation of the commission provided for in this bill, with the same powers to consider certificates, votes, and papers objected to as is now possessed by the two Houses of Congress acting either together or separately, I must seriously dissent. The language of the bill itself shows it is the delegation of powers now possessed by Congress—an extraordinary and unwarranted procedure—and this not to make the commission merely advisory, and to give its opinions on legal questions, but making its decisions absolutely final unless overruled by the concurrent action of the two Houses of Congress, which can never take place while their political complexion is antagonistic. This commission is formed, not on account of the impartiality and fairness of its members, not on account of its legal ability, but in order to get a tribunal in reference to which both parties are completely in the dark. It seems in its very composition an admission that there can be no legal settlement of the questions involved, and that in order to maintain tranquillity they shall be submitted to a tribunal in reference to which all are in complete ignorance. It is the submission of the gravest of all possible questions, one in which more than forty millions of people are directly interested, to the result of fortune and chance. How is this commission formed? The two Houses of Congress, opposed politically, each choose five members, who will be evenly divided in reference to their politics. Four associate judges of the Supreme Court are designated, who are known to be divided in a similar manner. To these four are intrusted the selection of the fifth, who will virtually control the commission. Seven democrats, seven republicans, and a fifteenth man. How shall he be chosen, by vote or by chance? Will he be chosen on account of his fitness, of his legal acumen, or because no one knows where he stands or what are his principles?

Is it in accordance with the love of law, the supremacy of legal principles, which is the proud boast of our Anglo-Saxon race, that we thus are willing, in the hope of temporal advantage, to break loose from fixed moorings and settle the administration of the great American Republic we know not how? As a republican I believe Hayes is legally elected President; I believe the following of all precedents in reference to the count of the electoral vote will place him in the presidential chair; and while I would be willing to leave the settlement of the legal questions to a legal tribunal I cannot assent to leaving it to a purely political commission, the strongest argument in favor of which is that it is so fearfully and wonderfully constituted that both parties are unable to know how it will stand, and so both may with equal reason expect favors at its hands. To such a tribunal I am unwilling to submit such mighty interests. The machinery provided by the Constitution has been sufficient during twenty-two presidential elections, and I am not afraid to trust it for the twenty-third. If it be defective, let us like reasonable men provide a proper remedy; let us establish a tribunal, satisfactory to all, to which the legal questions may be submitted; let us provide means by which the election may be tested in the courts and judicial decision from the highest court in the Republic settle the issue. But let us not degrade ourselves by the adoption of a scheme which is of questionable constitutionality, to say the least, and is against our reason and better judgment. I am happy to say that in the defeat of this bill I cannot see the dire calamities which have been predicted. I have too much faith in the American people to believe that any party will rush to arms and attempt the destruction of the Government because it has failed to elect the President of its choice. One attempt of that kind will, I believe, suffice for this century; and, come what will, I believe in the perpetuity of our institutions and that the United States will continue still to live, unchanged and undivided, the greatest of republics.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF WILLIAM E. SMITH,

OF GEORGIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. SMITH, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I cannot get my consent to vote for this bill, notwithstanding the many and seemingly urgent reasons for its passage. I can state my objections in a few words.

The Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land. The Government of the United States, the government of the individual States, and citizens of the United States must yield perfect obedience to this paramount law. The safety of the Union itself, the preservation of the rights of the several States as members of the Union, and the rights of citizens of the United States depend upon a faithful observance of this American Magna Charta. A strict and faithful enforcement of all its provisions securing to the Federal Government all delegated power and preserving to the States and people all reserved rights, whether expressed or implied, is all that the democratic party can and ought to claim. All that a State government can demand, all that any citizen of the United States can ask, is to have this supreme law observed and enforced, and not violated.

We of the South must follow our ancestors in supporting the Constitution. We have ever feared that the intolerant spirit and aggressive policy of the abolition party would some day break through the protection afforded us by this instrument, and thus upturn society at the South. We are witnesses to-day of a realization of this well-grounded fear. All the security we now seek is to be permitted to manage our domestic concerns in our own way, subject to the Constitution; and, while striving to hold others to a strict observance of constitutional obligations, we should be careful not to commit an act which may carry with it the semblance of a violation of any of its provisions.

This regard for the Constitution is further intensified by the fact that we of the South are suffering now, and have been suffering for the last seventeen years, from the effects of a violated and disregarded Constitution.

Many of the features of this bill meet my hearty approval. Among these I may mention the denial of the right as claimed by some for the President of the Senate to elect as between two electoral returns from the same State and to count the votes, the assumption that it is the duty and right of the Senate and House of Representatives to decide as between such returns and count the electoral vote, and the declaration that the vote of no State for President and Vice-President shall be rejected unless both Senate and House of Representatives concur in the order of rejection.

I find no difficulty in agreeing to these provisions. But while yielding a willing concurrence to so much of the bill I cannot agree to the second section. This section, among other things, provides that where more than one return is received from a State, such returns and papers shall be submitted to the judgment and decision of a commission thereinafter named, and this commission is to decide "which is the true and lawful electoral vote of such State."

This commission is to be composed of fifteen members, five from the Senate, five from the House of Representatives, and five of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

I have no opposition to make to a joint committee of both Houses, with the power in both to revise, accept, or reject any report or result of such joint committee.

I object to the introduction of these five associate justices as members of the commission, and for these reasons:

The citizens of the several States having voted for President and Vice-President, and the electors chosen by them having assembled and cast their votes, and the result of such last-mentioned voting having been placed in the hands of the President of the Senate, the next thing to be done is to count the votes.

The twelfth article of the amended Constitution of the United States declares—

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted.

I agree with the bill that the office of the President of the Senate is ministerial, and that he is excluded from participating in the count except as any other member of the Senate, if he be a Senator, and that the counting of the votes is a duty imposed by the Constitution on the two Houses of Congress.

As the President of the Senate and the two Houses of Congress are expressly named, to the exclusion of the whole world, it follows that one or the other or both concurring must count the votes for President and Vice-President.

It is claimed by a minority in Congress that the President of the Senate must discharge this duty. I deny this. But, for the sake of the argument, let it be admitted. Will any one pretend that Congress by a statute could deprive him of this right and impose this duty on another person or persons? Manifestly not. Congress itself is a creature of the Constitution, and the statutes of the United States must be in subordination and not in opposition to it.

I agree with the bill, that the President of the Senate cannot lawfully count the electoral votes, and that this duty is devolved by the Constitution on the two Houses of Congress to the complete exclusion of all other persons.

Such being the Constitution, precedent and practice, I deny to Congress the power in any way, directly or indirectly, to deprive the two Houses of the authority to count the votes for President and Vice-President. It is apparent that all acts passed by Congress to carry out the Constitution and to secure to the two Houses the power to count the electoral vote would be lawful. And those acts that have for their object the transfer of this authority to persons not in Congress would be contrary to the Constitution and therefore void.

I assume with the bill, as true, that under the Constitution the Senate and House of Representatives must count the electoral vote, and I maintain that the two Houses cannot discharge this duty by assigning it, or any part of it, to parties not members of Congress. If this be not true, then Congress can divest itself of any one or all of their constitutional powers by assigning the same to others. What would be said of a Congress that would by statute confer on the Supreme Court the power "to lay and collect taxes," &c., "to coin money," &c., "to declare war," &c., "to provide and maintain a navy?" And if Congress cannot divest itself of all or any one of these powers, neither can the Congress of the United States take from the Senate and House of Representatives the right and duty of counting the electoral vote.

I contend that the bill practically and on its face deprives the Senate and House of Representatives of the authority to count the electoral vote.

The authority to count includes ex vi termini the power to decide what shall be counted. Now, to this commission of fifteen members all disputes where "more than one return or paper purporting to be a return from a State shall have been received by the President of the Senate * * * all such returns and papers shall be submitted to their judgment and decision." * * * "Such decision shall be read and entered in the Journal of each House, and the counting of the votes shall proceed in conformity therewith, unless, upon objection made thereto in writing by at least five Senators and five Representatives, the two Houses shall separately concur in ordering otherwise, in which case such concurrent order shall govern."

It is claimed that this clause gives the two Houses authority to make the act of the commission the joint act of the two Houses. Let us see:

> The decision is to be entered in the journals of both Houses, and the counting of the votes is to proceed in conformity therewith, unless, &c.

It is clear that the decision becomes the law of the case and binds both Houses without the approval of either, without the act of either, and without a decision by either.

If all the members of the commission should concur, their judgment should not become the rule to control the counting of the votes, unless first approved by both Houses. Under this bill both Houses have given their approval in advance and without reason to know what may be the judgment of said commission as to any question submitted.

But it is claimed that objections in writing can be filed and the decision can be set aside by the concurrent order of the two Houses. In theory this is true, practically it is not. Under this bill neither House can of its own motion object to the judgment of the commission. Preliminary to any sort of objection to the judgment, both Houses are required to leave their own Halls and to solicit five members of the other legislative branch to concur therein. The House of Representatives, theoretically intended by our Constitution to represent the people of the United States, is compelled to go to the Senate, the representatives of the several States, and ask the aid of five Senators to unite with them in objecting to an obnoxious judgment; and without their aid and concurrence, not a single step can be taken. So that, although the House may be fully convinced that the judgment of the commission is an error or a fraud, this bill deprives them of the privilege of simply making a motion unless the aid of five Senators is secured. If the concurrence of five Senators cannot be obtained, the right to object, to revise, to oppose, to reject, in fine, to make the act and judgment of the commission the act and judgment of the House, is gone forever. Hence I say that the right of either House to decide between opposing election returns, while dimly retained, is so obstructed as to make it impracticable and useless.

Believing that all the powers conferred by the Constitution on the two Houses of Congress are powers to be exercised by Senators and Representatives only, I cannot consent to the introduction of persons, however pure and learned, to participate in the exercise thereof. If Congress can by statute avoid a constitutional duty and impose that duty on persons not members of Congress, why may not Congress divest itself of all constitutional power? If one duty can be assigned, every other duty can be. It is the constitutional duty of the members of the two Houses to count the electoral votes. No other number of persons can do it. No other number of persons can aid in counting them. The duty must be performed by members of Congress, and them alone. The five justices are not members of Congress. They have never been elected, never been sworn. They have no constituents; they represent no one. Congress cannot confer membership on them. And as justices their aid is not invoked, and if invoked the Constitution would deny to them the exercise of their judicial power in such a forum.

It may transpire that these five justices may elect the President. As the ten members of Congress are half republicans and half democrats it is likely that each side will insist that their party candidate is elected. The question then would have to be decided by the five justices. Two of these are democrats and two are republicans. If they should be controlled in the same manner, the fifth justice will decide the question. It will be his single act, an act binding upon Congress and performed by one who is not a member of either House, and from whose decision there is no easy appeal. The bill virtually deprives the two Houses of the right and power to count the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

This bill is entirely unnecessary. There is no cause for internal commotion. None even for alarm. There is too much virtue and patriotism in our legislators to permit the President of the Senate to usurp the power of deciding between antagonistic returns and of counting the votes. There is too much honesty and statesmanship in the republican leaders to permit the shameless frauds in Louisiana and Florida to count a candidate of any party into the presidential chair. I believe Tilden and Hendricks have been fairly elected by the American people, and that both Houses would have arrived at this conclusion. I hope the joint electoral commission may do as well.

Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

SPEECH OF HON. B. A. WILLIS,

OF NEW YORK.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 3, 1877.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4472) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes, in which was the following paragraph:

"For dies, paper, and stamps, $450,000; said engraving and printing to be done in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department, provided the cost does not exceed the price paid under existing contracts."

Mr. WILLIS proposed to offer the following amendment as a substitute for the above paragraph:

"For dies, paper, and stamps, $450,000; said engraving and printing to be done in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department, unless it can be done at less cost under private contract, the cost in no case to exceed the price paid under existing contracts.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, the clause which I propose to amend tends to extravagance, and not economy. If it becomes a law, it will intensify and aggravate an evil the most poisonous and dangerous with which our governmental system is inoculated; against which moralists and statesmen have declaimed with vain eloquence since the termination of the war. I mean the evil of patronage. I cannot understand how gentlemen here who have encountered this vice in their official experience, who have endured the annoyance incidental to office-seeking, and who have in consequence been compelled to neglect their sworn duties, can deem it proper either to propose or support a measure which would necessarily result in an increase of patronage, an increase of office-seekers, an increase of annoyance, and an increase of corruption.

This bill provides that $450,000 shall be appropriated for dies, paper, and stamps; said engraving and printing to be done in the Bureau of Engraving of the Treasury Department, provided the cost does not exceed the price paid under existing contracts. And why? Cui bonum? Because it would give employment to a few hundred persons at the national capital. This is the only statesman-like reason urged in behalf of the proposition. Supposing it would. What then? Why, it would involve the discharge of an equal number from employment elsewhere. There is no humanity in it, there is no philanthropy in it; and if there was, the Government is not an eleemosynary institution, organized for the dispensation of charities; it is simply a machine, an agency created with one function, to keep society intact and secure to the people equal benefits by the imposition of burdens to be equally borne.

There is no pretense that this provision would result in a saving to the Treasury; it provides, not that the work shall be done cheaper, but as cheap as under existing contracts, as will appear by reference to the text of the bill. But even this sentence is unfounded; it is built on unsworn estimates, made by parties interested in having the work done by the Government. There is no assurance, no guarantee that the work would be done as cheaply as the estimates state; there is every reason to believe that the cost would exceed the estimates, for not within the memory of living men has the Government undertaken an enterprise but the cost has far exceeded the specifications, whether in building ships, post-offices, or anything else.

But admitting the estimates to be true, the Government does not possess the appliances; if the Bureau should do this work it would involve an outlay of $125,000 for stamps, which have to be kept on hand.

Why, sir, was this work taken from the bureau and given out on private contract? Because the Commissioner of Internal Revenue said it operated in a saving of $75,000 per annum to the National Government. These existing contracts were made in 1874; the work has since been done by private corporations to the entire satisfaction of the Government.

How is it with the work now being done by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing? Every year a deficiency; every year employés discharged.

Why, sir, is it necessary in a democratic House of Representatives to persuade gentlemen that we should have just as little government as possible, endowed with the fewest functions possible?

Is it necessary to urge that the Government should never do anything that can be done by private enterprise?

Everything, that the Government attempts to do betrays bungling and incompetency. Even its indispensable functions are most imperfectly exercised. Let us cry a halt and set out on our mission to reform this Government, by reducing the governmental functions to the mininum; let us reduce and not re-enforce the office-holding army, now in excess of 95,000 men; let us avoid the spectacle, which we would witness, were it published to the world, that several hundred men were to be appointed in this bureau. Why sir, every member of Congress, from the pineries of Maine to the Mexican border, would be implored to exert his influence to save this man or that woman from starvation.

Washington is already crowded with mendicants and vultures. I believe in burying the carcass, known as the spoils, and now is an opportunity to begin.

But, if I am all wrong, if money can be saved by having the work done in the bureau; if the cost will be kept within the estimates; if the Government officials can be held to a responsibility as rigid as contractors under bond for faithful performance; if the Government has space to do the work, offices fitted to do the work, experts capable of doing the work; if democracy is all a lie, and the more Government we have the better; if spoils and plunder and patronage are blessings to be encouraged and multiplied; if the Government can do this engraving and printing more reasonably than private persons, by paying more wages and working fewer hours, then why object to my amendment, which provides all this work shall be done by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing unless it can be done at less cost by private contract?

Now, gentlemen, the test is applied, shall we have honest economy and true democracy or shall we canonize centralization as a cardinal virtue in a republican Government?

Internal Improvements.

SPEECH OF HON. W. S. HAYMOND,

OF INDIANA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 31, 1877,

On the bill (H. R. No. 3758) chartering a passenger railway from Lake Michigan to the southeast Atlantic seaboard.

Mr. HAYMOND. Mr. Speaker, the question of cheap transportation, which in its scope embraces not only the best devised system of commercial outlets from all important points in the interior of our broad land to the seaboard, but also the speediest and cheapest means of intercommunication between the different geographical sections of the Union, is one of first importance, and should engage the early and serious attention of Congress.

The people of the great West and northwest, who are chiefly engaged in agricultural pursuits, complain of many evils consequent upon the inadequacy and irregularities of the present means of transportation.

They demand a fair and full investigation of this subject by the representatives of the people, to the end that some practical measures may be devised to lessen the burdens that weigh so heavily upon their prosperity. While all admit that the natural commercial channels, our lakes and navigable rivers, should be utilized as far as they may be made subservient to the purpose in view, yet it is apparent that the vast bulk of our agricultural, mineral, and mechanical products can only obtain exit from the interior to the seaboard and the chief centers of trade by railroad facilities.

Since the transportation of all the productive commodities of the country must depend mainly upon the railroads, it will be proper to inquire whether the existing lines are ample and fully adapted to the purpose, and whether their management solely by corporations is favorable to cheap rates and ample accommodations, and if found not to be, what encouragement can be given under the sanction of Federal laws to increase the number and efficiency of our railroads especially adapted to the general necessities of commerce, and to what extent these new roads should be made amenable to the control of Congress. These are questions I shall discuss in their proper place as I proceed, and while doing so shall incidentally allude to one or two projected lines, which, on account of their great importance, commercial and national, deserve special mention. Public enterprise is one of the chief characteristics of the American people. It is interwoven with their civilization, and stands out in bold contrast with the extravagant follies that remain as mementoes of other nations. The rulers of Egypt enslaved her people and squandered their substance in rearing her colossal pyramids, but the American people, moved by the spirit of a higher civilization, have devoted their energies mainly to works of utility. While it may be said that the people of this country had built more miles of railway than any other in the world, indeed almost equal to the entire number of miles in all other countries, yet it cannot be said that they have too many or that they have built beyond the requirements of commerce. The vast extent of our territory, the unexampled growth of our population, the development of our varied industries, and the vast increase in our staple products, all indicate that the means of transportation are not in excess of our wants.

While we have constructed many railroads, several of which are of greatest importance, it cannot be said that we have built all the commercial lines that our varied interests demand. We have not developed a satisfactory system of railroads adequate to the requirements of cheap transportation, and such as make all necessary connections between the interior and the numerous deep-water harbors upon the Atlantic sea-coast. The facilities of communication between the interior and the States and Territories on the Pacific coast are wholly inadequate. Two or more transcontinental railways are needed to bind the east to the west and to control the commerce of the islands of the Pacific and the trade of the Orient. The vast intermediate regions of the continent, embracing our several organized Territories, and resting upon the slopes of the Rocky Mountains, which are now almost ready to seek admission into the Union as newly fledged Commonwealths, demand release from their isolation and adequate railroad connections with the great marts of trade.

While we have constructed many railways we have arrived at nothing like a comprehensive system, adapted to our increasing wants and commercial necessities. Our railways have, in the main, been the offspring of local requirements, have been projected and built in short links, altogether independent of each other, and without much regard to general commercial convenience. The defects of the system, and its incompetency to meet the wants of the people, are now clearly perceived. The jarring interests, mutual jealousies, and irregularities pertaining to the management of these corporations act as an incubus upon the leading industrial pursuits of the country. Uncertainty of reward begets inactivity and dethrones industry. However great may have been the annual products of this country, they cannot be regarded a test of its productive capacity, or a fair exhibit of what would be produced if the evils complained of were removed. Let this be done by the adoption of a well-regulated system of cheap transportation, and we will witness a vast increase in our suplus products, the creation of new sources of wealth, and renewed activity in all branches of business. The development to a higher degree of all the productive industries of the country, the utilization of its vast dormant resources, the encouragement of intercommercial pursuits, and the enlargement of its commerce abroad in all quarters of the world, are objects that should engage our serious attention.

How then can these great ends be best promoted? The solution to this question has an answer in the most efficient means to secure cheap transportation, and to extend and strengthen the ties of commercial intercourse between all sections of the Union. The channels of trade should be made ample to meet the growing necessities of the people, and as free from arbitrary restrictions as possible. Cheapness and regularity in rates without regard to season, facility in transit and equal privileges to all shippers, are conditions that should be insisted upon. In order to remedy the evils complained of, and to promote to the highest degree the general commercial interests of the country, it will be essential to invoke the exercise of national authority. No power except that of the National Government properly and discreetly exercised can ever regulate a question of so much difficulty and importance to the whole American people. I do not mean, however, to convey the idea that the General Government should enter into the business of building the railroads required, or that as a rule it should incur any risk or expense in their construction, neither do I claim that Congress should exercise any control over corporations created by State laws; but what seems to me to be sufficient for the purpose would be a system of railways built under national charters, with provisions that would protect the interests of the people and hold the companies to a strict accountability for their conduct. These roads should be constructed in a first-class and substantial manner, so as to insure safety to passengers, and the companies should be compelled to make all necessary provisions for the care, safety, and comfort of live stock received for shipment. The tracks, culverts, bridges, &c., should be subject to the inspection of Government engineers, who should be required to report from time to time upon the condition of the same, with authority to compel the companies to keep them in good repair.

The construction of two or three more transcontinental railways and perhaps half a dozen other first-class roads, leading from the chief commercial centers and distributing points in the West and Northwest—their main lines running upon tangents—to the chief deep-water harbors upon the Atlantic seaboard from New York to Mobile, would afford for a long time the desired facilities for general commercial purposes. Until such lines are built and made amenable to national authority the agricultural interests of the West, Northwest, and Southwest will suffer as they have hitherto done, from the mismanagement and rapacity of corporations that acknowledge no controlling power outside of themselves.

The proposed railway to run on the fortieth parallel of latitude, the Washington, Cincinnati and Saint Louis narrow-gauge, now commenced, and "the United States Central," to extend from Chicago, via Cumberland Gap, to the southeast Atlantic seaboard, with termini at Charleston and Port Royal, together with two or three other great lines leading from the valley of the Mississippi or Missouri, to different points upon the Atlantic, would if built under national charters constitute a system of railways by which commerce among the States could be regulated more effectively than by any other means that could be devised. These new channels of trade being made amenable to the authority of Congress, would afford the best possible facilities for cheap transportation, and their construction at an early day is demanded by the agricultural interests of the whole country.

It is a remarkable fact that upon the long line of coast from Chesapeake Bay to Florida not a single commercial city of magnitude has yet appeared. Along this coast are several excellent and commodious harbors, but the trade and business of these points have been too limited to call attention to their real importance. Why is this so? No other cause can be assigned than the fact that these harbors have not yet been accessible to the traffic from the interior. The local support is too limited to command a respectable share of the foreign trade. Steamships and other carrying vessels evade these ports because there is no steady trade to attract them thither. It is a remarkable fact also that no railroads have yet been built on direct lines between these harbors and the great distributing centers of the West. They are isolated from the productive regions of the interior, and hence receive none of the surplus products for transshipment.

Prominent among these harbors designed by nature for shipping ports are Norfolk, Wilmington, Charleston, and Port Royal. The last-named, on account of its greater depth of water and other advantages, may be justly regarded equal to any upon the Atlantic coast, or perhaps equal to any in the world. They lie in obscurity simply because no commercial channels of communication bind them to the West. Baltimore has its great road leading to the West which pours into that city a heavy traffic, and this great artery of trade has more than anything else contributed to make Baltimore a thriving commercial emporium. Philadelphia, New York, and Boston likewise have their great lines of railway which unite them with the Western States and which command an immense business. But the cities located at the harbors south of Chesapeake Bay are without such facilities, (direct connection,) and will remain as places of but little commercial importance until they are supplied with them.

We have a vast country, almost ocean-bound, spanning the continent from east to west, embracing all latitudes within the temperate zone, and divided by lofty mountain-ranges and immense lakes and broad rivers into numerous geographical divisions, each of which has peculiarities of soil, climate, and productions. All of these sections are component parts of our vast Republic, and must be forever maintained as a unit. To secure so great a political end these different geographical sections must all be favored, as nearly as practicable, with similar and equal privileges, and be cemented by commercial ties in bonds of common interest. In no other way can such a vast and diversified country be long and peaceably maintained under one flag and one Government. The peculiar adaptations of each grand division must be duly regarded and no section fostered at the expense of the others.

Though our Government has grandly entered the second century of its existence and bears the undisputed title of being the model Republic of the world, yet we should not forget that, notwithstanding our wonderful growth and prosperity, we have had strifes, contentions, and civil war. The primary causes that led to the terrible ordeal through which this nation has lately passed have not all been candidly and philosophically considered. We have not gone back to the origin and fully studied all the reasons that led to alienation of interest and sympathy between the people of different sections. Isolation and distance, deficiency in the means of intercourse, and our mountains, the stubborn barriers of nature, have also been factors connected with the question. Had this country been populated a century or two earlier even by European races it is quite probable that our mountain-chains would still mark the boundaries between hostile clans, kingdoms, or empires. It cannot therefore be regarded as a visionary notion that natural barriers, which have in our day isolated States and debarred them from social and commercial intercourse, should be regarded to a certain extent as primary causes of alienation. The maintenance of a republican government like ours at an earlier age in the world's history, over our present vast territory, would have been impracticable unless held together and governed as Rome was under her Cæsars. An advanced civilization was essential as a foundation for the existence of liberty and the maintenance of self-government, and the railway and telegraph are the titanic forces of cohesion that can cement in indissoluble ties the numerous Commonwealths of this Confederacy.

Our immense territory may be divided into six or eight grand geographical divisions, each having peculiar adaptations. Had each been colonized under different circumstances and by a separate people, it is quite probable there would have been several petty nations or kingdoms, inimical in interests, differing in religious and political tenets, and incapable and indisposed to form a common alliance. Happily no State of this Union has been populated by a peculiar people, holding to anything but American ideas and the principles, in their primitive purity, upon which this Government was founded. In the rapid aggrandizement of new territory the enterprising and dominant race of this country—that which may be styled American or Americanized—has taken possession of the soil in every locality, and planted there, in advance of all other immigration, the characteristic and controlling principles of American civilization. Population has poured in from all parts of the world and followed that which preceded it, glad to receive and become beneficiaries of the advantages offered, rather than to intrude upon or seek to revolutionize what they found so well adapted to their necessities. In this way has our country, without deviation from its original and truly American characteristics, become cosmopolitan. Without the power of steam and the rapid means of conveyance afforded by railways it is quite certain that such fortunate results could not have been achieved. It is absolutely necessary that the cohesive forces before alluded to should be made and kept commensurate with the growth of population, its expansion into new territories, and with the agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial necessities of the people.

All those forces that serve to connect, unify, and produce homogeneity of interests among the people of all sections of the Union should be constantly strengthened, otherwise the antagonizing and subtle power of disintegration will grow apace and at an unexpected time will bring us in the presence of dangers that may be difficult to avert. The late sanguinary ordeal through which this country has passed was in some measure due to the fact that the people of certain geographical sections were widely isolated from others and that the means of social and commercial intercourse between them were extremely limited and inadequate. Sectional peculiarities grew into antagonisms, conflicting interests begat strifes, and in time the alienation became so great that war ensued. We witnessed the first bold and startling expression of dissatisfaction in the celebrated South Carolina exposition of 1828, which led to nullification and the memorable imbroglio of 1833. A high protective tariff was the occasion of the dangers that threatened the integrity of the Union. There grew into existence an antagonism of interest between some of the cotton-producing States, which looked across the sea for their only market, and the Eastern and Middle States, which were then beginning to engage seriously in mechanical and manufacturing pursuits, and loudly demanded a tariff for protection.

Now what were the commercial facilities of the country at that time? What were the ties of interest and means of commercial intercourse between the jarring sections? Railroad-building was then in its infancy. South Carolina was but feebly connected with the Eastern or Middle States by inland channels of trade, and was completely isolated from the valley of the Mississippi by the stubborn crests of the Alleghany Mountains, and her traffic, following the course of her rivers, flowed toward the sea, and England became almost the sole purchaser of her products, and hence became her commercial friend and neighbor.

Under the operation of natural obstacles, non-intercourse, defective means of transportation, abrogation of mutual interest, which were causes of alienation between the cotton States and the Northern States, came added slavery as a sectionalizing element, arrogant and aggressive in its purposes, and which became the entering wedge that led to the attempted dismemberment of the Union in 1861.

The primary causes of our national difficulties that led to open hostilities did not appear to arise from any disregard of the principles of self-government, any opposition to the Federal Constitution, but were attributable mainly to the causes before mentioned and to the fact that sectional pride and supremacy were fostered at the expense of that superior regard that was due to the Government created to protect and defend all, and which alone contained the essence of national life.

What are the commercial and social means of intercourse existing now between the States on the south Atlantic coast and those west of the Alleghany Mountains? What arteries of trade lead through the hearts of these States and pour into the sea-ports upon their extended shores the immense products seeking the markets of the world from the heart of the country?

Now let us look over our country so broad, so grand in its dimensions, so diversified, with mountains and valleys, rivers and plains, and see if there is not urgent necessity for a more comprehensive system of railways specially adapted to the increasing necessities of the people.

The great West, now the great heart of the nation, in her wonderful development and innumerable products, turns her gaze toward the Atlantic at every available point in search of outlets to the markets of the world. Her Briarean arms of commerce must extend to every shore and seek termini at every deep-water harbor suitable for ocean steamers to enter. The Atlantic ports will be reached by railways built upon the shortest lines from her great distributing centers. These roads should all be built under charters granted by the General Government. Under the shield of protection afforded by national law, capital, which is now timid and indisposed to venture, would seek investment in these important enterprises and contribute more than anything else to the permanent prosperity of the country.

The success of the jetty improvement in the Lower Mississippi may possibly enable New Orleans to regain her ancient supremacy as the commercial city of the South and restore to her again a large share of the river trade, but the exportable products of the South Atlantic States, with Kentucky, Tennessee, and the West and Northwestern States, will naturally look for more rapid facilities and seek outlets on direct tangents to the deep-water harbors on the southeast Atlantic seaboard. These ports are the natural gateways to the high seas and the keys to a future commerce, whose extent and importance are yet but feebly comprehended. The development of the South, her advance to the proud position she should occupy as one of the most fertile, productive, and genial regions on the continent, depend mainly upon two things: first, the complete utilization of her harbors as shipping ports to the merchant-vessels and steamers from all maritime countries and, secondly, an effective system of railways to all important points in the West, Northwest, and Southwest.

On the long line of sea-coast from the Chesapeake to the Gulf of Mexico no great commercial city has been built, notwithstanding the fact that on this coast are several excellent deep-water harbors. Among the most noted are Norfolk, Wilmington, Charleston, and Port Royal. It has been predicted, and the prediction seems to be based upon substantial reasons, that the day is not remote when a great commercial city will appear at some point upon the southeast Atlantic coast. That this emporium will be either at Charleston or Port Royal, there can be but little room to doubt. The flourishing condition of Charleston gives it present advantages over its rival; and these may be long maintained if Charleston is the first to extend its commercial arms to the heart of the West, and thus secure an abundant share of the traffic of the Mississippi Valley. The wonderful harbor of Port Royal, with its capacious area and superior depth of water, naturally fits it to become the site for the future emporium of the Southeast, and the rival of New York. It is now regarded in the prophetic eye of many shrewd men as the chosen site for the future "mistress of the seas."

The great advantages of Port Royal have long lain dormant. In the report of the board of officers lately convened for the examination of navy-yards, composed of Admiral David D. Porter and others, we find the following statements:

> The harbor of Port Royal, South Carolina, and its tributaries present great advantages, and offer the necessary depth of water and facilities for entering the port without risk to vessels of war. Port Royal Bay is a noble sheet of water, undoubtedly the finest harbor on our Southern coast. The wonder is that the place was so little known or appreciated prior to 1861.

From the same report I quote further:

> There is a large interval between Norfolk and Pensacola of fourteen hundred and forty miles, while the largest distance between any two navy-yards, Brooklyn and Norfolk, is not more than two hundred and fifty miles. Port Royal is about four hundred and eighty miles from Norfolk, nine hundred and sixty from Pensacola, and four hundred and fifty from Key West. It would appear from this that the defenses of the southern coast had been somewhat neglected.
> As regards communication with the West Indies, Port Royal is four hundred and eighty miles nearer to the Bahama Islands than Pensacola, and the distance of the two places from Havana is about the same. As a point to communicate with the Windward Islands Port Royal has the advantage, while Pensacola seems to be a necessity for the protection of our interests in the Gulf of Mexico. Port Royal must in the future become a most important station on our South Atlantic coast.

This report is in consonance with all others, both of a public and private nature, in reference to the superior merits of Port Royal harbor.

It has remained neglected and unappreciated for the sole reason of its limited connections with the grain-raising regions of the Mississippi Valley. It offers greater inducements and advantages as a shipping port than any point on the coast mentioned, and these must soon be duly appreciated. An attempt is now being made, with fair prospects of success, by a company chartered by the Legislature of South Carolina, to build docks, warehouses, and supply the port with shipping and transportation facilities on an extended scale. With proper encouragement this movement may lead to very important results. The construction simultaneously of the projected United States Central Railway from Lake Michigan to this port, via Cumberland Gap or Knoxville, would give a strong impetus to the harbor improvements and at once invite capital and population to Port Royal. As soon as this railway is completed Port Royal will become an important port of entry and her commercial relations, with all parts of the world accessible to merchant and trading vessels, will be established upon an enduring basis.

In her dismantled condition South Carolina may confidently seek hope and salvation through the proper utilization of her superb harbors. They are the natural inlets to a large share of the future commerce of the world. They will in due time command the great trade of the West Indies and South America, and this trade will, through the facilities of railroads, reach the heart of this country at a less distance by several hundred miles than by any other feasible routes. New York will perhaps remain forever the first commercial emporium of this country, but her growth will be facilitated rather than crippled by a rival city in the Southeast.

Among the many reasons that may be assigned in support of the opinion that a large commercial city will arise on the South Atlantic coast, in the immediate future, at the point I have designated, are the following: First, its central position on the long coast from Chesapeake Bay to Florida; secondly, remoteness from any rival city; thirdly, superior advantages of the harbor and greater depth of water; fourthly, support of contiguous States; fifthly, traffic from the interior by rail; sixthly, trade of the West Indies; seventhly, trade of South America; eighthly, European trade; ninthly, contiguity to the vast coal-fields of Kentucky and Tennessee and the valuable iron ores and mineral deposits found in those States and others through which the proposed railways will pass; and, lastly, because the proposed city can be reached on shorter lines of railway, from Chicago, Cincinnati, Louisville, and Saint Louis, and all other points in the Mississippi Valley, than by any railroads hitherto constructed to the seaboard from the same point.

From a simple inspection of the map of the United States it will be perceived that the southern point of Lake Michigan is the geographical center of all portions of the country adapted to agricultural pursuits east of the Rocky Mountains. If upon the map a series of radii be drawn from Chicago to all the harbors on the Atlantic coast, the peninsula of Florida excepted, it will be noticed that they are all practically of the same length. Owing to favorable gaps in the mountains it will be found practicable to construct a railroad with moderate gradients from Chicago to Port Royal or Charleston, on a route nearly a hundred miles shorter than any of the great railways connecting that city with New York.

The building of the proposed series of railways would mark an important event at the threshold of the second century of this nation's history. It would awaken all the industrial pursuits of the country now paralyzed. It would inaugurate a new era of progress, forecast a degree of prosperity transcending anything of the past, and infuse new life and energy among the people. "Peace hath its victories no less renowned than war," and the new march of the Northwest to the sea will be greater, grander, and more glorious than that which hath gone before.

The question of constitutional power of the Federal Government to construct railroads or grant aid in their construction may be regarded as res adjudicata. And the authority to grant charters to railroad companies appears to be as clear and as well defined as that of any other implied powers hitherto exercised by Congress. It is equally as clear and strong as the authority to charter a national bank, which was affirmed by the highest judicial tribunal of this country in the celebrated case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland. To those holding to the view that the United States is a nation, and not a mere loose compact between States, the power of the Federal Government to charter and build railroads is clear and explicit. If a State can grant franchises to railroad companies, (and most of them have done so,) it follows that the United States, in its more extensive jurisdiction, may likewise charter roads that will run through two or more States. Whether this power should be exercised without the consent of the States into or through which the roads will pass, is a matter of expediency or policy. There is not a State in the Union needing transportation facilities that would in any likelihood object to the exercise of this power on the part of the General Government. In the several bills introduced asking national charters, no objection it is believed will be raised against amendments requiring the consent of the States before the proposed roads are constructed.

It is a right inherent to the sovereignty of every nation to extend its protecting arm over all parts of its territory; and for this purpose the United States may order troops to march into any State, quarter them upon its soil, and erect forts and arsenals without consulting the States trespassed upon. What a commentary it would be upon the powers of a great nation like this, if, for instance, in anticipation of invasion it was deemed necessary to erect military fortifications at some mountain pass as a protection to the interior, if this authority could not be exercised without first obtaining the consent of the State Legislature.

The authority to grant charters to railroad companies with the condition that the roads when built shall be subservient to the purposes of the Government when necessity may require, and even to aid in their construction, may be clearly inferred from the powers granted to Congress by the Constitution, "to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." If we have unprotected harbors and a defenseless sea-coast (and such is the case now) and if it should appear that the building of railroads to or in the direction of such unprotected harbors and defenseless coast was essential for their protection by the facilities they would afford in the rapid transportation of troops, supplies, and munitions of war, there could be little doubt of the power of Congress to construct or authorize their construction. For prudential reasons, in anticipation of future danger, it might become the duty of the Government to provide such means of defense. Besides proving to be means of "common defense" the railroads would in an eminent degree promote "the general welfare of the country."

Again, the power of Congress to establish post-offices and post-roads may imply more than the mere purpose of declaring certain existing roads or public highways "post-roads." The building of railroads as improved facilities for the postal service is clearly an ancillary power that may be exercised by Congress. It may be exercised directly by the Government building the railroads itself, or indirectly by authorizing their construction by companies, under proper limitations, and with such requirements as would render the roads subservient to the purposes in view. This authority seems to be more clearly implied than that by which a great fiscal corporation was created by Congress conferring banking privileges upon the Government. The power "to establish post-roads" carries with it the authority to lay out and construct such roads, in case the postal service should evidently require them, and it must be altogether discretionary with Congress to determine the number and character of such roads. The postal service of the United States is now largely conducted by the superior facilities afforded by railroads, and circumstances may arise that would compel the Government to provide its own postal railways. A combination of leading railways might, for the purpose of extorting unusual charges from the Government for their services in transporting the mails, force the Government to the alternative of either dispensing with such service or to build or authorize the construction of railroads for that purpose. As the world advances and progress becomes more apparent each day, it is quite evident that we cannot abandon the essential privileges of our civilization, and content ourselves with those of an inferior order. We cannot abandon the mail privileges afforded by the railway, and be contented with the slow transit of the mails over mud turnpikes as in former days. Hence when necessity requires it the power to build or charter railways as postal roads is clearly manifest.

Henry Clay in a speech delivered in the House of Representatives on internal improvements, March 13, 1818, made use of the following language:

> I have contended that the power to construct post-roads is expressly granted in the power "to establish post-roads." If it be, there is an end of the controversy; but if not, the next inquiry is whether that power may be fairly deduced by implication from any of the special grants of power. To show that the power is expressly granted, I might safely appeal to the arguments already used to prove that the word established in this case can mean only one thing—the right of making.

Again, the power conferred by the Constitution upon Congress "to repel invasions," which is akin to that providing for "the common defense," may be by implication considered ample authority for the construction of railways by the Government. A nation comprehending its necessities and foreseeing the dangers of invasion would be unwise in neglecting to provide the necessary means of defense. Our extended and defenseless possessions on the Pacific coast would be at the mercy of any invading foe were it not for the great railroad that binds them with the interior. A war with any of the great maritime powers of Europe at this time would find us with a long line of unprotected or at least poorly protected coast on the southeast, and without adequate means for the transportation of troops and supplies in case of emergency. One of the great lines of railway proposed, if built, would supply a national want and become a valuable adjuvant to our means of defense in the event of war.

Further, the authority to construct railways or authorize their construction, as the most efficient means for regulating interstate commerce, is ancillary to the general power granted to Congress by the Constitution "to regulate commerce among the States." Railroads as channels of trade were unknown when the Constitution was framed; but from the fact they have now become the principal means by which commerce between the States is carried on, it must follow that if Congress shall exercise its lawful power to regulate said commerce it must do so in reference to the facilities by which it is mainly conducted. The multiplication of new methods of transportation does not weaken the force of the Constitution. The question occurs, can the power of colossal corporations abrogate this provision of the Constitution? Are the powers vested in them by State laws so transcendent that they are entirely beyond any control of Congress? In reference to these questions there is perhaps no method that would so effectually enable Congress to regulate commerce among the States as by granting charters to such a system of railways as I have alluded to, and by making them amenable to national law so far as it may be deemed necessary for the foregoing purposes.

The bill (H. R. No. 3758) provides that Congress may "interpose its authority whenever in its judgment the public good requires it." This discretionary power vested in Congress would certainly afford ample protection, if duly exercised, to the commercial interests of the people and the nation against any abuse of power that might be attempted by the railroad companies.

Among able jurists it is regarded a doubtful question whether Congress can under the provisions of the Constitution exercise any control whatever over corporations created by State authority. But railway companies acting under charters granted by the Federal Government would be subject to the control of Congress, and any abuses or evils likely to occur could be remedied without invoking the exercise of any questionable power. From an article on this subject in Appleton's New Encyclopædia, I extract the following:

> Many of the State Legislatures have undertaken to equalize and control the fares and rates of freights by arbitrary enactments, while others have endeavored to do so through their boards of commissioners. As yet no practical settlement of the various questions has been reached. The railroad companies make the general claim that their charters are contracts with the State which authorize them to regulate their own charges and control their own business, and which cannot be altered or amended directly or indirectly without their consent, and finally that all efforts to do so are in contravention of the Constitution of the United States, which prohibits the States from making laws impairing the obligation of contracts. The theory of those who assert that the States have the right to regulate the rates at which passengers and freights shall be carried by railroads, is that they are public highways, controlled by corporations created by law, and therefore subject to the law-making power whenever it may choose to intervene.
> Still another has been set up and received public attention, namely, that the authority to regulate commerce between the States, given to Congress by the Constitution of the United States, is broad enough to cover, and does cover, the right to regulate and control the railroads in all matters pertaining to their operation, and particularly in fixing the rates at which freights and passengers shall be carried, notwithstanding the fact that railroads, for commercial purposes, were at the time of the formation of the Constitution entirely unknown and unthought of. What will be the future solution of this question, now receiving the attention of many writers and thinkers in all parts of the world, cannot be predicted.

Taking these views to be a fair résumé of the question as it now stands, it may be asked what method can be adopted that would so effectually solve these difficulties as for Congress to authorize the construction of railways, reserving the right to regulate and control them as public necessity may require.

The building of railroads has been greatly facilitated and extended by Government aids in subsidies and land grants, but a strong opposition to granting further privileges of this sort is now apparent, and opposition to loans of Government credit is also regarded with disfavor, as it might lead to the imposition of enormous burdens upon the people; but the vast majority of those engaged in agricultural pursuits, who are interested in securing the means of cheap transportation, would cheerfully indorse the action of Congress in chartering a number of railroads and making them amenable to national law to such an extent as would protect their interests. The question may be put, if no subsidies or other Government aid is demanded, why ask national charters where it is generally practicable to secure charters from the State Legislatures or to organize local companies under general corporation laws? This question has already been fully answered in the argument produced in favor of a system of national railways; but the reasons may be summarized as follows:

1. Because railroads built under State charters are always local in their character and limited in their purposes. They are generally short lines, built only with reference to local wants, and without any regard to future connections or general commercial ends. They are generally complicated with local interests, which always cling to them, and are seldom laid out and constructed on the direct routes that are the most favorable to general highway.

2. Railroads built under national charters and intended for interstate commercial highways would command more of the public confidence, and being free from all local complications and being built upon direct routes, would afford the best and most reliable facilities for transportation.

3. Because the powers to be exercised by companies organized under national authority could be clearly defined in the charters and could not be easily evaded.

4. Because the Government sanction would go far in disabusing the minds of capitalists of the danger of arbitrary State legislation, and they would thereby be induced to invest their capital in the construction of such roads under the belief that their rights would be amply protected.

5. Because the general and commercial interests of the country would be greatly promoted by the building of such roads, and the people would feel that they would have stronger guarantees than they now have against the avarice and extortion of corporations.

6. Because the illicit issue of stocks as a means for enriching the managers of railways, by establishing a basis for higher rates, could be totally prohibited.

7. Because the construction of the proposed railways is urgently demanded by a large portion of the American people, especially by those engaged in agricultural and commercial pursuits, and because these works are of commercial, national, and political importance.

8. Because the building of such roads would improve the country, develop its vast resources, unify its interests, strengthen the bonds of union between the States, and revive and place upon a firm and lasting basis the prosperity of the nation.

After these general considerations, I will now call special attention to the project embraced in House bill No. 3758, styled "The United States Central Railway Company," as an enterprise of magnitude and of first-class importance. The proposed railway will start at Chicago and run in an air-line direction to Indianapolis; thence to Lexington or Frankfort, Kentucky; thence to Cumberland Gap; thence in a southeast direction to Charleston and Port Royal, South Carolina. An attempt was made several years ago to build a similar road from Charleston, via Knoxville, Tennessee, to the West, with Cincinnati as its objective point. South Carolina was then but little behind other States in the progressive spirit of the day, and sought to accomplish a great purpose of vital importance to her prosperity.

The first step taken to inaugurate this important enterprise was by calling a railroad convention at Knoxville. This convention was held on the 4th day of July, 1836, and in the number, intelligence, and character of its delegates was never surpassed by any similar assemblage. Nine States, including Indiana and Ohio, were represented in the convention. The building of the road was on that occasion advocated by many distinguished men, among whom were Governor Vance, Colonel E. D. Mansfield, and Dr. Daniel Drake of Ohio, Governor Noble of Indiana, Robert Y. Haynes of South Carolina, James Gladden, Judge O'Neal, Messrs. Petigrn, Harper, Blandis, Brooks, and Meminger. The project was actively advocated by John C. Calhoun, and regarded by him as an enterprise of the first importance. No work was done on the road until several years afterward, but the purpose was kept continually in view. The link from Anderson, South Carolina, to Knoxville was put under contract for construction and the work prosecuted as late as the year 1856. A portion of the line from Anderson to Walhalla, about thirty-two miles, was completed, and sixteen miles at the other end south of Knoxville, when a suspension of the work took place. A large amount of work in grading, bridging, tunneling, &c., was done at different points on the line between the completed sections. The total amount expended in construction was estimated by the engineer at about $3,000,000.

The financial revulsion of 1857, which soon followed the suspension of the work, rendered it impracticable to resume operations for several years. Before the managers of the road were able to renew their efforts the war of 1861 came on like a blighting scourge, and has since then left South Carolina in too prostrate a condition to continue, even with the aid of the neighboring States which were interested in the scheme, a work of such magnitude. This incompleted link, known as the "Blue Ridge Railroad," lies in the route of the proposed United States Central Railway, and may be adopted as a portion of its main line or principal branch. The work done on the incompleted Blue Ridge Railroad is reported to be first-class in all respects and of such permanent character that it remains almost unimpaired to this time.

In 1873 a convention of delegates from all the States interested by the proposed railway was held in the city of Chicago, and a company was organized to build the road from said city to the points before named upon the southeast Atlantic seaboard. The construction of the road has been commenced at both ends and has so far been prosecuted solely with local means. A considerable amount of grading and bridging has been done in Indiana, and the work is going on at moderate speed on the link between Spartanburgh, South Carolina, and Asheville, North Carolina, known as the Asheville and Spartanburgh Railroad. This section of the line is under the able management of Colonel D. R. Duncan, of Spartanburgh, the president of the Asheville and Spartanburgh Railroad Company. With the aid afforded by cheap convict labor, this portion of the road is likely to be carried to completion through the Blue Ridge; but considering the mountainous character of much of the country through North Carolina, Tennessee, and Kentucky, the cost of construction will far exceed the extent of local aid, and hence the necessity of national recognition as a means to insure its completion. No railway yet proposed, whether considered commercially, socially, or politically, exceeds this in importance. It is an enterprise of national necessity and should receive at least the speedy sanction of Congress in the manner proposed.

The attention of the vigorous and enterprising Northwest is now being directed to the South Atlantic States and the harbors upon their coast. This is done with the view of opening direct commercial communications with them, and through their excellent harbors to seek new outlets for their surplus products to the markets of the world. The South Atlantic States import largely from the West, hay, corn, wheat, flour, bacon, beef, lard, machinery, mules, horses, cattle, merchandise, &c. These supplies at present find their way to the purchasers and consumers over long and circuitous routes, which exceed on an average by nearly nine hundred miles the distance by the direct route of the proposed United States Central Railway. The cost of transportation over these nine hundred miles of extra distance falls upon both consumer and producer, and it is certainly a matter of the greatest importance to the future growth and prosperity of both sections, so mutually dependent upon each other, that direct and efficient channels of trade, such as proposed by this great iron highway, should be secured at the earliest period practicable.

The following table, copied from a prospectus of the proposed road, shows what the price per bushel of corn was in 1873, and is self-explanatory where the profits go:

Interior of Illinois (Adams and Kane Counties) from	$0 20 to $0 30
Interior of Indiana	25 to 35
Chicago	29 to 43
Charleston, South Carolina	80 to 1 00
Interior of South Carolina and Georgia	1 00 to 1 50

However necessary this direct commercial highway between the Northwestern and Southeastern States may be to both sections for the mutual exchange of their respective products, yet this interchange or domestic trade, important as it may be, is only a part of the uses that this road is intended to subserve. Being a direct line from the heart of the country to the seaboard and having its termini at deep-water harbors, which are the keys to the tropical trade, it must necessarily command to a large extent the commerce of the West Indies and South America. It will also become an important outlet for breadstuffs and other products from the West to Europe and other countries. Travel and trade on this highway would never be interrupted by the vicissitudes of weather, and owing to the mildness of the climate in the States through which it will pass it would become the most pleasant and desirable route for immigrants from Europe seeking homes in the Southern or Western States. The places of termini upon the seaboard are healthful, salubrious, and free from epidemics, and are not so far south as in any manner to render them unfit for the safe storage of grain. In this respect they possess many advantages over any ports farther south and other advantages over those farther to the north. These harbors occupy most important positions on our Atlantic seaboard, and it is strange that they have been so long neglected.

There are other considerations of public importance that require the building of the United States Central Railway. It will pass through some of the richest mineral regions on the continent. It will open a way to vast coal-fields and beds of iron ore that are now locked up for want of transportation facilities.

According to the geological report of Professor Rogers, of Pennsylvania, the amount of coal originally existing in the great coal-fields of the world is given in the following statement:

	Tons.
Belgium	36,000,000,000
France	59,000,000,000
British Isles	190,000,000,000
Pennsylvania	316,000,000,000
Appalachian coal-field	1,387,000,000,000
Indiana, Kentucky, and Illinois	1,277,000,000,000
Iowa Missouri, and Arkansas	739,000,000,000
Total amount in the United States	4,000,000,000,000

From these calculations it will be perceived that the United States have twenty-one times as much coal as Great Britain.

The building of this railway would probably expose to view more unearthed mineral wealth in coal, iron ores, &c., than will ever again be made accessible by any other railroad in the world.

While it is evident that at no remote day the coal supplies of England will run short, and likewise the sources of coal and iron in the principal manufacturing states of Europe, we have the clearest evidence that we shall have an abundance of the same for all purposes for ages to come. Hence it is apparent that nature has endowed this country in a superlative degree with the most important elements of power and greatness, and that at an early day it must become the first manufacturing nation in the world. Iron will become with us, as it is in England, a great element of power, and our supremacy will depend in a great measure upon our ability or willingness to utilize it. The United States Central Railway will open a passage through the heart of the coal-fields of Kentucky and Tennessee on a tangent of nearly two hundred miles; and along the same line, side by side with the coal, will be found iron ores in vast abundance and of the best qualities—magnetic, spathic, and specular. The mountain regions of Kentucky and Tennessee, with their healthful and fertile valleys and unlimited water-power, will become ere long chosen sites for manufacturing establishments. They only await the advent of railroads to connect them with the marts of trade.

Our country is yet new and its development incomplete. Its vast resources are yet but partially utilized. Only a limited portion of our heritage of soil has been subjected to cultivation. The following statement, compiled from the last census of the United States, will show what portion of the country is under cultivation in the States through which the United States Central Railway will pass, together with Iowa and Wisconsin:

Indiana has six-sevenths of her soil inclosed in farms and two-fifths actually cultivated; Iowa has three-sevenths inclosed and one-fifth cultivated; Wisconsin has one-third inclosed and one-fifth cultivated; Illinois has one-half inclosed and one-seventh cultivated; while East Tennessee has only one-fourth of her soil inclosed and about one-tenth actually cultivated; West North Carolina has only one-fourth inclosed and about one-tenth cultivated; Northeast Georgia has only one-fourth inclosed and about one-tenth cultivated; South Carolina has only four-sevenths inclosed and about one-seventh cultivated.

While it is true that a considerable portion of the last-mentioned States lies among mountains, and may be regarded as timber-lands, yet the fact is demonstrable that none of the advantages of this country has yet been fully utilized, and that cheap and fertile lands and inexhaustible mineral and other resources invite the attention of the agriculturist, the miner, the mechanic, and manufacturer to the best inducements and opportunities that the world can afford.

The irresponsible assertions occasionally made, that this country has already too many railroads, are on par with the theory that some philosophic minds have advanced that our financial troubles and the general depression in the business pursuits of this country are due to overproduction. If this theory were true, it would follow as a logical sequence that idleness, improvidence, stupidity, and extravagance would soon restore the equilibrium and bring about a state of prosperity. For the consolation of those who entertain these fears, I quote the following statements of Henry V. Poor, contained in the Railroad Manual for 1875 and 1876. He says:

Another important element in forecasting the future of our roads is the rapid increase of our population. This increase now equals very nearly 1,000,000 annually. The constant addition of such vast numbers is a most powerful corrective of financial disturbances growing out of overproduction, as every industry so long as it does not extend its operations will soon find the demand overtaking production. Every trade feels that it can rely upon a vastly greater number of customers the next year than the present. Our position as a nation is in this respect most peculiar and happy, as the rate of increase of the population of others—particularly those with whom we have the most intercourse—is very slight. In 1880 our population will undoubtedly equal very nearly fifty millions. It is probable that, owing to the improvements that have been made in machinery and utensils and in the reduction of the cost of transportation, the productive capacity of the people has been doubled within the last ten years. The earnings per mile of our railroads have more than doubled within that period. Their aggregate earnings per head of population are fourfold greater. If the future is to repeat the past it will be seen that the interest which is to receive the greatest benefit from the progress that society is constantly making in the useful arts is that of our railroads.

The statistics I have given demonstrate conclusively that nearly all the pursuits of American industries are yet but partially developed, and that the growth of our population and the constant increase of surplus products must necessarily demand enlarged railroad facilities. While it is true that certain sections are well supplied with railroads, at least for all local wants, yet in some of the States there are extensive regions abounding in resources of undeveloped wealth, that are without such facilities, and must remain in a backward and non-progressive condition till they are supplied.

The United States Central Railway, running in a southeast direction from Chicago to the Atlantic, will pass through wide sections of the country for several hundred miles where the necessity for a railroad has long been felt.

What is needed is not more neighborhood or local lines, but a system of commercial highways leading from the chief distributing centers of the interior diverging on direct routes to the seaboard. By such a system all the important harbors on our entire Atlantic coast would become marts of trade, to both outgoing and incoming, and all sections of the Union would have the benefits of close connection with them, and through them access to the markets of the world. The warp and woof would be complete between all parts of the Union, and the interests of the whole people would be immeasurably advanced and intimately blended.

No one can look over this vast country and attempt to estimate its peculiar advantages and resources, the wonderful combination of forces and elements, without casting a thought along the vista of the future to the grand destiny that seems under the guidance of Providence to await it. A glimpse at these advantages and elements of power will be sufficient to impress us with their importance. A condition essential to national supremacy is ample extent of territory. No country of limited domain pent up between nations of more extensive area can ever become a first-class power. Our country possesses the advantage of being a vast territory, capable of sustaining an immense population. It occupies the central regions of a continent, extends from ocean to ocean, and embraces an area of 3,500,000 square miles, about equal in dimensions to all of Europe, and is capable of supporting a population greater than that of any nation in existence.

In the second place, all of this vast territory is embraced within temperate latitudes, within that zone where the greatest amount of human energy has been displayed, and where the most distinctive developments in physical and mental manhood have always been manifested, and perhaps always will.

In the third place, the area of fertile soil bears a larger proportion to the whole country, than that of any other contiguous extent of country in the world of like dimensions; and the products of the soil embrace all varieties essential to the human sustenance.

Fourthly. The number, size, and length of its navigable rivers adapted to the purposes of internal commerce, are immense and have no parallel in any other nation; and the chain of lakes, surpassing in magnitude all others in the world, stretches along its northern boundary for more than a thousand miles and affords the most extended facilities for navigation and commerce, both domestic and foreign.

Fifthly. Extensive coal-fields and prolific sources of iron and other mineral wealth adapt this country in a pre-eminent degree to manufacturing pursuits.

Sixthly. Our country, being almost ocean-bound and having a vast length of sea-coast, presents more objective points for commerce than any other in the world. The harbors and ports on our eastern coast are numerous, and when properly improved will afford all the shipping accommodations demanded by the Atlantic trade. From the Southeast and Gulf coasts we have direct and easy access to the West Indies and the eastern shores of South America. With proper effort on our part the immense trade of those countries can be secured and made tributary to our prosperity. Friendly and reciprocal relations should be established and maintained between them and us. The great bulk of the commerce of the South American states must necessarily flow toward the Atlantic. The Andes, the back-bone of the continent, press closely on the shores of the Pacific, leaving only a narrow strip of country on the west side, while to the eastward of the mountains is an immense territory spanning the torrid zone and embracing regions beyond the tropical lines. This vast country possesses a fertile soil, is rich in multitudinous productions, and abounds in valuable resources. It is channeled by majestic rivers which arise in the Andes and flow to the Atlantic. The Orinoco, the La Plata, and Amazon, and their branches, are highways of commerce for the vast countries of the interior and through which they pass. Thus it will be clearly seen that the entire commerce of South America east of the Andes must necessarily seek outlets through the Atlantic. Commercial intercourse, in the cheapest and most direct way, between the United States and the principal countries of South America should be encouraged by all appropriate and available means. Contiguity of position gives us great advantages over the countries beyond the Atlantic in commanding the trade of South America. How can this trade be best diverted to this country? A careful inspection of the map will show that the most direct commercial route from the eastern coast of South America and from the West Indies to the United States is that which leads to our southeast Atlantic harbors. They are the natural outlets and inlets for the immense prospective trade that will be carried on between the countries mentioned and the United States. What is most needed to accomplish these desirable objects is evidently to build railways as I have proposed from the valley of the Mississippi or other points to Port Royal. Let us by all means have one commercial metropolis on our south Atlantic coast. Let the Government do something to aid in a purpose so laudable, and which must necessarily lead to the most important and beneficial results.

Lastly, in estimating the commercial advantages of the United States we should not overlook its central position between Europe and the Orient; that we have a long extent of Pacific coast, six thousand miles nearer China and other oriental lands than England, and that we ought, with the enterprise characteristic of the Anglo-Saxon race, maintain forever a commercial supremacy in the seas westward of this continent. When are seen together all the advantages that have been stated, it must be apparent to all minds that the United States should become the first commercial nation in the world; and that she is destined to become so in the immediate future will scarcely admit of doubt.

Our land has become the Egypt of the world. Our fertile valleys and broad prairies produce annually a large surplus of breadstuffs and provisions for export to foreign lands, and it is safe to conclude that the quantity of these exports will increase from year to year. Yet with all this we have not attained to that degree of agricultural superiority that lies within our power. Our want of commercial conveniences act as an embargo upon the productive prosperity of the country.

It remains for us to avail ourselves of the wonderful advantages and grand opportunities that lie within our grasp to become the first manufacturing nation in the world. But in order to utilize our resources, develop the industrial pursuits of the whole country, enlarge our foreign commerce to its full dimensions, we must not neglect to provide the necessary facilities of transportation, by which all sections of the country may have direct access to the markets of the world. Our Atlantic and Pacific shores should be bound together by iron bands, so that the ocean trade from the East and West should have unrestricted transit across the continent. To accomplish so necessary a result will require more than one transcontinental railway. The Northern Pacific Railroad should be completed. Time will demonstrate the wisdom of its construction. This road will form a grand connection between the western extremity of our chain of northern lakes and the Pacific Ocean, and will in due time become a national and commercial necessity. Another railroad from San Diego, or some point on the Pacific coast in Southern California, to the southeast Atlantic seaboard, having its principal terminus at Port Royal, should be constructed at as early a date as possible. This road, with the United States Central, having their termini at Port Royal, would make this place at once an important port of entry, and eventually the chief commercial emporium of the Southeast.

The early construction of these thoroughfares will greatly depend upon the active co-operation of the people of the Southeastern States and Southern States, who should be deeply interested in their construction.

Can it be possible that those who represent the South on this floor, now the guardians of its dearest interests, should be so wedded to barren idealities that they would oppose the very means that will the soonest lead to the restitution of the South, awake its slumbering energies, develop its wonderful resources, and place it alongside of the North and West in the march of progress. It remains with them to say whether these measures shall be fairly considered and supported, or whether they shall be rejected.

Great opportunities are close at hand, and the moment of decision must soon arrive when the South must determine under what banner she will enlist. She must either remain captive to the laisser faire policy, or seize upon the bold and aggressive idea that is born of enterprise and make a noble effort to turn her natural advantages and resources to the best purposes. The building of the proposed railways will not only improve her seaports and furnish her with the much-needed commercial facilities, but will also act as a stimulant to her manufacturing enterprises. Her vast fields of coal and iron, her unequaled water-power, her cotton and other productions, offer strong inducements to manufacturers, and when these advantages and resources are properly employed, the South will arise to a degree of prosperity that will compare favorably with any section of the Union. All sections of the country will be mutually benefited by the proposed improvements. No enterprise can be projected in any portion of the country that will affect injuriously the interests of another portion. There is no foundation for antagonism or hostility in interests; and those who think that the construction of a great road here or there, where it is a local or commercial want, will so operate, have but limited perceptions of the opportunities that lie open to all sections of the Union for further developments.

I have presented these views because I believe them to be sound and indisputable; and the proposed improvements, if carried into effect, will lead to the most beneficial and important results.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN R. EDEN,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Speaker, the bill now under consideration provides the mode of settling questions of such grave importance as to forbid any merely partisan feeling in its discussion. From the foundation of the Government, whenever a question has arisen as to the validity of an electoral vote for President and Vice-President, serious apprehensions have been expressed by the statesmen of the day as to the danger involved in deciding the dispute. Heretofore such disputes have not arisen in any case where the result of the election would in any manner be affected by the determination of the question. Hence in all such cases the crisis has been passed by the adoption of temporary expedients. Now we are confronted with contested electoral votes upon the decision of which depends the election of President and Vice-President. The occasion demands the exercise of the highest statesmanship and forbids all considerations of mere party success.

The first question to be decided is as to the constitutionality of the proposed legislation. The bill simply provides when there are double returns from a State a mode of deciding which is the true and lawful electoral vote of the State; and when there is but a single return and objections are made to that return, the manner of disposing of such objections. If Congress has power to provide by law for the contingencies referred to in any manner, I assume that the bill is within the constitutional power of Congress. The framers of the Constitution must have foreseen that questions of this sort might arise; and for this reason we should look with confidence for an express or implied power to meet the emergency. The provisions of the Constitution in reference to the appointment of electors are few and simple:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

The power to appoint electors is reserved to the States by the Constitution of the United States, and can only be exercised in the manner therein specified. It is a duty devolved upon the State, having no relation whatever to the ordinary legislation regulating the local affairs of its people.

In the performance of this duty the State executes a power under the Federal Constitution. By ratifying the Constitution the States bound themselves to execute that part thus confided to them in the manner prescribed in that instrument. How is this to be done? The appointment must be by the State; the manner of the appointment be directed by the Legislature. In making the appointment the mode prescribed must be followed.

The number appointed must be equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.

The persons appointed electors must not be Senators or Representatives or hold an office of trust or profit under the United States. The electors are to be chosen at the time determined by Congress, in case such time has been prescribed by law. In order to constitute legal electors the mode prescribed in the Constitution must be pursued. The State makes the appointment, and cannot delegate the power to any person or number of persons. The act is to be performed in such manner as under the Constitution of the State expresses the will of its people. Otherwise the State might delegate the power to some one wholly irresponsible to the people and unfriendly to the Federal Government. The manner of appointment must be directed by the Legislature, to the end that the proceedings may be regular and orderly, and the result made known with certainty and in accordance with the forms of law.

The number of electors appointed should be equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress. Were the State to appoint a greater number of electors than it is entitled to under the Constitution, and should these electors divide their votes among several candidates as the Constitution contemplates they may, it would be impossible to determine in counting the votes which should be excluded and which counted. Should the State appoint a less number than the Constitution prescribes it would thereby attempt to change that part of the Federal Constitution which designates the number to be appointed in each State. Upon the appointment of electors in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, the State has no further duty to perform in reference to the election, unless there should be a failure to elect a President by the electors. The persons appointed do not execute any power or authority derived from the State government. The acts they perform and the mode of the performance are all prescribed by the Federal Constitution. The people of the Union have an interest, in common with the interest of the particular State, in the faithful performance of their duty by the electors. The State cannot in any manner interfere with the electors in casting their votes or making their returns. All they do is done under authority given by the Constitution of the United States and the laws passed in pursuance thereof.

What are the electors required to do? They "shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate."

This brief paragraph from article 12 of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States embraces every act the electors are required to perform. They meet and present such credentials as the law of the State may require. They are clothed with no power to determine any question affecting the election or qualification of the members composing the electoral college of the State. Each elector is an independent voter for President and Vice-President, free of control either by his colleagues or any officer or department of the State government.

When the electors legally appointed by all the States, free from any constitutional disability, have cast their ballots and certified their returns at the time and in the manner prescribed by the Constitution and laws passed in pursuance thereof, the election of President and Vice-President is consummated, and nothing remains to be done but to make known the result. In order that the result may be ascertained and declared the Constitution provides that—

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted;—the person having the greatest number of votes shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed. * * * The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice-President shall be the Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed.

The election depends, not on the counting of the votes, but on the number of votes received by the several candidates. It is the duty of the President of the Senate to open all the certificates, and of the two Houses there assembled to count all the votes. The only difficulty that can arise is in determining in disputed cases what are the votes. Should the lists of votes signed and certified to from any State show a greater number of electors voting for President and Vice-President than the State is entitled to, the counting of the votes could not be completed until a decision should be made with reference to that vote. In like manner a question would arise requiring a decision, prior to the count, should two sets of electors send returns certified in due form from the same State. Both returns could not be received and counted as the vote of the State, and before the enumeration of votes can be made the true vote of the State must be ascertained. So it might appear that the electors from a State had voted for a President and Vice-President, both of whom were inhabitants of the same State with themselves, or for a person not of the constitutional age, or for a person not born in the United States; or that one or more of the electors voting held an office of trust or profit under the United States, or that the appointment of electors was made by some authority other than that of the State, or was made in a manner different from that directed by the State Legislature. It cannot be certainly known, until the certificates are all opened, what questions may arise to be considered and determined in order to identify and ascertain the legal vote to be counted. That a part or all the questions to which I have adverted may arise, will not be disputed. That the decision of all such questions when presented must be decided as indispensable to the count of the true vote, is equally apparent.

The power to count the vote, without specifying by whom, is expressly given by the Constitution. That instrument further declares that Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." Under this general clause Congress may not only pass a law prescribing how the electoral vote shall be counted, but also providing for a mode of settling all questions that may arise under the Constitution of the United States, preliminary to the counting of the vote.

I go a step further. Assuming, as some do, that the Vice-President has a right to count the vote, yet under this general clause in the Constitution, he being an officer of the Government, and it being "necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the power vested in him that the legal vote should first be ascertained to enable him to discharge his duty properly, Congress has the power to prescribe the mode of ascertaining the legal vote. Assuming as others do, that the two Houses, when they meet to be present at the opening of the certificates, count the votes, as a necessary incident to that power they must first ascertain which are the legal votes. Were the Houses to count all that purported to be votes, in case of double returns or the appointment by any State of electors in excess of the number to which the State is entitled, there could be no legal determination of the result of the election. A candidate might be declared elected who is ineligible under the Constitution, votes might be counted that had been cast by persons holding offices of trust or profit under the Government. The two Houses, in the absence of any law or joint rule governing their action, may wholly disagree in making the count or declaring the result. In such case should the President of the Senate insist upon the right to count the vote and declare the result, and the House of Representatives insist that there was no election by reason that no person had a majority of all the electors appointed, and proceed to the election of a President, I fear that we would soon realize the situation of Mexico, and witness in our own country the fatal effects of a departure from the orderly, lawful, and peaceful means contemplated by the Constitution in determining the result of an election.

Whatever differences of opinion may prevail among members on this floor as to the mode of counting the vote, all will admit that force is not one of the elements to be used in reaching the result. To ascertain the true vote is in the nature of a judicial inquiry. To count the vote when the legal vote is identified is a very simple mathematical problem. There can be no insurrection or rebellion either in the inquiry or the enumeration. Hence there is no necessity for military orders, or the movement of troops, or of armed or unarmed men with a view to affect in any manner the counting of the vote. So far as the count is concerned, the whole responsibility rests upon the two Houses. The executive authorities have nothing to do with it, and any interference by that department would be a gross usurpation, and I have no doubt would meet with the stern condemnation of both Houses.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are told that the appointment of electors belongs exclusively to the States, and that every question affecting their election and qualifications is to be settled and adjudicated under State authority, and that the settlement so made is final. The right of the States to appoint electors is unquestioned. The duty of the States to make the appointment in accordance with the power reserved by the Federal Constitution will not be denied. The right to make the appointment carries with it the corresponding duty to act within constitutional limitations.

When a vote is challenged one of the questions to be determined is as to whether it is the vote of the State. Should that question in all cases be decided under State authority? If so, had a half-dozen persons in 1864 constituted themselves an electoral college for the State of South Carolina, cast their votes for President and Vice-President, and sent their returns, duly certified and sealed, to the President of the Senate, how would the remedy have been applied? The State authorities in the then condition of the country could not have been appealed to! Numerous instances might be supposed where it would be impossible for a remedy to be found under State authority to prevent the counting of an unconstitutional or fraudulent vote. If, from want of ability, or want of inclination to prevent it, a State permits men without lawful authority, or wanting in constitutional qualifications, to organize themselves into an electoral college and send their votes to us as the vote of the State, it becomes our duty to prevent the breach of the Constitution.

It has been the practice from the organization of the Government to the present time, by the concurrent action of the Senate and House, by joint rule or by law, to determine all questions raised in reference to the counting of the electoral vote, and to exclude from the count such as were not legal and valid. I will not take up the time of the House by referring in detail to the numerous precedents, with which all are familiar, on that subject. I will refer only to the joint resolution approved by the President February 8, 1865, which declared that eleven States were "not entitled to representation in the electoral college for the choice of President and Vice-President of the United States for the term of office commencing on the 4th day of March, 1865, and no electoral votes shall be received and counted from said States," &c. Of the States referred to in the joint resolution, I believe two had voted and sent up the returns.

I want to call the attention of my State-rights friends, especially the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] to the vote in the Senate on that joint resolution. Such State-rights men as Buckalew of Pennsylvania, Davis of Kentucky, Hendricks of Indiana, Johnson of Maryland, Powell of Kentucky, and Trumbull of Illinois voted for the joint resolution. It was adopted by a vote of 29 to 10. According to the modern State-rights doctrine, any of these States that chose to could vote for President and Vice-President; and the eminent democrats to whom I have referred, in going behind the returns and excluding the vote, violated the rights of the States. I may be met with the answer that the people of these States were in rebellion, hence were not entitled to vote for President and Vice-President. Admit it, but did the Congress of the United States find out that fact from the face of the returns? When in 1869 the Senate and House of Representatives determined by concurrent resolution not to count the vote of Georgia, if that vote affected the result of the election, did the fact appear on the face of the returns that Georgia was not entitled to representation in Congress when the electors were appointed? No such fact appeared on the face of the returns in either case. If in the one case by law and in the other by concurrent resolution of the two Houses it was proper to go behind the returns and exclude from the count the vote of several States because the inhabitants thereof were engaged in rebellion, or to exclude one State because under a law of Congress the State was not entitled to representation in Congress, I ask if we may not look behind the returns to see if a returning board in a State has not, in violation of law, thrown out and refused to count the votes of 12,000 or 15,000 legal voters?

It is settled that the power exists in Congress to go behind the returns and throw out the vote of a State the people whereof are engaged in rebellion or when under the law the State is not entitled to representation in Congress. Then can the authorities or pretended authorities of a State present before us a return of a vote conceived in fraud and perjury, the product of a conspiracy organized for the purpose of defeating the will of the people of the United States in the election of a President, and in the name of the State command us to count that vote and forbid us to look behind the returns and then see that in making and certifying that return the laws of the State and the will of the people were trampled under foot? To state the proposition is to refute it.

How can the rights of the States be touched in the adoption of a proper law or the enforcement of a proper rule by the Senate and House to eliminate from the electoral vote all that are invalid or fraudulent? The Constitution gives the State no right to appoint an ineligible elector. It gives no one a right in the name of a State to make a false or fraudulent return of the electoral vote of the State. In reserving to the States the power to appoint electors Congress is not stripped of the power to provide against a violation of the Constitution of the United States in the appointment of electors. In the election of a President and Vice-President under the Constitution the States have certain limited and well-defined powers. Everything necessary and proper to be done in carrying into effect that part of the Constitution relating to the election of a President and Vice-President, except what has been reserved to the States, Congress has a right to do; and I can conceive of no more important duty in that behalf than to provide a just and equitable mode of ascertaining in cases of dispute and doubt the legal and constitutional vote of the States. If the power to do this is not in Congress there is no remedy and the people of the United States are at the mercy of any set of rascals who may see fit to set up a fraudulent returning board and manufacture pretended electors at will. There can be no adequate power in the States to remedy the evil, for the reason that the fraud and wrong may not be known until the certificates are opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of both Houses; and if the State has the power and should omit from any cause to prevent a return of fraudulent or false votes the people of the United States have an interest in the question, and no laches upon the part of the authorities of a State ought to prejudice the rights of the people of the whole country.

I will call attention to the tenth amendment to the Constitution, not because I believe it has any bearing upon the question, but for the reason that some of my friends for whose opinions I have great respect believe it does. By that article—

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

By the Constitution the power is delegated to the United States to elect a President. As a part of the machinery of election the States are clothed with the power to appoint electors under certain limitations, the electors having certain qualifications. Without the action of the States there can be no election of President. Now when the power to elect a President and Vice President is fully provided for in the Constitution and the part to be performed by the States is therein clearly defined, where can there be room left for any further reserved powers in the States? If the Constitution is silent upon any point that may arise in the election of President and Vice-President, should we not resort to the implied powers and pass such laws as "shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the election of President and Vice-President, rather than to look to the reserved powers of the States to supply the omission?

The power to elect the President and Vice-President under the Constitution is full and complete, either in express terms or by necessary implication. The part to be performed by the States is clearly limited and defined. Hence there can be no other powers reserved to the States in the premises. In order to show the utter fallacy of the claim that the bill under consideration is violative of any of the rights of the States, let us see what is proposed to be done not expressly authorized by the Constitution:

First. It provides who shall be the presiding officer when the two Houses meet to count the vote.

Second. It provides for the appointment of two tellers by each House to make a list of the votes, &c.

Third. It provides a mode of deciding objections to the vote of a State by the two Houses where there is but one return.

Fourth. It provides the mode of deciding objections where there is a double return from a State, in the first instance by the judgment of a commission consisting of five Senators and five Representatives and five justices of the Supreme Court, subject, however, to revision and rejection by the concurrent action of the two Houses.

There being no person designated by the Constitution to preside over the two Houses when they meet to count the vote, will it be claimed that the power to appoint the President is reserved to the States, or that because there is no provision in the Constitution authorizing the appointment of tellers that this bill trenches on State rights by providing for tellers? No one would be guilty of such an absurdity!

It will hardly be claimed that as a part of the reserved rights of the States there should be passed State laws providing for the decision of questions when the vote of a State is challenged; or that any practical mode could be adopted whereby the States could adjudicate upon the subject. Then what rights of the States are violated by the bill? None; unless the States or those who assume to act for them have a right to send up here and have counted, in the election of President and Vice-President, the votes of ineligible electors, or invalid and fraudulent votes.

Believing, as I do, that legislation is absolutely necessary in order to a settlement of disputes relative to the electoral vote, and that the bill under consideration is warranted by the Constitution, and was agreed upon by the committee in a spirit of justice and patriotism, and that the tribunal to be selected under it will be as fair and free from partisan influence as any that could be selected, I shall give it my support.

Counting the Electoral Vote—Joint Conference Bill.

SPEECH OF HON. A. E. STEVENSON,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877.

The House having under consideration the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877—

Mr. STEVENSON said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I am unwilling that this discussion should close and the record of this day be made up for history without uttering some words of approval of this measure. The importance, the gravity of the pending question none candeny. Upon the passage of this bill, or one similar in its provisions, in my judgment, hang events of great moment to this Republic. What may be the result of its rejection by this House, I will not attempt to forecast; but that it is a measure well calculated to secure a fair adjustment of the presidential question and to restore tranquillity to the country, I can well believe. As such I give it my support. What, then, is the object of this bill? I believe it to be to secure an honorable settlement of a question fraught with peril to the country, a settlement by a tribunal whose integrity cannot be questioned and whose judgment will be acquiesced in by good men of all parties.

Mr. Speaker, I approach the discussion of this bill in no partisan spirit, but deeply impressed with the gravity of the occasion, and animated as I trust by an earnest desire to faithfully discharge the high duties devolving upon me as one of the representatives of the people. The question, sir, as to who shall be elected President of the United States, important as that question was when pending before the country, becomes of relatively little moment in comparison with the great question whether the candidate who has under the forms of law been chosen by the people shall be quietly inducted into his great office; for upon this depends a continuance of our republican institutions. If it once be conceded that by any means the will of the people can be thwarted and those chosen to administer the Government forcibly or fraudulently deprived of that right, then, sir, it needs no prophet to foretell the ultimate overthrow of our form of government. A Government based upon the right of the people to rule must perish with the destruction of that right. It matters little under what pretext or to accomplish what end the right or power is assumed of disregarding the will of the majority, its exercise in a single instance must inevitably weaken if not destroy the faith of the people in popular government.

To the end, then, Mr. Speaker, that the will of the people as lawfully expressed by the ballot may be executed; to the end that there may be no usurpation of this high office, but that the public mind may rest content in the belief that he who assumes the duties of Chief Magistrate takes with him the title to his great office; to the end, sir, that peace and order, rather than confusion and disorder, may prevail in the State, I give my cordial assent to this bill.

Mr. Speaker, while it is my firm conviction that Samuel J. Tilden is by the voice of the legal electors of these United States entitled to the office of President, yet I recognize the fact that many gentlemen upon this floor, as honest in their convictions as myself and with equal means of information, are persuaded that Governor Hayes has been elected to that high office. In this emergency, with the succession to this great office in dispute, with four millions of electors insisting upon the inauguration of one candidate and an equal or greater number upon the inauguration of the other, it is indispensable to the tranquillity of the country that some practicable solution of this difficulty be devised. If it be true that a condition of affairs has arisen unforeseen and not provided for by the framers of our Constitution, then, sir, the responsibility is cast upon us of devising some mode not in conflict with the terms of that instrument for the settlement of all controverted questions arising out of this election.

The question in dispute is whether the electoral votes of the States of Florida and of Louisiana shall be counted for Tilden or for Hayes. Upon this decision hinges that of who shall be Chief Magistrate of this Republic for the next four years. The importance of deciding this question correctly cannot be overestimated. Its decision must be founded in justice, otherwise it cannot stand the test of history. We can well afford to see the candidate of our choice defeated by the ballot, but can ill afford to witness his induction into office unless he has been lawfully chosen by the people.

The legally chosen candidate must be inaugurated, else this high office is held by usurpation. What the effect of so great a calamity must be, how far-reaching in its consequences, I will not attempt to forecast. It is a condition of affairs to be contemplated only with the most gloomy forebodings as to our future. Hence the importance, Mr. Speaker, of such a decision of all controverted questions growing out of the late election as will not only insure the inauguration of the legally elected President, but that the decision of questions so vital to the very life of our Republic may be by a tribunal which will command the respect of the entire country. I trust, sir, that we may be endowed with sufficient patriotism and wisdom to so deal with this great question that its decision, whatever it may be, will be cheerfully acquiesced in by the great American people.

Let us then, Mr. Speaker, for a moment look at the difficulties of the situation. It is not disputed that on the 6th day of last December Mr. Tilden received 184 and Mr. Hayes 169 legal votes in the different electoral colleges. This leaves the votes of Louisiana and Florida in dispute; to elect Tilden, he must secure one, and to elect Hayes, he must receive all of the votes of the States I have named. The partisans of each of these gentlemen claim the votes of these States for their respective candidates. Rival electoral colleges in both States have cast their votes for each of these candidates, certificates of which are now in the possession of the President of the Senate, to be opened by him preparatory to the votes being counted.

The question to which we now come, Mr. Speaker, is, by whom shall these votes be counted? In the other States, where but one set of certificates has been returned, it is a question of but little moment as to who makes the enumeration of the votes, whether it is the act of the President of the Senate, or of tellers, or of either or of both is wholly immaterial. It is in that case a mere question of arithmetic, the simplest ministerial act. But here, sir, the act is not simply ministerial; some power or authority endowed with judicial functions must decide which certificates of these disputed States shall be counted. The decision between these certificates is unavoidable, and upon this decision turns this entire question. In whom, then, is the power vested of deciding this question? The twelfth article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States—that bearing upon this question—is as follows:

The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit, sealed, to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted; the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the 4th of March, next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President. The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice-President shall be the Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list the Senate shall choose the Vice-President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, it is gravely argued by gentlemen upon this floor that counting the electoral votes, involving as it does the right to decide what votes shall be counted, is the exclusive prerogative of the President of the Senate. Is this argument well founded, and is this important duty cast by the Constitution upon this single officer? If so, manifestly it must be so expressed in that instrument, or necessarily implied from its terms. That it is his function to open the certificates is unquestioned, for it is so expressed; but does that imply the right to count the votes? I am at a loss to perceive how the right to perform a judicial function can be implied from the power to do an act wholly ministerial. Yet the entire argument of those who favor this monstrous assumption, this exercise of a one-man power, is based upon the implication to which I have referred. It cannot be, Mr. Speaker, that the simple duty of "opening the certificates," which, under the Constitution, devolves upon the President of the Senate, carries with it the high function of deciding the various questions which may arise upon the returns, and involving the main question as to what candidate has been elected President of the United States. It is worse than idle to claim that the founders of this Government of the people intended to invest one man with such transcendent powers. The question then recurs, by whom shall the vote be counted? The language of the Constitution is:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

By whom? Manifestly by the Senate and House of Representatives. Else, why the explicit language of the Constitution that the votes shall be counted in the presence of this great co-ordinate branch of the Government? Could it have been intended by the framers of the Constitution, by the men who so jealously guarded the rights of the States and of the people, that their representatives should be idle spectators when questions touching their dearest interests were to be decided? I insist, then, sir, that from the language of the Constitution the Senate and House of Representatives must decide what votes shall be counted. Any other construction is at war with the very spirit of that instrument.

But it is well, Mr. Speaker, in considering this question to know how and by whom the electoral votes have been counted at preceding elections. No serious question requiring discussion or action of Congress arose until the year 1817, upon the occasion of the first election of Monroe. Upon that occasion the two Houses met pursuant to a joint resolution, and tellers were appointed as upon previous occasions. Objection was made to counting the vote of the State of Indiana when it was called, whereupon the Senate retired to its own Chamber and the question was discussed in each body. It was the first time that objection had been made to counting the vote of any State, and in that instance, as it did not change the result, it elicited but little discussion. However, when the joint convention again assembled the vote was, upon motion of Mr. Sharp, a Representative from the State of Kentucky, finally counted. When Mr. Monroe was a second time elected a similar question arose as to the State of Missouri. Upon that occasion Mr. Clay used the following language:

The Constitution required the two Houses to assemble and perform the highest duty that could de olve upon a public body—to ascertain who had been elected by the people to administer their national concerns. In the case of votes coming forward which could not be counted the Constitution was silent, but fortunately the end in that case carried with it the means; the two Houses were called upon to enumerate the votes for President and Vice-President. Of course they were called upon to decide what are votes.

The vote of this State was finally counted, after discussion in the two Houses separately. But, as in the previous instance, the result would not have been changed by the rejection of this vote. The question of the admission of the vote of the State of Michigan was raised in 1837, but was disposed of as in the two instances to which I have referred.

In 1857, when the electoral votes were being counted, objection was made to that of the State of Wisconsin, for the reason that the electors had convened and cast the vote of the State one day after that required by the Constitution. Upon that occasion the following proceedings were had:

Mr. Mason, President of the Senate, presiding over the joint convention of the two Houses, said:

Pursuant to law and in obedience to the concurrent order of the two Houses, the President of the Senate will now proceed to open and count the votes which have been given for a President and Vice-President of the United States, for the term prescribed by the Constitution, to commence on the 4th day of March, 1857. The teller appointed on the part of the Senate and the two tellers appointed on the part of the House will please take the seats assigned them in discharge of their duties.

Pending the count, Senator Cass said:

I suggest that it is better to read the results of the vote, and not the certificates in full, unless the reading of the certificates be called for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Presiding Officer considers that the duty of counting the vote has devolved on the tellers under the concurrent order of the two Houses; and he considers further that the tellers should determine for themselves in what way the votes are verified to them, and read as much as they may think proper to the two Houses assembled.

When the State of Wisconsin was called it appeared from the certificate of the electors that the electoral vote of that State had not been cast on the day required by law. Mr. Letcher, a Representative, said:

If I understood the vote which has just been read, it has not been cast on the day prescribed by law for voting for President and Vice-President of the United States. I do not know what would be proper in a case of this sort; but I desire now to call attention to it in order that the point may be brought to the attention of the country. The time may come when it would be a matter of importance to have these votes in regular shape. I desire, so far as I am concerned now, as a Representative of the people, to present my objection to the reception of this vote.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I suppose, Mr. President, the proper way would be for the tellers to report the facts to the convention of the two Houses, and let them decide.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The presiding officer so considers.

Senator Crittenden said:

I shall not presume before Congress to occupy a moment's time with argument. I wish merely to say that the sense of duty, an honorable sense of duty I have no doubt, upon which the presiding officer has acted in assuming to declare the number of votes, involves the privilege of determining a presidential election, and saying who shall be President. I protest against any such power.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The presiding officer is utterly unaware that he has assumed the exercise of any such power.

Senator Douglas, of Illinois:

I rise to state that, in my opinion, the tellers have no right to authenticate that certificate until the two Houses have passed upon it as to its being a true count. I rise to protest against this joint convention being dissolved until the question which has been raised shall have been decided.

Mr. Mason, President of the Senate:

The presiding officer would again state that the duty of the tellers has not yet been discharged. The tellers, it would appear, made their report before they had signed the certificate. The vote will be again read to the two Houses, and they can determine what shall be done.

Coming down rapidly in this review to 1865, the question then arose as to counting the votes of States then or lately in rebellion. A joint resolution was adopted excluding the votes of all such States except Louisiana and Tennessee. President Lincoln, in giving this joint resolution his approval, sent the following special message to Congress, namely:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives:

The joint resolution declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the electoral college has been signed by the Executive in deference to the view of Congress implied in its passage and presentation to him. In his own view, however, the two Houses of Congress, convened under the twelfth article of the Constitution, have complete power to exclude from the counting all electoral votes deemed by them to be illegal, and it is not competent for the Executive to defeat or obstruct that power by a veto, as would be the case if his action were at all essential in the matter. He disclaims all right of the Executive to interfere in any way in the matter of canvassing or counting the electoral votes, and he also disclaims that by signing said resolution he has expressed any opinion on the recitals of the preamble or any judgment of his own upon the subject of the resolution.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 8, 1865.

Mr. Speaker, if the two Houses of Congress were but idle spectators of this ceremony, as is now so strenuously insisted, where was the "complete power" under the twelfth article of the Constitution to exclude from the counting all electoral votes deemed by them illegal?

Now, sir, the instances cited are conclusive as to the mode of counting the electoral votes from the year 1817 to 1865, a period of almost half a century. During this entire time it was never claimed that the right of counting the votes, deciding what should be counted and what rejected, was a prerogative of the presiding officer of the Senate. Upon the contrary, the right to do so was wholly disclaimed by Mr. Mason in 1857.

The twenty-second joint rule of the Senate and House of Representatives was adopted unanimously by those bodies on the 6th day of February, 1865, and in pursuance of this rule the electoral votes of 1864, 1868, and 1872 were counted. This rule, so clearly asserting the authority of this House, I will read:

The two Houses shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives at the hour of one o'clock p. m., on the second Wednesday in February next succeeding the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be their presiding officer. One teller shall be appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened, by the President of the Senate, the certificates of the electoral votes, and the said tellers, having read the same in the presence and hearing of both Houses then assembled, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from said certificates, and the votes having been counted the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote and the names of the persons, if any, elected, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

If, upon the reading of such certificate by the tellers, any question shall arise in regard to the counting of the votes therein certified, the same having been stated by the presiding officer, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw and said question shall be submitted to that body for its decision, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall in like manner state the question to the House of Representatives for its decision, and no question shall be decided affirmatively, and no vote objected to shall be counted except by the concurring vote of the two Houses, which being obtained the two Houses shall immediately re-assemble and the presiding officer shall then announce the decision of the question submitted, and upon any such question there shall be no debate in either House, and any other question pertinent to the object for which the two Houses are assembled may be submitted and determined in like manner.

But, sir, it is insisted that this rule is not now in force. I refer to it only for the purpose of showing the construction given to the twelfth article of the Constitution by the leaders of both political parties only twelve years ago and the continued acquiescence in that construction until 1873 by those who now seek to discard it. Whether operative at the present time or not it is important to consider it as a clear reflex of the views of political leaders, at a time when no pressing party exigency demanded its abrogation.

Can it then, Mr. Speaker, be gravely argued that, either from the letter or spirit of the Constitution or from the long line of precedents to which I have referred, this power, so important and so far-reaching in its results, rests solely in a single officer, and not in the representatives of the people?

Mr. Speaker, without detaining the House longer with this line of argument, I approach now the discussion of a practical question. The twenty-second joint rule, that regulating the mode of counting the electoral votes, having been declared no longer in force by the Senate, what shall be the mode of procedure adopted by Congress to meet the present exigency in public affairs? A few days hence the electoral votes are to be counted and one of the candidates declared entitled to the high office of President of the United States. Serious differences have arisen between the representatives of the two great political organizations as to the manner of counting these votes and of deciding for whom the votes of certain disputed States shall be counted. Let us now, sir, while yet it is time, look the danger squarely in the face, and if possible adopt some means of averting it. Is it the part of wisdom to approach the very hour when these votes are to be counted and the result declared, with the two political organizations antagonizing each other as to the mode in which this is to be accomplished? The time, sir, for angry discussion has passed. In this hour of public peril patriotism has higher demands upon us than party. For myself I declare that I have no theories upon this subject that I am unwilling to relinquish in the interest of a fair and peaceful adjustment of the question.

What, sir, is the situation? One party demanding that the votes shall be counted by the President of the Senate, the other—and properly as I have no doubt—insisting that this high duty devolves upon both Houses of Congress. In this condition of affairs, with such adverse views maintained in this House and throughout the country, what is to be the solution of the difficulty?

Mr. Speaker, in my humble judgment an adjustment fair and honorable to both of the great political parties and to their respective candidates is to be found in the joint conference bill now pending before this House. Let us, then, for a moment examine this bill and ascertain whether it is calculated to steer the ship of state safely through the dangers which beset it. That there is a pressing necessity for the adoption of some plan by the Senate and House, in order that confusion may be avoided in counting the electoral votes, no sane man can deny. To be availing, it must be adopted now. Delay is dangerous. We cannot, we dare not allow ourselves to drift along until the 14th day of February without having first agreed upon some plan for counting these votes and ascertaining which candidate has been chosen. To do so would be to involve this country in dire confusion. If this Congress fails to discharge this high duty now history will hold it accountable.

The necessity then being urgent for the adoption of some mode of counting the electoral votes, and ascertaining the result, the question recurs whether that presented by the joint committee will fully meet this requirement. It is but a mode of procedure, a substitute for the twenty-second joint rule now declared inoperative. It provides for the establishment of a tribunal to pass upon grave questions, which will necessarily arise in counting the electoral votes; among others, that of which sets of certificates reflect the true voice of the legal voters of Louisiana and Florida. By this tribunal or grand commission all disputed questions must be decided. Manifestly then, if this tribunal be impartial and able, no honest man can complain of its arbitrament. The claim for the Presidency has but slight foundation, which cannot confidently be submitted to such a tribunal. No party can survive its willful defeat of so fair a mode of settling this most difficult question.

How, then, Mr. Speaker, is this grand commission to be constituted? The bill provides that it is to consist of fifteen members, five of whom are to be Senators, five Representatives, and five justices of the Supreme Court of the United States; four of the latter are designated by the bill, and they are to choose the fifth. By viva voce vote the Senate and House, on the 30th day of January, shall each choose its members of the commission. The opportunity at least is afforded of selecting from each political organization men of ability and character, and whose decision will command the respect of the people. Add to the ten thus chosen in equal numbers from the two great political parties five justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and a tribunal is constituted to which the questions involved in the pending controversy are to be submitted. For one, Mr. Speaker, momentous as are the issues involved, I am willing to leave their arbitrament to such a tribunal. The issue presented, and which we are now to meet, is whether this bill shall become a law, this amicable mode of adjustment be adopted, or whether this Government shall drift on, like a ship without chart or compass, until we reach the very hour which may decide the fate of the Republic. For myself, I cannot hesitate as to my duty in this hour.

As to who may be declared President under this bill, I have not stopped to consider. The danger is too great, the occasion too solemn for partisan or selfish considerations to move him upon whom is to rest the responsibility of the adoption or rejection of this measure of adjustment. Gentlemen upon this floor have declared this bill to be a compromise. I have not so regarded it. In no sense is it a surrender of principle. In what important act of legislation has every member of this House been able to incorporate his own peculiar ideas? Of necessity, before a result can be reached which reflects the judgment of this House, concessions must be made upon the one side and upon the other. There could be no legislation were there no yielding of individual opinions, no concessions.

But, sir, if this bill be in reality a compromise, as such I am willing to accept it. More than once in our history as a Government have measures of compromise been adopted in order that the troubled waters might be stilled and the dangers of civil war arrested. Are we wiser or more patriotic in our day and generation than were our fathers? Henry Clay, the grandest of statesmen of the last generation, will have no prouder title in history than that of the great pacificator. Fortunate will it be for us, and for those who come after us, Mr. Speaker, if no occasion hereafter arise in our history when conciliation, concession, compromise are necessary to dispel the clouds that may gather over our horizon.

Sir, the passage of this bill, the peaceable adjustment of the presidential question, and the acquiescence by forty-five millions of American freemen in the result, will be a marked era in our history. It will demonstrate to the world the capacity of our people for self-government. Hereafter we need have no fears for the perpetuity of our institutions. This measure, which ushers in the second century of our history as a republic, is but an earnest of the glories which will crown it in the future. As such I hail it; as such will it meet a response in the great American heart. Sir, differ as we may as to candidates and measures, yet, thank God, when questions arise touching the safety of this Government party creeds and candidates are alike forgotten.

Mr. Speaker, this measure is the harbinger of peace. Indispensable to our material prosperity, to our welfare, to our happiness, is good order, stable government, "liberty regulated by law." A contest by arms to secure the presidential succession will result in the destruction of our form of government. Civil war is a remedy for no evil. Already has it desolated a large portion of this fair land, and left its dark shadow in every home and heart. Let peace then return, and with it will come material prosperity to all our people and the era of concord and fraternal affection throughout all sections of this great Republic.

Peace in the quiet dales,
Made rankly fertile by the blood of men,
Peace in the woodland and the lonely glen,
Peace in the peopled vales;
Peace on the farthest seas,
Peace in our sheltered bays and ample streams,
Peace where'er our starry banner gleams,
And peace in every breeze;
Peace on the whirring marts,
Peace where the scholar thinks, the hunter roams;
Peace, God of Peace, peace, peace in all our homes,
And all our hearts.

Counting the Electoral Vote.

REMARKS OF HON. R. A. HATCHER,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 25, 1877,

On the bill (S. No. 1153) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877.

Mr. HATCHER. Mr. Speaker, presuming that every member of this House has his mind firmly made up as to the vote which he will give upon this most important measure, I have no hope that anything I can say will influence the action of others. But regarding the passage of this bill as one of the most important events in our nation's history, and the vote I shall give upon it the most important act of my official life, I desire to put upon record the reasons which influence me in giving it as I propose to do.

I believe, as fully and firmly as I believe in my own existence, that Tilden and Hendricks have been fairly and legally elected President and Vice-President of the United States. I believe that, by frauds the most daring and astounding, they have been deprived of the electoral votes of the two States of Florida and Louisiana which, being falsely and fraudulently counted for Hayes and Wheeler, give the latter, on the face of the returns of the whole electoral vote of the United States, a majority of 1.

The fact that these outrages of the infamous returning boards, by which this fraudulent result has been brought about, have been indorsed and commended—if not encouraged and incited—by men high in position and authority in the republican party warrants me in believing the charge so often publicly and persistently made that there is a determined and powerful conspiracy to count in the defeated candidates at all hazards.

There are some who pretend to believe and there are some who honestly do believe that the President of the Senate has the exclusive authority not only to count but to determine the validity of the electoral votes deposited with him as such officer, and will insist upon such an illegal count by him. There are those also who believe that there is no authority in either or both Houses of Congress to go behind those electoral returns and examine into the fraud or irregularities by which they were brought about, and who insist that such votes when properly certified must be taken as they appear on the face of such returns, and that in this instance such a view of the law necessarily elects Hayes and Wheeler.

Many, very many democrats, satisfied that Tilden and Hendricks were fairly and honestly elected, yet believing that the attempt will be made to deprive them of their offices by the frauds referred to, are determined that such an attempt shall not be consummated without resistance, and that an effort equally vigorous and determined shall be made to count in Tilden and Hendricks, and secure to them the fruits of the victory so fairly and justly won by the democrats at the election in November.

There are others who claim that by reason of the constitutional ineligibility of Watts, claiming to be one of the electors for Oregon, that State has cast but two electoral votes; and therefore giving to Hayes and Wheeler the votes of Florida and Louisiana and all other votes claimed for them, there is a tie in the electoral vote, and thereby the present House of Representatives is authorized and required to elect a President and the Senate a Vice-President, in which case the House as now constituted would elect Tilden President, and the Senate would elect Wheeler Vice-President.

Thus by reason of such conflicting views and propositions the political condition of the country has become critical and the minds of the people are filled with anxiety and alarm. The business of the country is depressed, unrest and foreboding fill the public mind, and no one is entirely at ease. Although I do not regard civil war as probable, yet the dread vision of it harrows many minds and it is yet among the possible issues of ill-advised and passionate councils.

The people of my State, and especially of my district, do not desire war. They have seen and felt enough of it. Since the late war they have experienced some of the troubles, but not to the same extent as those which have afflicted and cursed the State of Louisiana. They know what it is to be cheated out of the result of fair and honest elections by open, bare-faced, brazen fraud. They know something of the infamies which an unprincipled canvassing board can perpetrate.

By a returning board of one an infamous constitution, disfranchising thousands of her best native-born citizens, driving male and female teachers from their peaceful avocation, ministers from the pulpit, and lawyers from the practice of their profession—rejected by the popular vote—was fastened upon them; and under it priests and preachers, sisters teaching in convents, and lawyers attempting the practice of their profession were dragged before courts and harassed with indictments and prosecutions, and some of them fined and imprisoned only because they refused to take an infamous oath prescribed by that infamous constitution which with the name of its author linked thereto will live in odious remembrance as long as our State has a history or a name.

But not only did this returning board of one member, one secretary of state, fraudulently and basely fasten this constitution upon the people of the State, but under it he exercised as arbitrary and despotic power and practiced as villainous and barefaced frauds in setting aside peaceable, legal, and honest elections of Congressmen, legislators, judges, and other officers as ever was practiced in Louisiana or elsewhere. But yet the people of Missouri did not go to war, they waited and worked, and biding their time appealed to the honor, the patriotism, and sense of justice of the people of the State of all political parties. To the eternal honor of those appealed to be it said, the appeal was not in vain, and republicans by thousands, calling themselves "liberal republicans" and showing themselves indeed to be liberal republicans, arrayed themselves against that terrible engine of oppression and cruelty, and giving relief to the oppressed and disfranchised citizens of the State, consigned "Rodman the counter" and the "Drake constitution" alike to perpetual execration and infamous memory. With this example of patience and perseverance and of manly appeal to the honest people of the country before them, my people are again "disposed to suffer while evils are sufferable," rather than plunge the country into all the horrors of another terrible and desolating civil war.

But, sir, such an appeal has already been made in reference to the complications growing out of the late presidential election, and what is the result? The result is one which shows that when an appeal of this sort is made to the honor and patriotism of the people such appeal is not in vain. For what do we now behold? Men who were strongly arrayed against each other in the late excited and bitter presidential canvass, men who have been arrayed against each other in party strife in both Houses of Congress, men known to be pronounced and decided in their political feelings and sentiments, seeing the exigency which was upon the country, ignored party and party strife; forgetting their political animosities and repressing their desire for party success; have arisen to the height of the great occasion, and coming together as patriots, as statesmen and Americans, have devised a way of honorable escape from the dangers which threaten the country, and with a unanimity as sublime as it is surprising have agreed upon a plan for submitting the matters in controversy to a tribunal whose decision none will dare to question or impeach. That plan is contained in the bill now before us. Believing it constitutional; believing it to be just, fair, and honorable; believing that it will accomplish the purpose for which it is intended, I shall give it my hearty support.

Another reason why I shall give it my cordial support is that by the action and example of the joint committee which reported this bill the spirit of cruel persecution, the unnatural hates and sectional bitterness which were so successfully and extensively evoked by northern partisans toward the people of the South, will be allayed; concord, harmony, and fraternity will be restored; and result as it may, whether Tilden or Hayes be inaugurated, the so-called "bloody shirt" will be buried past resurrection. Amen. So mote it be.

The Florida Election.

SPEECH OF HON. JERE N. WILLIAMS,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 12, 1877,

On the decision of the electoral commission in the case of Florida.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, as I voted against the bill to establish this electoral commission, it is not inappropriate to mention some of the reasons that determine my vote against the approval of its decision by the House.

The Senate has already concurred, and we in this wing of the Capitol know but too well that our objection will avail nothing under the law; yet we have the privilege of protest against wrong, and we use that privilege in expressing not alone our individual convictions, but the stern sentiment, as we understand it, of a large majority of the American people.

Mr. Speaker, to say that the decision upon which we are now to pass is a disappointment is no adequate utterance of the feeling of the people whose agents and servants we are. There is in the great popular heart but little tolerance for the spirit born of cunning and sharpened by intrigue that would defeat the popular will through the agency of quibbles and technicalities.

Honest public sentiment demands equity in the adjustment of public right, and he who would evade or foil such a demand but too surely invites the pursuit of a sleepless, tireless, remorseless avenger, the inevitable judgment of a defrauded country.

In the consideration of questions affecting public interests the people desire not law alone, but justice; and of the two the latter is certainly not the least, for law is of mortal device, while justice, though administered by human hands, is not of human manufacture. But we had reason to believe and we did believe that the conclusions of the commission would be both sanctioned by law and fortified by justice. We were mistaken. Justice has no place in the result. It was reasonably expected that the State of Florida would be allowed to show literal facts at least; that certain persons claiming to be electors were not appointed at all, and that certain others whose right is denied were and are the lawfully authorized electors for the State. Not only was this expected, but it was a matter of right. Nor did this question affect the State of Florida alone; it was a matter of vital concern to the country at large. It was indispensable to the cause of truth and right at home that the State should not be given over to the deeds of spurious officials, but the importance of the matter took a far higher and wider range when the administration of the General Government was thrown into the balance.

The State of Florida says that Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphreys, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long are not her electors, because they were not appointed by her people, but that Wilkinson Call, James E. Yonge, Robert B. Hilton, and Robert Bullock are her electors regularly and legally appointed; and she sought opportunity to establish before the commission the truth of her assertion by stubborn and undeniable facts. She solicited an examination, that the truth might be made known to the world. She did not hide her steps nor skulk along devious ways, but her course was open, bold, and upright. She submitted questions of fact and demanded a fair and honest ascertainment. This was all she sought, and by the act of submission she was pledged to abide the finding. Can the most inveterate partisan say that there was anything wrong in this? Was not the State right in asking that the truth should be known and the public preference established? And especially ought the inquiry to have been made, when thirty-seven other States and all the millions of American citizens had the right not only to know the truth but to have that truth declared.

And yet what has happened? The request is refused, and four men, in the face of the blinding charge that they "were designated as electors by the returning board of said State corruptly and fraudulently, in disregard of law and with the intent to defeat the will of the people," are allowed virtually to determine who shall be President of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, there is an old-fashioned idea that fraud vitiates every transaction into which it enters. And it has been a custom of legal tribunals to institute rigorous inquiry when fraud was charged, and papers, processes, certificates, sealed instruments, all had to undergo the test. To tear out fraud, wherever found, and destroy its baleful power has been a part of the high mission of all courts and tribunals that had anything to do with either public or private right. But the ruling practice in these later days seems to be tending in a different direction, and a seal is held to give sanctity to any depth of villainy, or at least to cover and protect it from exposure. The people thought that this high commission, chosen with such deep solicitude, would see to it that the title of the coming Administration should be as pure as the unstained snow, and they were satisfied to rest a disputed cause in their hands.

But how is this expectation met? Not by a judgment that fraud shall have no part in determining the Presidency, but by the adverse declaration that there shall be no proof of fraud, however deep and pervading it may have been. And thus it results that these four men, whose authority, it is alleged, has no other prop than the rottenness of consummate fraud, are allowed to cast the vote of the State against her express action and against the will of her people. This is the more remarkable, in view of the present situation in Florida, where a democratic administration, recognized and even assured by a republican court, wields authority derived from the very election under which these pretended republican electors claim their right.

Mr. Speaker, the decision of this commission will never convince the people of the United States that the same voters that elected Governor Drew and a democratic Legislature in the State of Florida did not also cast their ballots for Tilden and Hendricks. If they did not and if the republican electors had a fair and honest majority in that State, why not satisfy the country that such is the fact? The proof could be easily made if the republican claim is valid, and it would quiet this deep and prevailing dissatisfaction; but no, the investigation is dodged and avoided by every device that professional ingenuity can suggest, and the people are refused the poor privilege of showing what choice they made. Who believes that investigation would be denied if Hayes and Wheeler had received a majority in Florida? Nobody is simple enough to indulge such a thought for a moment. The republicans themselves would throw wide the doors and invite the closest scrutiny.

No skillful pleadings would be interposed against the demand of the country, nor would a great party quiver with the torturing dread that some right of the State was in danger.

This professed devotion to State rights is a new thing with the republican party, and it comes into strange contrast with the work of that party through two committees recently appointed in the other wing of this Capitol, one of which is now engaged in investigating the elections in my own State running back for several years. A party that has habitually treated the rights of the States as a mockery, a thing to be trampled upon at pleasure, can hardly expect sensible people to believe in the sincerity of this sudden conversion. It is a stretch of audacity beyond the compass of any other than republican genius to preach the doctrine of State rights while the bayonet is still at the breast of South Carolina and the minions of Federal power still run a wild riot amid the ruins of Louisiana.

No, sir; it is a bald pretense, made for the purpose of covering the infamous deeds by which the rights of two States have been overthrown, and, sad to say, it promises to succeed through the judgment of this commission. It seems almost incredible that events now transpiring can be real. Such things could not happen if the public sensibilities had not been blunted by the repeated abuses of republican administration. The picture that forces itself upon every man's mind is indeed a startling one. Four men profess to speak the authorized voice of a State, while the State herself stands by denying their right and begging simply to show the facts as they happened. The State begs to make it known that these four are not her chosen agents, that their office is usurped and their certificate a lie, while the majority of the commission, echoing the voice of the republican party, answer: O, no; we will not allow you to make such proof, because to do so would infringe your rights as a State.

And thus, Mr. Speaker, the end is rapidly approaching. In all probability the people will very soon see a man inaugurated President whom they did not elect, whose title to a position which has been justly esteemed the proudest on earth will have no warrant except in the frauds of the returning boards in Florida and Louisiana.

Although events are swiftly passing they leave their traces deep in the popular mind, and it will be out of the power of the now expected administration to clear its skirts before a people so wronged or to suppress the loathing that must attend its every step.

The American people have been in the habit of choosing their Chief Magistrates, not of having it done or suffering it done by a few puppets of chance, whose highest claim to notice is their fitness for crime. But we are in the midst of a change, and that sovereign power which was thought to be "inherent" in the people seems to have been surrendered. It is true a great struggle has been made, and the people, knowing that they had expressed their choice by a popular majority of a quarter of a million, and by a million majority of the laboring, tax-paying, burden-bearing white men of the land, thought they had named their President; but it seems that they were mistaken. A few creatures in two States, lurking for a time and perfecting their schemes in the thick shades of corruption, have come boldly forward and declared their own choice, and thus far the judgment of the commission is all that they could ask.

It need not be feared, Mr. Speaker, that revolution or disturbance will follow this usurpation. We of the South have grown accustomed to wrong, and the great democratic party of the North and West will see the fruits of honest victory robbed from their grasp at the behests of villainy as black as the slime of perdition, but they will do no violence. Let me say that I have no words of vituperation for the members of the commission, whose judgment has so signally fortified the returning boards of Florida and Louisiana. I do not impung their motives. But I do say that their action is not what the people expected, nor what they had a right to expect. The people sought to know which candidate was fairly elected, and the situation was such that nothing less than a full disclosure from two disputed States could give them satisfactory information. This information is put out of reach by the decision of the commission, and the returning boards have triumphed.

The demoralization that flows from the mistaken judgment of a tribunal from whose utterance the people expected a grand and final rebuke to crime must necessarily be serious. Already men here and there are despairing of the perpetuity of republican government. The present party, miscalled republican, may delight in the result foreshadowed, and they may revel under an administration dictated and established by a few men in Florida and Louisiana, but they who now cheat the people will reap the inevitable whirlwind of that people's condemnation.

As to the few creatures in these two States, whose ready instrumentality has brought this dark shadow across the face of a fair land, but little need be said. They have courted a place in history, and they have it; they have sought the pillory, and there they stand, conspicuous objects for the "slow, unmoving finger of scorn;" and when their faces and forms are forgotten, the memory of their deeds will continue to live in the contempt and detestation of every honest American citizen.

The Recent Election in Louisiana.

SPEECH OF HON. CHARLES H. JOYCE,

OF VERMONT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 9, 1877,

On the report of the select committee to investigate the recent election in Louisiana.

Mr. JOYCE. Mr. Speaker, the situation of political affairs in the State of Louisiana has been a prominent subject of solicitude and interest, and the unsettled condition of her people has engaged the earnest and anxious attention of the best men of the whole country for many years, but never so much so perhaps as at the present moment, when her electoral vote may decide the question of the presidential succession and determine the policy of the Government for the next four years.

The work of investigating the policy and conduct of the democracy in that unfortunate State, "their ways that are dark and their tricks that are vain," commenced soon after the close of the war, and has continued, with but slight intermissions, down to the present time.

Reams of testimony have been taken by congressional committees, setting forth all the acts of barbarism and horrid crimes committed by the Knights of the White Camelia, the White League, the Ku Klux Klans, and the Regulators, and volumes of reports written condemning their atrocious cruelties and calling upon the Government to suppress them by force, and render succor to those it had solemnly promised to protect. Yet, notwithstanding all this, the demon of murder, violence, and intimidation has received no apparent check, but, on the contrary, has rather seemed to increase in strength and grow and fatten upon the blood and tears its own crimes have furnished, until, in the last political campaign, it broke in savage rage over all bounds of law, order, and common humanity, and reached the sublime climax of refined cruelty and barbarism.

The escutcheon of that unhappy State is tarnished with dark and bloody spots which dim the luster of her fame and cast a shade of sorrow and darkness over her whole history. For years she has been cursed with a class of vicious and desperate men, who have kept society in a feverish and choleric state, filled the land with crime and violence, set at defiance the regularly constituted authorities of the government, and rendered life, liberty, and property unsafe and insecure.

New Orleans, the hot-bed of treason, licentiousness, and crime, is the heart of Louisiana from which issues forth, at every pulsation, streams which corrupt and poison the whole body-politic. It has been, and is now, to Louisiana what Paris is, and always has been, to France: the fountain-head of every sedition and revolution and a city of refuge for every criminal and vagabond.

When the war closed business was prostrate, trade had vanished, and society was completely disorganized. Her plantations and cotton-fields were laid waste, her levees deserted, and desolation reigned throughout all her borders.

By the wisdom and clemency of the republican party a magnanimous system of reconstruction was adopted and inagurated, which if it had been honestly accepted and carried out by the people of the South would have accomplished the most beneficial results. But the people of Louisiana were among the first and most determined in rejecting the policy of reconstruction, and in spurning and resisting every offer of peace and reconciliation from the General Government.

This opposition in the presidential campaign of 1868 took the shape of a secret and armed political society known as the Knights of the White Camelia. This society, composed entirely of white democrats, thoroughly organized, with oaths, ritual, and constitution, had its branches in almost every parish in the State, and was the means of creating a wide-spread and intense feeling of alarm and terror not only among colored, but among white republicans also.

Men of all professions, trades, and avocations bound themselves in resolutions and clubs to proscribe, in business and employment, every man who dared to vote against the democratic party, and the democratic newspapers of the State sustained them, and in many cases advocated violence and bloodshed, if necessary, to accomplish their purpose.

As the fruit of the inauguration and advocacy of this "shot-gun policy," during the political canvass of 1868, "from September until November, five horrible massacres of colored people were perpetrated by the democrats. On the 28th of September, 1868, in the parish of Saint Landry, a massacre occurred of colored people, which lasted from three to six days, and during which from two hundred to three hundred people were killed; between the 20th and 30th of September, a similar massacre occurred in the parish of Bossier, which lasted from three to four days, during which over two hundred colored people were killed; in the parish of Caddo, in the month of October, over forty colored people were killed; in the parish of Jefferson, in the month of October, forty persons were killed and wounded; in the parish of Saint Bernard, in the month of October, another horrible massacre occurred, which lasted for three days, during which over one hundred people were killed and wounded; in the parish of Orleans, in the months of September and October, two attacks were made upon republican processions, during which about sixty persons were killed; in the parish of Saint Mary, in October, 1868, the sheriff and parish judge, both republicans, were publicly assassinated at their houses by an armed body of men in the town of Franklin. Similar acts of violence and other outrages were perpetrated upon colored and white republicans in thirty-five parishes of the State. The total summing up of the murders that took place for political reasons in the months of September, October, and November, 1868, as taken from official sources, is over one thousand persons."

The result of this violence and bloodshed was also shown by the republican vote in November in twenty-eight of the parishes, as compared with the official registration of republican voters in that year; the registration showing 47,923 republican voters, while General Grant received only 5,360 votes for President.

The same bloody scenes which disgraced the history and people of Louisiana in 1868 were followed up and repeated, to some extent, in the following years by the massacre of one hundred colored men in cold blood at Colfax in 1873, the wholesale slaughter at Coushatta, and the riots in New Orleans, besides the great number of homicides and assassinations committed in all parts of the State; whereby more than ten thousand men have been murdered since 1866 for no other known reason only that they were republicans and dared to vote that ticket.

The facts which I have given, and the figures taken from the official records, would of themselves establish conclusively and beyond all doubt, in the mind of every candid person, the fact that the republican vote in these parishes was forcibly and violently suppressed, and that the colored men were either compelled to vote the democratic ticket or remain away from the polls.

But these facts become still more apparent when we find that these same parishes gave a republican vote of 35,010 in 1870, of 36,666 in 1872, and of 33,518 in 1874; years when there was no preconcerted and general system of violence or intimidation of the colored people by white democrats in those particular parishes, but they were left measurably free to select and vote the ticket of their choice.

This but confirms and strengthens the fact so often sworn to by witnesses before the committee, that the colored man, when left free and uninfluenced, will always vote the republican ticket.

They may compel him by terror to vote a democratic ticket; they may compel him for self-protection and self-interest combined to join a democratic club; they may frighten him from the polls and prevent his voting, but he knows and they know that the instant he is let alone, the moment the load of fear is taken off, the moment he dare stand up in his own right and his own strength, free to think, free to act, and free to choose, that moment he stands ready and willing to vote the republican ticket.

In the campaign of 1876 it was deemed of vital importance, by Mr. Tilden and his friends, to carry the State of Louisiana, in order to secure what had been promised and what all the greedy democrats hoped for, the vote of a solid and united South.

To accomplish this result and make sure of the prize, the democracy, with characteristic shrewdness and cunning, selected fifteen parishes which in 1870 gave a republican vote of 9,354, in 1872 a vote of 12,555, and in 1874 of 10,216, for their operations, and in these fifteen parishes, under the reign of terror caused by shooting, hanging, and whipping colored men, which they organized and carried on during the canvass, only 5,758 republican votes were cast at the November election.

The late political campaign in Louisiana on the part of the democratic party was ably conducted by men who knew well the character of the people with whom they had to deal, and who had no hesitation or conscientious scruples against resorting to any means or measures which proffered the least hope or promise of success. These men knew that, although the services of the various secret political societies in the State had not been called into requisition to any considerable extent in any campaign since 1868, yet that they were all as thoroughly organized, disciplined, and armed, under the new name of White League, as they were in that disgraceful canvass, and only awaited the orders of their chiefs to call them forth from their dens and set them at their cruel and bloody work. Accordingly, at the very threshold of the campaign, a "confidential circular" was issued from their headquarters by the State democratic central committee, in which they say:

We recommend that in conversations with each other no gloomy forebodings shall be indulged in, and that the result of the coming election shall be spoken of as a foregone conclusion, as we have the means of carrying the election and intend to use them. But be careful to say and do nothing that can be construed into a threat or intimidation of any character. You cannot convince a negro's reason, but you can impress him by positive statements continually repeated.

We recommend that clubs shall be formed in different sections of the parish, of which there shall be frequent meetings, and as often as may be convenient a central meeting of all the clubs. That occasionally the ward clubs should form at their several places of meeting, and proceed thence on horseback to the central rendezvous. Such meetings would tend to produce harmony, besides being an occasion for amusement and interesting ceremonies. Proceedings of this character would impress the negroes with a sense of your united strength. They have been taught that they greatly outnumber you; such meetings would convince them of their error.

We recommend that on the day of the election, at each polling-place, there shall be affidavits prepared to the effect that there has been no intimidation and no disturbance on account of any effort by the democratic-conservative party to prevent any one from voting on account of "race, color, or previous condition of servitude." Should there be any disturbance, the affidavits, made subsequently thereto, should set forth its cause and origin.

We recommend that at every political meeting of the opposite party several gentlemen should be present and take notes of the proceedings, and especially of any threats on their part against the white people or of any appeal made to the negroes by any white man of an incendiary character.

Here we find the plan upon which the campaign is to be conducted upon the part of the democrats carefully set forth by the grand sachems of the party at New Orleans, and the threat made that they "have the means of carrying the election and intend to use them." How thoroughly and completely this plan was executed and carried out by the democracy of Louisiana, in all its details, from the commencement of the unequal contest down to its disgraceful close on the 7th of November, we shall soon learn from the testimony taken by the committee, to a small part of which I will call the attention of the House and the country before I get through.

But before I take up that part of my subject I desire to call attention to some of the legal points involved in this investigation in order that this House and the country may understand precisely the ground we occupy, and why we claim that the conclusions and judgment of the State returning board are conclusive upon the question of the appointment of presidential electors.

With the wisdom or policy of the law which created this returning board, and under which they acted, we have nothing to do. If it was not in conflict with any of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States or of the State of Louisiana, its expediency is a question for the people of that State to determine; the same power that created it can repeal it, and we have no doubt that when the qualified electors of that State become convinced that it has outlived the days of its usefulness they will thank God for the good it has done and wipe it from the statute-book. But while it is in force and has the constitutional sanction of the supreme court of that State it must be executed, and we are all bound by its provisions, however unwise we may deem them to be or however much they may conflict with our ideas of the way to arrive at an honest determination of a grave and important question.

When the Legislature of Louisiana met in 1869, the scenes of murder and violence which had transpired in 1868 were fresh in their memories. The men who composed that Legislature knew that:

The first essential element of an election is freedom of choice. That the ticket voted is not the vote, nor is the ticket in the ballot-box the vote. That what constitutes the ticket in the ballot-box a vote is the act of the voter in putting it in the box, at the lawfully appointed time, before the lawfully appointed officers for that purpose, and of his own free will and choice; and that force and violence at an election render such election to all intents and purposes null and void.

They knew also that "secret political and semi-military associations, violent political feeling, and the absence of all the usual restraints of law and social order" had revolutionized "by wholesale violence whole parishes and made the elections held therein a mere mockery and farce," lacking every requisite of a fair and honest election.

The facts as to democratic violence and intimidation in the previous election and its effect upon the colored voters in the State stood forth undisputed, and the only problem to be solved was how the difficulty could be remedied and where the authority could be safely and constitutionally lodged to "ascertain this nullity before the returns were duly made and declared."

The result of all the deliberations and discussions on the subject, in the light of the facts I have stated, was the laws now in force in that State, and under and by virtue of which the returning board canvassed and counted the vote of Louisiana for presidential electors in the late election.

When it was notorious that in 1868 whole parishes in Louisiana had been forcibly revolutionized by wholesale and reckless violence, and the elections held therein were mere mockeries, lacking in every essential attribute of an election properly so called, was it not wise to devise sone remedy for a state of things that struck directly at the root of free institutions, nullified the will of the majority, and gave the prize of political success to the men of the party who cared least for the holiness of life and who forced their way to power by the rope, the whip, and the bullet?

The provisions of the law bearing especially upon the matter I am now considering are as follows:

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, &c., That five persons, to be elected by the senate from all political parties, shall be the returning officers for all elections in the State, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum and have power to make the returns of all election. In case of any vacancy, by death, resignation, or otherwise, by either of the board, then the vacancy shall be filled by the residue of the board of returning officers. The returning officers shall, after each election, before entering upon their duties, take and subscribe to the following oath before a judge of the supreme or any district court:

"I, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully and diligently perform the duties of a returning officer, as prescribed by law; that I will carefully and honestly canvass and compile the statements of the votes, and make a true and correct return of the election: so help me God."

Within ten days after the closing of the election said returning officers shall meet in New Orleans to canvass and compile the statements of votes made by the commissioners of election, and make returns of the election to the secretary of state. They shall continue in session until such returns have been compiled. The presiding officer shall at such meeting open in the presence of the said returning officers the statements of the commissioners of election, and the said returning officers shall, from said statements, canvass and compile the returns of the election in duplicate; one copy of such returns they shall file in the office of the secretary of state and of one copy they shall make public proclamation by printing in the official journal and such other newspapers as they may deem proper, declaring the names of all persons and officers voted for, the number of votes for each person, and the names of the persons who have been duly and lawfully elected. The returns of the elections thus made and promulgated shall be prima facie evidence in all courts of justice and before all civil officers, until set aside after a contest according to law, of the right of any person named therein to hold and exercise the office to which he shall by such return be declared elected. The governor shall, within thirty days thereafter, issue commissions to all officers thus declared elected, who are required by law to be commissioned.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, &c., That in such canvass and compilation the returning officers shall observe the following order: They shall compile first the statements from all polls or voting-places at which there shall have been a fair, free, and peaceable registration and election. Whenever, from any poll or voting-place, there shall be received the statement of any supervisor of registration or commissioner of election, in form as required by section 26 of this act, on affidavit of three or more citizens, of any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, which prevented, or tended to prevent, a fair, free, and peaceable vote of all qualified electors entitled to vote at such poll or voting-place, such returning officers shall not canvass, count, or compile the statements of votes from such poll or voting-place until the statements from all other polls or voting-places shall have been canvassed and compiled. The returning officers shall then proceed to investigate the statements of riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences at any such poll or voting-place; and if from the evidence of such statement they shall be convinced that such riot, tumults, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did not materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting-place, or did not prevent a sufficient number of qualified voters thereat from registering or voting to materially change the result of the election, then, and not otherwise, said returning officers shall canvass and compile the vote of such poll or voting-place with those previously canvassed and compiled; but if said returning officers shall not be fully satisfied thereof, it shall be their duty to examine further testimony in regard thereto, and to this end they shall have power to send for persons and papers. If, after such examination, the said returning officers shall be convinced that said riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting-place, or did prevent a sufficient number of the qualified electors thereat from registering and voting to materially change the result of the election, then the said returning officers shall not canvass or compile the statement of the votes of such poll or voting-place, but shall exclude it from their their returns: Provided, That any person interested in said election by reason of being a candidate for office shall be allowed a hearing before said returning officers upon making application within the time allowed for the forwarding of the returns of said election.

SEC. 26. Be it further enacted, &c., That in any parish, precinct, ward, city, or town in which, during the time of registration, or revision of registration, or on any day of election there shall be any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences at any place within said parish, or at or near any poll or voting-place or place of registration, or revision of registration, which riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences shall prevent or tend to prevent a fair, free, peaceable, and full vote of all the qualified electors of said parish, precinct, ward, city, or town, it shall be the duty of the commissioners of election, if such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences occur on the day of election, or of the supervision of registration of the parish, if they occur during the time of registration or revision of registration, to make in duplicate and under oath a clear and full statement of all the facts relating thereto, and of the effect produced by such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences in preventing a fair, free, peaceable, and full registration or election, and of the number of qualified electors deterred by such riots, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences from registering or voting, which statement shall also be corroborated under oath by three respectable citizens, qualified electors of the parish. When such statement is made by a commissioner of election or a supervisor of registration he shall forward it in duplicate to the supervisor of registration of the parish, if in the city of New Orleans to the secretary of state, one copy of which, if made to the supervisor of registration, shall be forwarded by him to the returning officers provided for in section 2 of this act, when he makes the returns of election in his parish.

It is said that—

Laws always reflect the condition of the society for which they are made, and laws for the prevention and punishment of crime necessarily imply the existence of such crime; and thus the special features of the Louisiana statutes to prevent and punish intimidation and violence at elections are the most conclusive evidence of the existence of the evil sought to be corrected.

The Legislature of Louisiana, knowing all the fearful facts, did devise a remedy, and they did well in so doing.

Their legislation is to be defended, because it is in strict conformity to the theory of free elections and according to the rules of the common law of liberty.

All authorities in England and America agree that violence and force used at an election to affect the result render such election null and void,

Standing on that great principle, the Legislature said, in substance, to the violent men of the State, "If you use force and violence, terror and intimidation, to impair the freedom of an election, you shall not reap the fruits of your wrong-doing, but the whole poll thus tainted with crime shall go for naught."

Under the provisions of this act and the general laws regulating the registration of voters and the holding of elections, after a bitter and violent canvass on the part of the democratic party and the thorough intimidation of a large proportion of the Republican voters, the farce of an election was gone through with on the 7th of November, the issue and result of which can be best described in the language of one who was upon the ground, a careful and anxious observer of all that transpired. He says:

I will simply add that the question with regard to certain parishes of this State known as the bull-dozed parishes, is not whether their votes shall be counted out or counted in; it is whether the tickets deposited in the ballot-boxes in these parishes on the day of the election were votes or not votes. I believe that if a true and impartial history of the events which have occurred in any one of these parishes should be given, which should include an account of the secret or open armed political societies; which should include a history of the murders, whippings, assassinations, burnings, and other acts of outrage and violence traceable directly to political reasons and committed for political objects; which should also include the evidence of the colored people of those parishes themselves as to attempts made to force them to join democratic clubs and to vote the democratic ticket or to abstain from voting the republican ticket; and which should also include a tabular statement of the census and registration and previous votes of these parishes, it will appear conclusively to every candid and impartial mind that the occurrences of 1868 have been repeated in these parishes in 1876, and that in law and in fact there was no election at most of the polls in these parishes, and that the ballot-boxes, instead of containing votes, contain simply the records of an organized, premeditated, and deliberate system of violence and intimidation such as has no parallel in any other State of the Union, excepting those States where the difference in population and the political lines drawn between the populations are similar to those existing here.

At the close of this pretended election the returns of votes were made to the returning board by the commissioners of election and supervisors of registration, the necessary papers were filed protesting against the counting of the votes from the bull-dozed polls and parishes, all the provisions of the law were substantially complied with, and the board proceeded in accordance with the terms of the statute to canvass the returns, examine the papers, hear evidence, pass upon the votes, and declare the result.

The question as presented to the returning board took the form of a legal controversy on issues of law and fact.

The leading issue was whether there had been such violence and intimidation in certain parishes and polls as would invalidate the election held in those localities and require the returning board to omit such polls from their returns.

The board held their meetings in a public place in the city of New Orleans, and extended a special invitation to prominent gentlemen of both political parties to be present at the count, to examine the papers and returns and see that everything was properly and legally done. This invitation was accompanied with an offer to permit stenographic reporters selected by each committee to be present and make a full report of all proceedings and testimony.

And those gentlemen in their report to the President say that—

In justice to the board it should be stated that this privilege was freely accorded by its members without solicitation, and that they cordially united with us in the desire to have all their proceedings published throughout the country. The scrutiny invited by the board has been constantly exercised. Day by day both committees have been in attendance before the board with their stenographic reporters; and, in addition, a privilege tendered to both the committees of inviting gentlemen from States other than Louisiana has been several times availed of. As returns were opened, whether contested or not, the papers inclosed have been freely tendered to the committees for examination, and have usually been carefully inspected. And, as a means of detecting any possible changes in the returns after leaving their respective parishes, both committees were furnished by the respective parties with statement of the vote as claimed by them respectively, that by comparison it might be known if any alteration had been made in returns to be passed upon by the board, with which statement the returns usually agreed. Whenever it was known to the board that a return was to be contested, the attorneys for the candidates interested were sent for to be present at the ceremony of opening; and when such knowledge was attainable only by inspection of the inside of the package containing such return, these attorneys were invited to be present before any action was taken upon it. There were thus secured in the manner mentioned publicity of all the proceedings of the board, the most careful scrutiny of every package of returns by it opened, and an opportunity for candidates insisting upon the validity of returns to appear personally and by counsel before the board, in many instances before returns were opened and in every instance before action was taken upon them.

It has been, we believe, quite unusual to give such full and wide-spread publicity to the proceeding of a returning board, nor do we think that better means for permanently recording every word and act of its members while engaged in the discharge of their duties could have been afforded than we enjoyed.

Thus, after a long time spent in canvassing the returns, counting the votes, receiving evidence, hearing arguments of counsel upon both sides and for all parties interested, and the most thorough and careful deliberation, the board found a majority of the legal votes cast for the electoral ticket of Hayes and Wheeler, and in due time declared them elected, and the proper certificate and credentials were furnished them by the governor of the State in accordance with the provisions of the law and the Constitution.

Now, sir, I claim that the powers of that returning board under the laws and judicial decisions of Louisiana in canvassing the returns of votes and declaring the results are at least quasi-judicial; that they are a board constituted by law to pass upon certain questions and issues of fact; that in their determination of these questions they exercise their judgments and discretion; that the same presumptions should be made in favor of the regularity and correctness of their decisions that are made in favor of the findings of any court; and that their judgment upon this question of fact as to whether votes shall be counted or excluded under section 3 of the act of 1872 is final and conclusive and from which there can be under the law no appeal.

In all the States of the Union, so far as known, there is a tribunal of final adjudication which canvasses and declares the result of all elections, and, in fact, some such tribunal appears to be of absolute necessity in the very nature of things; and that tribunal, by whatever name it may be denominated, is a State tribunal. Its powers vary in different States, according to the demands of the situation and the provisions of law by which it is governed, but all of them have power to examine, to correct, or for lawful cause to throw out the original returns.

In all the States of the Union, so far as known, there is a tribunal of final adjudication which canvasses and declares the result of all elections, and, in fact, some such tribunal appears to be of absolute necessity in the very nature of things; and that tribunal, by whatever name it may be denominated, is a State tribunal. Its powers vary in different States, according to the demands of the situation and the provisions of law by which it is governed, but all of them have power to examine, to correct, or for lawful cause to throw out the original returns.

In the State of Louisiana this tribunal has by law been invested with very large powers and provided with a special jurisdiction, and is known to the laws of the State as the board of returning officers of election.

With the reasons which induced the Legislature to confer this remarkable jurisdiction we have nothing to do. It is sufficient that they have done so, and we have no doubt that the history of the State will show a necessity existing for the constitution of the board and the grant of power.

The object in this case, as in all others, in this State, must be presumed to be to guarantee the freedom of elections. At all events the action of the State Legislature in the matter is in our judgment final and conclusive.

To this board, under the existing laws, the returns of election for presidential electors came up for revision along with and as an inseparable part of the proceedings at the last general election.

Having thus lawfully become a subject-matter on which this board had a right to act, these and all other election returns have been passed upon by the board. This board has performed the duty with which they were charged by the law, and that duty is not merely ministerial; it is in the nature of a judicial proceeding. They have heard testimony, examined evidence, and rendered judgment. That judgment, under the laws of Louisiana, is from the tribunal of last resort, and from it no appeal lies, nor is there anywhere provided either the power or the means of re-examination. It is final and conclusive.

The question comes whether the House of Representatives of the United States possesses any power or right under the Constitution to go behind this finding of the board, to examine into the reasons of their decision, to review, remodel, or reverse the judgment of this body constituted under the laws of Louisiana, or in any way to impair, diminish, or defeat rights which they have declared to be established. It is a question of vast import and pregnant with the most serious consequences, not only in relation to Louisiana, but as to all the States of this Union.

If the decisions of the canvassing or returning board of Louisiana may be impeached by the House of Representatives in relation to electors, so it may be done in Ohio, Illinois, New York, and Massachusetts, for though there may be differences of degree in the powers of the canvassers in the several States, there is no difference in principle, nor can one doctrine be held as to one State and the contrary as to another.

The consequences of such an assumption of power are far-reaching and infinitely perilous. If such a power exists it must be found in the Constitution, either by express form of words or by necessary implication. No one can point to the express grant, and we can find no portion of the Constitution from which on any known rule of interpretation it can fairly be implied.

The language of the statute is clear and specific. After giving full instructions as to how the votes shall be compiled and returned to the board by the returning officers, it says:

The returning officers shall then proceed to investigate the statements of riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, orcorrupt influences at any such poll or voting-place; and if from the evidence of such statement they shall be convinced that such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did not materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting-place, or did not prevent a sufficient number of qualified voters thereat from registering or voting to materially change the result of the election, then, and not otherwise, said returning officers shall canvass and compile the vote of such poll or voting-place with those previously canvassed and compiled; but if said returning officers shall not be fully satisfied thereof, it shall be their duty to examine further testimony in regard thereto, and to this end they shall have power to send for persons and papers. If, after such examination, the said returning officers shall be convinced that said riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting-place, or did prevent a sufficient number of the qualified electors thereat from registering and voting to materially change the result of the election, then the said returning officers shall not canvass or compile the statement of the votes of such poll or voting-place, but shall exclude it from their returns.

This is, Mr. Speaker, a grave and vital question in this investigation which of course every man must decide for himself on an inspection of the statute under the test of the well-settled rules of constitutional and statutory construction and the intent of its framers as indicated by the history of the times and condition of affairs when it was passed. In this view, it seems to me, there can scarcely be a doubt that the position we take is correct, and is well sustained by reason, authority, and prudence.

I shall not attempt to defend the law or the returning board. It was "a political necessity which called them into existence, devised to meet and counteract violence against which no ordinary guard would suffice, and provided by law to protect the most inoffensive race against the most warlike. The law is founded on the principle that the only adequate protection against violence is to render violence fruitless.

"This it does as far as practicable, without counting votes not cast, (which it will not permit,) and until a better method be devised it is justified by necessity.

"The act as it stands was passed by the concurrence of all parties, and it has been used by all parties. It was signed by Governor Warmoth in order to elect Mr. Greeley, and first used to that end. The present members of the board were appointed by the State senate as republicans and conservatives. The democratic member resigned at the instance of his party. The members are two white men, old citizens, of more than average substance and capacity; two free-born natives, of very slight admixture of color—scarcely visible—men of property and more than average intelligence. The bench as it sat appeared to be not unequal to the ordinary duties of the board, though in this crisis we could have wished to see men of the most exalted character and capacity in their places. Yet they were there where the law placed them, in position which no man envied and none desired to assume. They have passed through perils such as would have appalled some men, and temptation such as would have overcome others. They have given judgment as the law required, and that judgment, lawfully given, should command the respect of all good citizens."

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that the laws of Louisiana require that the commissioners of election and supervisors of registration shall in the event of any tumult, riot, or intimidation at or near any polling-place certify the same under oath to be sent forward with their returns, and that such affidavits constitute the complaint, if I may so term it, upon which the board proceeds to examine into the facts; and I am also aware, sir, that the same act provides that if the returning board are not fully satisfied on an inspection of such affidavits in regard to the question of the existence of such tumult, riot, or intimidation, then "it shall be their duty to examine further testimony in regard thereto, and to this end they shall have power to send for persons and papers."

It therefore appears by the terms of this act that the board is not limited to the testimony of the commissioner and supervisor, but when that is unsatisfactory it is made their duty to resort to any other competent evidence, and call before them any witnesses which in their judgment can enlighten them upon the questions before them for consideration and decision.

What the people of this country want to know is, not whether there has been a technical omission under the statute on the part of the returning board, which is of no possible importance to anybody, but whether there was in any of the parishes in the State of Louisiana previous to and during the late canvass such a system of terrorism and intimidation on the part of white democrats toward colored voters as to materially change the result of the election; and whether there was sufficient evidence before the returning board to justify the exclusion of the votes which were left out of the count by them,

If the people can be satisfied upon these points they will care very little by whom the evidence was furnished or where it came from, provided it was competent and true. Upon these points it seems to me, sir, that a mere reference to the evidence used before the committee, and published in the report of Senator SHERMAN and others, to the President, will satisfy the most incredulous, and convince any reasonable man that the board were fully justified in excluding every vote they did from the bull-dozed parishes.

The next question which arises is as to the power of Congress over the election or appointment of presidential electors.

The resolution under which this investigation originated and has proceeded directed the committee to investigate the recent election in Louisiana "and the action of the returning or canvassing board in said State in reference thereto, and to report all the facts essential to an honest return of the votes received by the electors of the said State for President and Vice-President of the United States, and to a fair understanding thereof by the people, and whether the electoral vote of said State should be counted."

The Constitution of the United States provides in section 1, article 2, that "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress."

The act of Congress of January, 1845, provides that each State may by law provide for the filling of any vacancies which may occur in its college of electors when such college meets to give its electoral vote.

By the statute of Louisiana presidential electors are elected on a general ticket in the same manner as the other State officers, the votes for whom are canvassed and the result declared by the returning board under the same regulations to which I have before referred. Thus it will appear conclusively that Louisiana, under the power conferred by the Constitution on the States, has assumed jurisdiction over the mode and manner of electing presidential electors, and has by her Legislature declared:

First. That such electors shall be appointed by election.

Second. That such elections shall be part of the general elections of the State, and shall be held and conducted in the manner and form provided by law for general State elections.

Third. That the board of returning officers shall be the returning officers for all elections in the State, and have power to make returns for all elections.

Fourth. That such returns so made by them and promulgated shall be prima facie evidence until set aside by judgment of a court on a trial of the right of some person by them declared to be elected to office.

And this law has received the construction and the approval of the supreme court of the State.

In the case of Collin vs. Knoblock, Louisiana Annual Reports, page 263, the supreme court, Taliaferro, J., delivering the opinion, say:

"The returns made by a legal State board, and officially promulgated by that board as the general returning officers for the State at large, constitute the basis upon which the governor is authorized to issue commissions. These returns by the statute of 16th March, 1870, are made prima facie evidence in all courts of justice and before all civil officers until set aside after a contest according to law, of the right of any person named therein to hold and exercise the office to which he shall by such return be declared elected.

Again in the same case the court say:

"The act of 1870, No. 100, approved March 16, 1870, is the general law under which the elections held at the general election in November, 1872, were conducted, and which controlled, as to the formalities of revising and compiling the returns from every part of the State, and the making and promulgating the final report.

Again, in the same volume of the reports, in the case of Bonner vs. Lynch, page 267, the supreme court say:

"But it is said that the returns are only prima facie proof of the result of an election. That is true. The question, however, as to the election of officers is a political question, and courts of justice have jurisdiction over them only so far as the political department may have authorized them to exercise jurisdiction. If there were no statute authorizing the trial of contested-election cases before courts, they would be without authority to do so.—13 Annual, 90.

"No statute conferring upon the courts the power to try cases of contested elections or title to office authorizes them to revise the action of the returning board. If we were to assume that prerogative, we should have to go still further, and revise the returns of the supervisors of elections, examine the right of voters to vote, and in short, the courts would become in regard to such cases mere offices for counting, reporting, and compiling election returns. * * * Having no power to revise the action of the board of returning officers, we have nothing to do with the reasons or grounds upon which they arrived at their conclusions."

In another case in the same volume of reports the court decides that the act of 1872, No. 98, does not destroy the board of returning officers by its repealing clause, but merely modifies the form of appointment. (State ex rel. Attorney-General vs. Wharton, pages 10 and 11.)

The highest tribunal known to the constitution of Louisiana, a tribunal whose decisions on State law must be followed by the Supreme Court of the United States, has thus affirmed and sustained the powers and rights of the returning board, has affirmed the right of the Legislature to create it and invest it with its powers, and sustained its action.

The control of the State of Louisiana over the subject under the Constitution is as exclusive as that of New York or any other State, and both the acts of her Legislature and the decisions of her courts are as complete in authority as those of any other State.

The supreme court of the State denies its power to revise the proceedings of the board or to inquire into the reasons or grounds on which they arrived at their conclusions.

Thus, by the provisions of the Constitution, the act of Congress, the laws of Louisiana, and the judgment of the joint high commission, the whole power over the appointment of electors is vested in the State, and in the case under consideration they were elected in accordance with the laws of Louisiana, their duties were defined by State laws, they acted in strict conformity to the statute, and Congress has no power to go behind their returns or question their judgment.

The views I entertain upon this question are so fully and clearly stated in the protest filed by the minority against the jurisdiction of the committee to investigate the matter of the appointment of presidential electors, and the findings of the State returning board in relation thereto, that I shall venture to refer to it at some length. In that protest it is said:

It appears by the provisions of the Constitution of the United States that the purpose of creating the electoral college was to provide a body wholly within the control of the States and wholly without the control of the Federal authority in any form. It seems evident that it was not the purpose of the framers of the Constitution to submit the choice of the President and Vice-President to a popular vote, nor even to what we now understand by an election.

A body of men were to be selected by "appointment," who should exercise the privilege of choice upon their own personal judgment, for these high officers. It was to be an intermediate and independent body.

This is evident from the whole scope of the articles relating to electors, and is almost necessarily implied in the title of the office—for they were to be electors—and to be an elector means to have freedom of choice.

But the most important inquiry bearing upon the present subject is, how are these electors to be "appointed" under the Constitution and where is vested the power of scrutiny into their election in States where that mode of appointment has been adopted.

To our minds the Constitution is specific and clear: "Each State shall appoint," &c., "in such manner as the Legislature may by law direct."

No other power can appoint.

And the State may adopt any mode of appointment that it chooses to select, for the power of the Legislature as to the mode is absolutely without limit. The only reservation is that they shall not hold any office under the United States.

It would seem that the most sedulous care had been taken to affirm in this particular case the doctrine of State rights and an inspection of the debates will show the reasons given at the time.

In the particular case before us the State of Louisiana has thought proper to select a popular election as the mode of appointing electors, and this is an exercise of constitutional power clearly within their competency, and in conformity with the drift of public opinion.

The election of presidential electors occurs under the law at the same time with the State elections, and by the law the names of all persons voted for for all offices are upon a single ballot. All are governed by the same law, received by the same officials, counted and ascertained by the same tribunals, declared by the same authority, and the whole process, from registration to the publication of the result and the commissioning of the candidates declared elected, is entirely under the State laws, administered by State officers, and determined by State authority.

If then we are correct in this view, that the whole tenor and meaning of the constitution implies a deliberate and purposed surrender of the electoral question so far as relates to their appointment to the States; if we are further correct in our view, that where the mode of appointment is by popular election the scrutiny and final determination of such election is under the control of the States, and that such scrutiny and final determination has in fact been had in pursuance of the laws of Louisiana, and that no fair intendment of the Constitution of the United States gives to the Congress the right to open that judgment or set aside that verdict, it would seem very clear that there is nothing before this committee on which it has a right to act.

Having now, as I believe, disposed of all the legal propositions arising in this investigation, I might, with great propriety and confidence, stop here and rest my case upon the conclusive authorities which have been presented. But as testimony was taken notwithstanding the protest, I propose now to examine the evidence submitted to the committee with a view of ascertaining whether, in the late political canvass in Louisiana, such a system of violence and intimidation of colored men was carried on by white democrats as to materially change the result of the election in that State, and justify the State returning board in excluding from their count the said several polls in said parishes, and also whether the electoral vote of said State should be counted for Hayes and Wheeler.

I should be glad, Mr. Speaker, if I had time, and the House had the time and patience, to refer briefly to a large part of the testimony, not only that taken by the committee but also that used before the returning board, but it is not possible to do so, and I am compelled to restrict myself to the testimony of a few among the large number of witnesses from each of the parishes allotted to the subcommittee of which I was a member for investigation.

Let us hear now what these men say:

ALEXANDER STEPHENS GILBERT.

Question. Where do you live?
Answer. In the parish of East Baton Rouge.
Q. How long have you lived there?
A. I have lived there since 1870.
Q. What part of Baton Rouge Parish do you live in?
A. I live about three miles and a half from the city of Baton Rouge, on the plank road, or Clinton road.
Q. State whether there were any armed organizations of democrats in your parish.
A. There was an armed body, or armed bodies of men, known as bull-dozers or regulators.
Q. How many companies were there that you knew of?
A. I do not know of any particular company; I have seen them in large bodies on the public road.
Q. What were they doing when you saw them?
A. I have seen them riding on the public roads sometimes with their guns. Very often I saw them out at night on the public road in large bodies.
Q. What was their conduct at night?
A. They were visiting colored people's houses or cabins there and giving them orders to leave.
Q. What were the politics of those bull-dozers?
A. They were democrats.
Q. What were your politics?
A. I was a republican.
Q. State whether they ever visited your house.
A. Yes.
Q. When?
A. They visited my house on the night of the 5th day of September last, about ten or half after ten o'clock.
Q. What effect had these proceedings of the bull-dozers upon the republicans with reference to the frequency of their meetings?
A. We could not get up a meeting; we could not get the people to go. What few did go were always frightened; they said if they went to the meeting that day they would be bull-dozed that night.
Q. Did this riding the country over by the bull-dozers have the effect of preventing the republicans from conducting their campaign as they usually do?
A. Yes, sir; it had a great effect. Before they commenced bull-dozing I could get on my horse at twelve o'clock at night, or any other time of night, and ride to town or to any other part of the parish without fear. After they commenced bull-dozing I did not get out of my place after sundown.
Q. Why was that?
A. Because I was afraid of meeting these men on the road. Sometimes I would be late in getting out home from town, and I would meet those men on the road in squads; I would always give them the road, and get by them that way, and go on home.
Q. State whether or not you organized a republican club.
A. I did, in the third ward.
Q. What became of that republican club?
A. It was broken up by the bull-dozers.
Q. State the effect upon the mass of the colored people.
The WITNESS. It had a great effect. It prevented them from attending the meetings, and it prevented them from voting the republican ticket.
Q. Who were those? White men?
A. They were all white men.
Q. Were they democrats?
A. They were democrats. Right in my neighborhood there they visited cabin after cabin, and notified the colored men that if they did not come to their meetings, at such and such times, they would come for them.
Q. Democratic meetings?
A. Yes, sir; they held their meetings and notified the colored people that they must attend those meetings; and when they went they had to sign a roll, pledging themselves to support the democratic ticket; if they did not, they could not live there.

WILLIAM WADE.

Question. Where do you live, Mr. Wade?
Answer. At East Baton Rouge.
Q. How long have you lived there?
A. I have been living there six years; but I have been living in the parish eleven years. I have lived fourteen miles from Baton Rouge six years on Robert Jones's place.
Q. What are your politics?
A. Well, sir, my politics is this—is republican.
Q. Will you state whether or not any armed bodies of men paraded about Baton Rouge Parish during this year, 1876?
A. They passed through my place twice; once when I was there.
Q. I ask you whether there was any such armed bodies of men?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How many do you know of?
A. Well, sir, I could not tell you how many that I know was together, only once.
Q. What were their politics?
A. Well, sir, what their politics was I judge from their actions, which was to hang and kill all the republicans out, as far as I could see in the matter. And there was two more men who live on the same place, only it was a dividing line, struck——
Q. Just answer my question. I do not ask you about that. I will come to that by and by. What were these companies called?
A. O, they were called bull-dozers and regulators.
Q. What was the effect of this conduct on the colored men there?
A. I can mighty quick tell you the effect on me.
Q. Let us have the effect on you, then?
A. It was because they never had any charge—because Mr. Young told my wife it was only inside of a month that they ever had any charge against me. Well, I never had done anything at all. I know that it was on the inside of a month that I held that meeting there.
Q. What meeting?
A. A political meeting.
Q. A republican meeting?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Now state whether or not the negroes were frightened by these things that you say occurred.
The WITNESS. Of course I know they was; I have no thinking to do at all about it.
Q. What were the politics of the colored people up there if they would have been left to themselves?
A. Why, my gracious alive, you can't find—I don't believe you could find a dozen democrats among them in the whole parish.

I now desire to get the attention of the House to some notices sent to Ben Morgan, the coroner in the parish of East Baton Rouge, in the summer of 1876, relating to the political murders then being committed in that parish:

Mr. BEN MORGAN, Coroner:

You will please bear in mind that your absence is required in the country, and I further inform you that if you are caught therein any more your fate shall be as those you came to hold your inquests over.

Yours, truly, CAPTAIN OF THE REGULATORS.

BENJAMIN F. MORGAN:

I notify you, as coroner of East Baton Rouge, if you come out here any more to take down any of the signs, you will be captured and will be served the same as these people you have been cutting down.

These notices need no comment; the democracy began to be alarmed at the effect which such wholesale slaughter of innocent men for political purposes would have upon the country if they allowed them to be made public by a coroner's inquest.

WILLIAM DUPLESSIS.

Question. Where do you reside?
Answer. In the parish of East Baton Rouge.
Q. How long have you lived there?
A. I have lived there all my life—about twenty-four years.
Q. Which ward do you live in?
A. The first ward.
Q. You may state what you know in reference to bands of armed men traversing that parish before the last election.
A. Prior to the last election I was placed on the canvassing committee of the parish of East Baton Rouge to go to the parish, and, if possible, to organize republican clubs; and in our attempts to organize republican clubs we was interfered with by bands of white men who styled themselves as bull-dozers. I had occasion at one time to go in the sixth ward of the parish of East Baton Rouge to make a speech on a Saturday, and during the time of my speech I was interfered with by white men, who drew out their pistols, &c., and called me "a God damned dirty liar," and that no such things occurred in Texas; it was in connection with a circular which was issued in Texas that our party used as campaign documents—the republican party in the parish of East Baton Rouge. And then we were to have a meeting the following day in the seventh ward. These gentlemen then threatened Mr. Gilbert and myself if we should come down there we should be assassinated, if we would attempt to get up on the stand to make a speech; or, in other words, that they would kill us anyhow if we came down there.

Q. Who made these threats?

A. Mr. Jos. Manson, William Bates, and a gentleman named Kleinpeter. I did not want to get in no fuss, for I feared that they would assassinate me in some way; so then we went to the tenth ward the following Saturday, and when we got to the tenth ward we met fifteen or twenty of these men thereat who pursued after us until we got to the place of meeting, and when we got there they were there. We wanted to have a meeting but the colored men seeing these men come there following us up, through fear, they broke up in a body. A great many broke and run through the woods, saying that if they would stay there the consequence would be they would have to leave their places; that they had either had to connect their names with the democratic party and vote that ticket or leave their places. And a young gentleman by the name of Morgan and myself, thinking our lives also was not safe by being there, we proceeded on to the twelfth ward; we were to have meetings in the tenth and twelfth wards, both on the same day. When we got to the tenth ward, we hadn't been there more than fifteen minutes, before our crowd got there, when I seen we had to go to Baton Rouge, these men still pursuing us. We waited a while to see, and we looked, and they was about three hundred yards from us, and we put spurs to our horses, and this young man Morgan and myself pursued on to town—we continued on to town. These gentlemen followed us through the third to tenth, from the tenth to the twelfth, from the twelfth to the first ward in the parish of East Baton Rouge, whooping and holloing and going on at a terrible rate.

Q. How many were they of them?

A. About twenty-five or thirty of them.

Q. Were they armed or not?

A. Yes, sir, they were; one was armed with a sixteen-shooter; others had revolvers.

Q. What was the feeling among the colored people in reference to these outrages?

A. They had a great dissatisfaction, sir; they knew they could not vote the republican ticket. I have had numbers of them come to me and say, "Here, I want to vote the republican ticket; would like to vote the republican ticket, but you know my condition. I have to live in the country any way; I have got a family; and they are not going to let me vote it. I have paid money on my land, and if I vote the republican ticket I will be slaughtered like as a dog. Of course I will have to vote the democratic ticket in order to protect my life and property."

Q. What was the effect of this fear on their vote on election day?

A. It caused us to lose from twelve to thirteen hundred republican votes in the parish.

Q. How was it in reference to their sleeping out of their houses for fear they might be assaulted or killed if they remained in them?

A. I heard numbers of them say they had to do it to protect themselves from the regulators. There was a German by the name of Isadore Herren——

Q. How was it with yourself?

A. I have not lived in the house where I staid now for nearly four months, though I was bred and born there.

Q. Why?

A. For fear of being assassinated.

Q. Do you know of colored men voting the democratic ticket through fear at the last election?

A. The only thing I know, what I stated before, that they all wanted to vote the republican ticket, but through fear of being assassinated or killed they voted the democratic ticket; those who could not—a great many of them—left the parish, and others would not vote at all.

Q. What do you know about them being compelled to join democratic clubs?

A. I know nothing, only what I heard. I have known of colored men who received a coffin and a gallows on the side of the coffin, stating to them, if you do not join the democratic party by such and such a time the consequence will be, you will receive the contents of this circular—not circular, but a note written, put in with the coffin and gallows.

J. R. BROOK.

Question. State your age.

Answer. Thirty-eight.

Q. What is your rank in the Army?

A. Lieutenant-colonel of the Third Infantry and brevet brigadier-general of the United States Army.

Q. Where were you located in the summer and autumn of 1876?

A. At Baton Rouge, Louisiana.

Q. What was your command?

A. The district of Baton Rouge, composed of six parishes of Louisiana and three counties of Mississippi.

Q. Are you acquainted with the condition of the territory within your command as to peace and order during the last political campaign?

A. Yes.

Q. State what it was, and all about it, fully.

A. I am more particularly acquainted with the situation in East Baton Rouge and East Feliciana; West Feliciana not so particularly; also, very slightly with Livingston, Saint Helena, and Tangipahoa, those being the parishes under my command.

In East Baton Rouge and East Feliciana there seemed to be a systematic organization of the whites, or democratic party, which had the effect of terrorizing the blacks, who were republicans there, as far as I could ascertain. The cause of the terrorism occurred during the winter and spring last. Clubs of men, designating themselves or designated by others as bull-dozers or regulators, variously, were reported to me as having been in the habit of riding around the country, particularly at night, disguised and armed, taking colored men from their houses, whipping, and killing them by shooting and hanging. After I took command, in the latter part of June, I think about the 27th, there were not so many cases that came to my knowledge. Those of East Feliciana were reported to me by refugees—colored men—one of whom, by the name of Jackson, still had an open bullet-wound in his head, inflicted by a man named Dennison, on the plantation of a man named Riley, in East Feliciana. A great many others in that parish came to me, to the number of fifty or sixty, saying that they were compelled to leave their homes for their personal safety, which was threatened. They averred that it was because they would not join democratic clubs or vote the democratic ticket.

In East Baton Rouge the same things were done or reported to be by many people; and were admitted to be so by the white people of Baton Rouge, to many of whom I spoke, they admitting that there were many things done in the "back country," as they call it, which they did not approve of; but I never could ascertain that they took any other means of checking the disorders. A man named Coleman Brown, about the 1st of July, came to me with a fresh bullet-wound in his thigh, inflicted by a young man by the name of Mansur, near Bayou Manche. Another man came to me some time in August, and said he had been badly whipped and an examination convinced me that that was the case. I had frequent applications for protection and frequent complaints of ill-treatment. The parties making them were sent by me to the civil authorities, and in one or two instances, I think, the civil authorities were successful in apprehending men who committed these acts, and they were bound over to appear in court. About the 1st of September, Paul Johnson, represented to me to be an intelligent colored man—that is, a man who could read and write was taken from his house at night by a band of armed and disguised men, and was never seen afterward alive. His father told me the story the next day; that he had tracked them to some point near the Comite River, and there either lost or gave up the trail. He informed me that a great many other colored men had been taken in that direction; that there were a great many men missing in his region of country, and that he did not know at what hour he would be taken out and treated in the same manner. This point, as near as I can recollect, was near Atkinson's store. Monroe Meachum, a man who, I understood, attended the republican parish convention at Baton Rouge in company with another man named William Wade, returned to his home, and disappeared in a manner somewhat similar to that of Paul Johnson, and, I believe, has never been heard of since.

Q. State what marks, if any, you have ever seen on the persons of men making such complaints.

A. I have seen the marks of wounds by bullets, marks of the whip, and marks of the rope around their necks and around their wrists. They told me it was caused by a rope put around the neck and passed over the pommel of the saddle, and the horse ridden away at too sharp a pace for them to follow without injury. I have no doubt it was the case, for it appeared to be caused by such a thing as that. A woman, also, was hung up and then cut down several times, at a place on the Bayou Sara road, by a party of men who were making the road—repairing the road. The names of the party were given to the civil authorities and efforts were made to arrest them; whether successful or not, I have not learned.

Q. What account, if any, did these parties make to you as to threats that were made use of to cause them to join the democratic party and vote the democratic ticket?

A. They were threatened in various ways: threatened with discharge; threatened with whippings; threatened with death; and the language they used was something of this nature, as near as I can recollect: "It will not be healthy for you to be about here after election if you don't vote with us." In other places the threat was made to women, that they would be whipped so badly that they could not sit down, unless they stopped using their influence in favor of the republican party. Men were threatened that if they went to Baton Rouge to attend a barbecue, and remained there to election, they would not live beyond the Saturday night following. These threats were communicated to me by a great many men; how many I cannot recollect—probably between twenty-five and fifty, and at various times. They would come to me during the day-time and during the night-time. They would come to me as though they did it secretly and cautiously, and would manifest trepidation if they saw any one in citizen's clothing about the post, in the vicinity of my quarters; and in various ways, by their words, their actions, and descriptions of their treatment, and the similarity of their stories, they led me to believe that they had been threatened; and they told me they believed that the people who made those threats would carry them out, and therefore they were afraid.

Q. What account was given you, if any, as to the number of these parties by whom such outrages were committed?

A. From ten men to fifty—those men who rode at night, disguised and armed. They varied; some parties were large, and others smaller; there were not any less than ten, that ever I heard of.

Q. What statements were made to you by these people, if any, as to their sleeping away from their homes at night?

A. All of the colored men who came to me—and while at Baton Rouge I suppose two hundred and fifty men came to me from various parts of the country—said that they had slept away from their houses, in the woods, for weeks at a time, fearful that they would be caught in their houses. They also stated that during the winter or spring last they received notice to deliver up their arms, which were mainly shot-guns, at certain places before a certain time, and that many of them did so deliver.

Q. What effect did these things which you have described have, in your judgment, upon the election and upon the vote of the colored people?

A. It had the effect of deterring a great many colored men from voting. A great many colored men said to me that they feared to vote at all, and that the people in their vicinity—in their "settlements," as they call the little clearings they have in that region—felt that it was the general feeling in their particular localities that the blacks feared the consequences of voting the republican ticket and vowed that they would not vote the democratic ticket.

Q. From what you saw, what was the character of the democratic organization in those parishes?

A. It was formed into clubs, with, as near as I could see, a military organization. They would speak of a man as the "captain" of this or that club. I saw one procession—a torch-light procession in Baton Rouge—and it seemed to me that they had a regular military organization. In June last, about the middle of June, I was coming down the river from Vicksburgh, and in passing by Port Hudson, or shortly after passing it, I observed a body of armed men on the boat. I inquired who they were and what they were doing, and they told me that there was a party of negroes intrenched upon a hill at Mount Pleasant plantation, and that these men were going down the river in the steamer and were going to land below the plantation and flank the position. That party, of about seventy men, armed with shot-guns, rifles, and pistols, were certainly organized in a military manner. They moved according to military tactics. Where the party got on I do not remember. I was not up at the time they got on; it was very early in the morning. When they got off the boat they marched right in the direction of Mount Pleasant plantation. I have understood afterward that there were some six hundred whites congregated there. It was Sunday morning. What they did was published througout the country in the papers at the time. I afterward, when I took command of the district of Baton Rouge, made inquiry, and as near as I could learn, there were four men hung on the cross-bar of a gate at that plantation.

Q. State what you noticed of the military character of the organization of the democrats at other times than that, if anything; state what you know yourself and what was reported to you, distinguishing the one from the other.

A. I never saw those parties on their "raids," as they were called, personally. My subordinate commanders have reported that, in the execution of orders given by me, they had been stopped while traveling by night by parties whom they denominated "pickets" or "patrols," on the public roads. The name, business, and designation were inquired, and in all ways these pickets conducted themselves as though upon regular military duty. This was in East Feliciana. In West Feliciana the organization was made by wards, and they appeared to have captains and lieutenants in each of their organizations.

Q. How about arms?

A. They were armed with shot-guns, pistols, Winchester rifles, as far as I could hear.

L. B. JENKS.

My name is L. B. Jenks. I am thirty-six years old. My residence is Bayou Sara, in the parish of West Feliciana, and I am a lawyer by profession.

I was the nominee and candidate of the republican party of the parish of West Feliciana for the office and position of parish judge.

I know from my personal knowledge of the often-expressed determination on the part of leading democrats in the parish to prevent any organization of the republican party in said parish, to prohibit any canvass by republicans, and to prevent the formation of any republican clubs therein. I have heard this determination expressed by many prominent democrats, notable among whom was Ex-Governor R. C. Wickliffe.

From information received, and as matters of general and public notoriety, I can state that the parish was patrolled at intervals during the six months preceding the election by bands of armed white men, acting avowedly in the interest of the democratic party, who by their lawless acts of violence, such as whipping, hanging, and shooting to death colored men who were more or less prominent in the republican party, produced such a general condition of affright and terroism among the colored republican voters that, excepting at a central point like the court-house at Saint Francisville, and an isolated and almost inaccessible one, like the Acklen places in the seventh ward, an election would be a mockery and farce, so far as pertaining to a free, fair, and full expression of popular sentiment.

In my opinion, had there been a peaceable and fair election in said parish, the result would have shown a majority of over one thousand votes in favor of the republican party.

STATEMENT OF JOHN S. DULA.

I am parish judge of my parish, (parish of West Feliciana.) For the last year there has been an organized band of white democrats, styling themselves bull-dozers and regulators, who patrolled the entire, and, by threats, acts of violence, and burning houses, have intimidated the colored people to such an extent that few have the hardihood to openly declare themselves republicans. These parties I have seen and speak of what I know. About a year ago, about the 25th of October, 1875, about three hundred regulators, all armed with shot-guns, rifles, and pistols, who I was notified came to demand my resignation as parish judge. About eight o'clock I shut my store and went to the residence of a friend, and shortly afterward they broke into my store, gutted it, and left with a colored man, an acquaintance of mine, a resignation to the governor of my office of judge, and left word that unles I resigned it by the next day at four o'clock they would take my life. I sent them a refusal, and took boat for the city of New Orleans, where I remained for three months. I then returned, and after heard it remarked that the damned radical officials must leave the parish if they value their lives. For the three months just before the election the parish has been patrolled by the bull-dozers. About the 1st of May last, 1876, about fifty or sixty armed democrats rushed into the court-house where I was holding court, and the republican members of the police jury were summoned and commanded to resign at once on pain of death, which they did. There has been several murders within the last three months, one of whom, Isaac Mitchell, a prominent republican, but who was an inoffensive man, and who held no official position, who owned his own farm and worked it, and who attended to his own business, but who refused openly to join the democratic clubs and rebuked colored men who did so. He was taken out of his bed about four o'clock in the night and beat over the head with clubs in the presence of his wife and children, and when nearly dead and stunned was shot and left lying dead in his door-yard. John Russell, another colored republican, who held no official position, worked his own farm, had an excellent reputation, but was too stanch in his political opinions to be induced to join a democratic club—the bull-dozers came to his cabin about the middle of the night and broke open his door. When he heard them coming he jumped into an empty pork barrel to hide, where he was riddled with bullets and left to his wife and children. A colored boy, Hurd, who refused to join a democratic club, was whipped nearly to death, then turned off and run out of the parish. I. Hunt Anoth and various others have been whipped and run away. These and similar acts of intimidation have struck terror to the hearts of the colored men of Feliciana, and because they valued the lives of their wives, children, and their own, that they have voted the democratic ticket, not, as many of them said to me, because they wished to do so, but because they had no other alternative.

W. D. POSTLETHWAITE.

I am thirty years of age and have resided for the last two or three months in the parish of West Feliciana, Louisiana. I have been employed during the greater part of this year as reporter on the New Orleans Times newspaper, but resigned my position when I became a candidate for office.

I was candidate for the office of sheriff on the republican ticket in the parish of West Feliciana.

I was raised in West Feliciana, and am well acquainted with the people of all colors. On the day of the last election I was present at the fourth-ward poll and the election there that day was peaceable, as I have already stated at the request of a democratic committee of the parish. On the Sunday night previous to the election, the 5th of November, 1876, armed bodies of white democrats rode about visiting all or nearly all of the plantations in the fourth ward. They were reported to have severely whipped a colored man in the next place to my house; and their conduct generally was such as to terrify all the colored people in the neighborhood, and compelled many of them to vote the democratic ticket against their wishes. And the general reign of terror prevailing throughout the whole parish of West Feliciana for two or three months previous to the election, brought about by the bull-dozers, operated and continued in force up to and during the day of election.

The colored people of the fourth-ward poll and throughout the parish were impressed by the violent acts of the democratic bull-dozers that it would be exile or death to vote the republican ticket. While there was on election day a show of peace and liberty of action the conviction of danger was still present with most of the republican electors, and they voted under a duress as compelling as if they had been marched to the polls by force, and the same duress operated to compel the colored men to sign certificates of a fair and free election in the parish.

On the day of election a prominent colored republican took charge of some republican tickets at my request for distribution; after making active efforts to induce the colored people to receive and vote the ticket, he came back to me and reported that it was no use, the colored people wanted to vote that ticket but were afraid. At a large gathering on the Sunday previous, November 5, at Beech Grove Church, it was unanimously resolved among the colored people to vote the ticket on election day, and I believe they would have done so but for a raid of the bull-dozers that so terrified them that nothing could have induced them to vote the republican ticket. At the same poll a democrat was appointed to keep a list of all the colored voters and how they voted; and but for this, many of those who voted the democratic ticket would have voted the republican ticket. The officers of the democratic clubs had repeatedly warned the colored people that only those who voted the democratic ticket would get protection from the regulators, and that every man would be watched and marked on the day of election as to how he voted. Such acts as I have already stated, and many others of a violent nature, which occurred in my parish during the two or three months just preceding the last general election, brought about a condition of terror among the colored men, and such acts of violence were calculated and did make the colored people vote the democratic ticket against their wishes. I am satisfied that had there been a fair election in West Feliciana, the parish would have given a republican majority of at least 500 votes.

GEORGE A. J. SWAYZE.

I am thirty-one years old; I live in the parish of West Feliciana, where I was born and have always lived; I am a deputy sheriff of said parish.

I know that during the year preceding the election the general condition of public affairs was very unsettled throughout the parish in consequence of individuals banding themselves together, and organizing squads or companies, and perpetrating acts of violence and intimidation against the colored people.

For more than a year preceding the election, bands of armed men, styled regulators and bull-dozers, patrolled the parish at intervals, and committed acts of intimidation and violence, ranging from threatenings of punishments, graduating to whippings and hanging, and culminating in the most atrocious and horrid murders. These movements were inaugurated in September, 1875, and were followed at irregular though frequent intervals until the night of the day preceding the election.

The effect of the foregoing was to inaugurate a reign of terror among the colored voters throughout the parish against whom these demonstrations were made and to whom they were principally confined.

I know that threats conveying the idea of the severest punishment were made against the colored voters to prevent them voting the republican ticket.

The republican party was not permitted to effect an organization throughout the parish. The causes preventing this were the whippings, hangings, and murders inflicted upon the colored men by the bull-dozers and regulators, whose fiat was pronounced with especial reference to the prevention of this object on the part of the republican party in the parish.

If the republican party had been permitted to effect an organization in said parish and if the election had been fair, free, and peaceable, the result would have given a clear majority of over 1,000 in favor of the republican party.

Gilbert Carter was shot to death on the night of the 11th July, by the bull-dozers. In the month of September, Ephraim Armstrong was shot and killed by a white man, name unknown, and on the night of the 28th of September, Ike Mitchell, in his own house, was inhumanly beaten and repeatedly shot, from the effect of which he died next morning. These are matters of general and public notoriety. In the case of Mitchell, the bull-dozers were recognized by his wife, some of whom endeavored to conceal their faces with improvised masks.

The effect of these murders was to frighten and terrorize the colored voters of the parish, especially so in the neighborhood of their occurrence, to the extent that scarcely any of them had the temerity to openly proclaim themselves republicans, and very few dared to vote the republican ticket, and many, very many, were forced to vote the democratic ticket against their will and conscience.

There were many republicans discharged from employment for having attended republican meetings. Five families were discharged from the employ and driven from the plantation of Dr. William Ball; some from the employ of William Hormrich, and nine from the coal-yard; all from the reason above stated.

Many colored men were discharged from employment for having voted the republican ticket. John Smith, my brother-in-law, was discharged by Jeff. Hamilton; one man by Dr. Woods; one family by C. B. Smith, and many others, some who had been warned and threatened with discharge.

WASHINGTON SPOONER.

I am twenty-seven years old and I live in the tenth ward, parish of West Feliciana. I was born and raised in said parish, and have lived there all my life, excepting from August, 1863, to January, 1866, during which time I was a soldier in the Federal Army. I am a laboring farmer by occupation.

I know of several acts of intimidation and violence in my neighborhood preceding the election, calculated to prevent a free and fair election.

I know from information received and as a matter of notoriety that Jubal Hunt, March Grey, and Ben. Baker were severely whipped at different times in my neighborhood preceding the election. I have no personal knowledge as to the cause therefor, but from general belief can state that in the case of Jubal Hunt the causes which led to his being whipped were his repeated public avowals of his fidelity to the principles of the republican party and his determination not to join a democratic club or vote the democratic ticket. The effect of these whippings was to frighten the colored voters of the tenth ward and deter them from organizing republican clubs or voting the republican ticket.

On Sunday night, November 5, instant, a band of about ten armed men rode through the Bush Hill plantation, where I reside. They were armed with pistols, shot-guns, and Winchester rifles. I saw them again the next morning at the store of H. C. Lopez; among them I recognized one Jake Rowe, who was addressed by the others as "captain." I also recognized John Black, Ben. Cursey, and one Dickerson or Dickam, and Alf. Riley. The effect of this raid was to thoroughly frighten and intimidate the colored voters of the neighborhood.

The colored voters of this neighborhood were repeatedly threatened with violence if they voted the republican ticket. I was warned and threatened by John J. Barrow, democratic candidate for sheriff, that if I voted the republican ticket I should not be permitted to live on the Bush Hill plantation where I was born and now reside. H. C. Lopez threatened me that, if I voted or any other republican voted the republican ticket, we should be made to leave the parish or be killed.

I was a commissioner of election at the Brick Church poll in the tenth ward.

I saw several white men, all democrats, near and around the polling-places, and inside the church where the polls were held, and the effect of this was to frighten the republican voters, and prevented them from voting the republican ticket.

I am well acquainted in the tenth ward, and know nearly all of the colored voters, and, from intimate relations and conversations with them, I know them nearly all to be republicans, sincerely, conscientiously. I do not know of more than six colored democrats who ever profess to be such among their own race and color.

The result of the vote at the poll in the tenth ward was 323 democratic votes and 1 republican vote. In 1874 the result was 99 democratic votes and 167 republican votes.

I did not consider it safe for a colored man to openly vote the republican ticket at the Brick Church poll.

I do not consider it would have been safe for any man, white or colored, to have openly supported the republican party in the tenth ward of West Feliciana Parish.

RILEY NORFLISS.

I am twenty-four years old; West Feliciana; farmer; on day of election was in Saint Francisville; prior to that was on my place, six miles from Saint Francisville, at home.

The 11th of July last past, about midnight, a body of armed men came to my house; about sixty, as near as I could count. They called out to me some three or four times to come out; then, getting impatient, called again, "Ain't you coming out?" I answered, yes, as soon as I could find my pants. They then said, "If you don't come out we will smoke you out." I went out, and there I saw Cody Smith, Mr. Domings, Robert Wilson, Tom West, Charley Barrow, Robert Philips, Hugh Connor, George Townes, Will. Gilmore, Matt. Gillmore, Joe D. Smith, Lewis Smith, Page Barrow, Herman Barrow, and a great many whose names I do not now remember and some I did not know. All were on horseback and were armed with guns and pistols. They had dismounted. I was accosted at once by Cody Smith, who said, "I want to know all about that club, republican, you have out here that is going to kill the democrats." I told him that was a club I didn't know anything about. He says, "You are a damned liar. You follow us all. We'll get it out of you to-night or we'll kill you." They then got on their horses and made me go with them on foot in their midst about two hundred and fifty yards from my house, where they came across a big tree. There they made me get upon a horse Then Tom West said to me, "Now, by G—d, I want you to tell me all you know.' I told them I didn't know anything. West said, "Yes, you do, by G—d. Ain't some of you got a rope?" Then Robert Philips spoke up, saying, "Yes, I've got one." He then passed to West a new grass rope that he had tied to his saddle. West immediately put it around my neck, after making the slip-noose, saying, "Now, by G—d, I want you to up and tell us the whole thing. If you don't we'll break your neck to-night." I told them I knew of no club of republicans to kill people. The boys had spoke of having a club meeting, as had always been the case in all election times. Robert Wilson spoke, saying, "O, by G—d, boys, he is trying to dodge us. Break his neck at once and be done with it." Robert Philips then climbed the tree, taking up the end of the rope and fastened it to a limb. Lewis Smith then caught hold of the bridle-rein of the horse I had been placed on and started to lead him from under me. I caught hold of the rein and pulled him back. I begged for a chance to talk. They waited. I told them I did not know of such a club as they spoke of, but if they would turn me loose I would join a democratic club. One of them then said, "Turn him loose. Let him go on home and behave himself and be a good democrat now." They turned me loose. After I had got off about one hundred yards one of them shouted out, "Hold on there, you black son of a b——h, we ain't done with you yet." I saw I had no chance to run, so stopped right still. Cody Smith, Robert Wilson, and Hugh Connor, Robert Philips, and Lewis Smith came back for me and told me to go and follow them. They put me in advance, and being too slow in walking for them, Wilson said to Smith, "If you've got a whip, whip him with it and make him go faster. If you have not a whip, get a stick and knock him in the head. He'll go then."

They took me to Charley Barrow's place, a mile from my house. They went into his quarters and took two other colored men named Gilbert Carter and Isaac Vessel, and brought them to where I had been left with a guard over me, about a hundred yards from the quarters. When they had got Carter and Vessel within about ten yards of me, the white men said to each other, "Where can we find a tree to hang these two sons of bitches!" When they said this Carter and Vessel broke and ran. The whole crowd immediately fired after them. Gilbert Carter was filled with buck-shot in the small of the back, and his thigh was broken. The other man escaped. Robert Philips rode up to where Carter had fallen and said, "Boys, by G—d this fellow's pulse is beating yet." Then Charley Barrow went up to Carter and placing a pistol to his head fired it and killed him dead, saying, "By G—d, we've got the captain of this republican club, and if he ain't religious he's gone to hell." They then said to each other, "What shall we do this other!" meaning me. Hugh Connor says, "Kill him and leave him here." The guards who had me in charge said, "No, we will take him to the captain and see what he says." They carried me to the captain, and when we got to him I found it was Charley Barrow. He told them he gave me to them and said, "Do whatever you want to with him. He belongs to the Sage Hill club, he don't belong to mine." He permitted me to talk to him. I said, "I don't belong to anybody's club, but if you'll turn me loose and don't hurt me, I'll join your democratic club." He said, "By G—d, you needn't expect to join my club and then after join the radical club, for you will be in a worse fix if you do than you are now. If you join our club you must vote the democratic ticket, for if you vote any other you might just as well take your carpet-bag on your back and travel. All radicals now are played out. We are all democrats now. You tell all others and colored men that if in two weeks they have not joined my club they will be sorry for their own selves. They had better leave the parish." They then let me go, telling me to get home as quick as possible, and not let them catch me before I got home, for if they did they would kill me sure. From that time up to election they rode over the whole parish, threatening the lives of the people unless they voted the democratic ticket. They done it night and day.

I saw them from where I slept, near the road, in the swamp, for I was afraid to sleep at my house any more. They came and went just as in war times; came to assist the bull-dozers in West Feliciana. On one occasion I saw a body of eight of them somewhere from Mississippi; heard them shouting up the road. I saw them shooting at a man—Julius Green. I had been laying in the edge of the wood. I saw Green coming from church with his wife. They halted him. He saw who it was and run; he got away from them; they afterward went up the road, and I could hear them say they had come there to break up this damned radical hole. They broke into a number of houses that night.

I can think of but one other case just now; that was the killing of Ike Mitchell by the bull-dozers because he was a republican. Before they killed him I heard them say they had come to break up this damned radical hole.

ISAAC VESSEL.

I am twenty-two years old. I reside in the parish of West Feliciana. On the 7th of November last I was in Bayou Sara, in said parish During the four months previous, I lived on the plantation of Charles M. Barrow.

In the latter part of June last, Gilbert Carter, and about a dozen other colored men in our neighborhood, together with myself, proposed to organize a republican club, and met for that purpose one evening at what is called the Flower place. We did not effect an organization that night, but separated to meet again for the same purpose in about two weeks later. The democrats, on hearing of our intentions, congregated, and on the night of July 11 came to the plantation of Charles M. Barrow, about the hour of midnight, and came to my house when I was sleeping, and broke open the doors, and awoke me by poking me with their guns. They also went to the house of Gilbert Carter and made him their prisoner. Without giving me an opportunity to dress, they carried me about two hundred yards to where some more of their company were waiting, and where Gilbert Carter was brought; they were about fifty or sixty yards of them; they said that we had got to die that night, and were standing around us in every direction, bellowing that we would certainly be killed. We both made an attempt to escape, when Gilbert Carter was shot to death, pierced by bullets in several places. I ran to a bayou, but being soon almost surrounded, I pulled off my shirt, the only garment I had on, in order to avoid being seen in the darkness, and ran to another bayou, and finally escaped. I went to the house of a friend and obtained some clothing and remained until the next day, when I returned home by a circuitous route, being seen by Charles Barrow. He rode over to where I was. I asked him why they had killed Gilbert and tried to kill me, as I had done nothing. He replied they were after us because of that club we had over at the Flower place. I told him that we had not formed any club, but had only met to take steps to form one, when he said I must acknowledge that we had met and had formed a plan to murder him and his family and other families, or I would be killed. I denied any such intention, saying that such a thing was never thought of; but he said that I must acknowledge it if I wanted to live. I consented to anything he might propose in order to save my life.

I signed an affidavit before Justice Thomas Rayham, implicating Gilbert Carter in a plot to kill Charles M. Barrow and his family, John J. Barrow and his family, and others. I did this because Charley Barrow said that Governor Wickliffe said that I must sign such a paper in order to save my life. Not one of the statements in that paper or affidavit was true, so far as they related to any plot on the part of any one to kill Charley Barrow, his family, or any one else. I cannot read nor write, and consequently do not know what the paper contained, only what I was told, but I never heard or thought of any such a thing as they made me acknowledge.

Gilbert Carter was taken from his house on the night of July 11, by about fifty or sixty armed men, and surrounded and told that he had got to die that night; he attempted to escape, and was shot to death. Among the gang were Bennet L. Barrow, Page Barrow, Robert Philips, Courtland Smith, Will Gilmore, Charley Barrow, Joe D. Smith, Robert Wilson, Jim Dumming and others, and Thomas C. West.

I know from hearsay and general report of other murders and whipping, but did not witness them. I heard the guns when Ike Mitchell was killed on the 28th of September. He lived about a mile from where I did.

There have been plenty of bull-dozers in the parish, and they ride about day and night, whipping, hanging, and murdering colored people to intimidate them and prevent their forming republican clubs, and forcing them to join democratic ones.

AMY MITCHELL.

I am twenty-three years of age; I reside in the parish of West Feliciana, and I am the widow of a laboring farmer.

On the night of the 28th of September last a squad of eight white armed men came to the house owned and occupied by my husband and myself, situated in the third ward, in the parish of West Feliciana, about eight miles from Bayou Sara. They called for my husband, Ike Mitchell, by name, who at the time was sick in bed. Before I could open the door sufficiently to see or admit them they pushed it so violently against me as to nearly knock me down. They ordered me to make a light, and upon my telling them that my husband was not in there (he was in an adjoining room) they said, "Hush, you damned liar; he is in here." They said, "We have come here to break up this damned radical hole," and "We have come here to break up this damned Weber hole." They found my husband in the adjoining room, where, after hearing them, he had tried to conceal himself under some loose seed-cotton. They commenced beating him with their pistols, and in the scuffle which ensued got him outside the house, when he was shot three times by one of them whom I recognized as Mr. Charley Barrow. After shooting him, they called to me to come and take the damned son of a bitch in the house, when they rode off, and my husband's sister and myself carried him into the house. We placed him on the bed, where he died about daylight the next morning. They were armed with pistols and guns: either rifles or shot-guns. I recognized Charley Barrow, Robert Wilson, and Jim Dunning as being a part of the squad of eight. Charley Barrow had a handkerchief or towel tied over his face, but it fell off and I saw his features distinctly. I am well acquainted with him, having known him for about seven years. One of the men had a white sheet spread over his horse.

Some time preceding the circumstances recited above, a party of six or seven armed white men came to my house and called for Julius Green, a brother of my husband. His wife told them that he was away from home, when they came on the gallery and told his wife and myself to tell him that he must be at the court-house in Saint Francisville by ten o'clock the next morning and resign his office or he would be killed the next night. Julius Green was a member of the police jury for the parish. We told him what they said, and in accordance with their demands he went to Saint Francisville the next day and resigned his office, as he says he was terrified at their threats. It was in the night-time when they came to my house.

J. R. WATSON.

I am a resident and a voter of the third ward, parish of West Feliciana. On the day of election I acted as a commissioner of election at poll 1 of the twelfth ward, held at the the court-house in ward No. 1. This poll was held at the court-house because we were afraid to establish a poll in the twelfth ward, as we had been told that if we went out there we would be killed. At this poll early in the morning, as soon as the poll opened, about a dozen democrats surrounded the poll, and when ordered to stand back by the commissioners, they refused, and said they had a right there, and were going to carry that poll and parish at all hazards. They then, in a loud voice, notified all colored men who voted the republican ticket that their names would be taken down, and that the bull-dozers would pay their respects to them in a few nights; but that all who voted the democratic ticket should have a pass which would insure their protection against harm. They notified me that if I staid in that parish they would call on me in a few nights and give me a taste of hell.

In November, 1875, I was the supervisor of registration of the parish of West Feliciana, and took the census of that parish that year. I was keeping a store in the third ward, about four and a half miles from Bayou Sara. About the 27th of the above month, while preparing for bed, about ten o'clock at night, an armed body of men, from thirty to fifty in number, rode up to my store. When I heard them I blew out the light and jumped into bed. They at once opened fire with shot-guns, Winchester rifles, and pistols, and fired some thirty or forty shots into my store, riddling the door and windows. Some dozen or more of the bullets struck different parts of the bed on which I was lying. Some parties from some other portion of the road fired a volley; whether it was at them or not, I cannot say; but they rode off, yelling and hallooing, cursing the damn radical niggers, and saying, "We have killed one son of a bitch." Every few days after this I was notified to leave there or I would be killed and my store burned. About a week after the first attack another band of about fifty came yelling down the road. I went into the house adjoining my store and hid myself until they came in front of my store, when I heard them say they would burn the damn radical nigger's store, and I crawled out into the bushes beside the house. They then burst into my store, and when they could not find me there they took everything of value they wanted, and went to the house across the road and broke it open and searched for me, and told the woman to tell that damn radical nigger Watson that if they could catch him they were going to fill him full of bullets. After ransacking the house opposite to my store they returned and saturated the floor, counter, and walls of the store with coal-oil, and set it on fire and burned it to the ground. While it was burning they yelled and cursed, saying, "Come out, you nigger son of a bitch; your house is on fire. Come out here, and I will shoot your damn head off." I left there the next day, and came to New Orleans, and staid several months.

After I returned they still kept sending me word they were going to kill me. In September last I went to church in the third ward, when about a dozen armed men came riding up to the church and asked for me. I crawled into the pulpit and hid, but they sent three of their number into the church to bring me out. I then run out the back door and into the bush and hid. I left again and came to New Orleans, and staid here until October. After my return I was told that if I could be caught out of sight of the soldiers I would be shot. This is but a sample of the state of my parish. Hundreds of colored men are treated as I have been, and all are so terrorized that they could not, at the last election, vote as they wanted to, but were compelled to vote the democratic ticket to save their life. The republican ticket lost, by the corrupt practices and the intimidation of the colored men, from sixteen to seventeen hundred votes, which, were the colored men not compelled, against their will, to vote a democratic ticket, would have given the republicans a majority of from 900 to 1,000 in the parish of West Feliciana.

Armed bodies of men patrolled the entire parish to terrorize and intimidate the colored men, and when we left to come down here they warned us that on our return we would be sent to hell.

R. J. HOGAN.

I am a resident voter of the tenth ward of the parish of West Feliciana. In 1874 I was elected as a member of the police jury of my ward, and was afterward elected as the president of the police jury. Some time in the early part of November, 1875, we began to hear of regulators riding through our parish and those adjoining, and in a few days afterward that the regulators or bull-dozers, as they called themselves, had compelled the police jury of the parish of East Feliciana to resign, and that soon we would be called upon to resign too. These rumors increased, and I began to hear our police jury cursed and abused for damned radicals and damned niggers, and this was accompanied with statements that republicans I knew to be leaders had been whipped and killed through the county by bull dozers; these rumors so worked upon me and filled me with fear of my life and the safety of my family that I resigned my position as police juror. These rumors continued to increase in numbers, and the ventures of the bull-dozers came nearer to my home every week, until in June, 1876, a band of bull-dozers came to the plantation of John A. Stevenson, on which I have a crop, and took out three colored men, Wodford Roof, Truble Hunter, and Demas Williams, and they stripped them and made two hold the third while they whipped him. After they had whipped one, and while whipping the second, Demas Williams dropped the legs of the man he was holding and started to run. The bull-dozers immediately fired at him with their pistols, but, as there was a corn-field close by, he got into it and escaped. They then told the two men they had whipped that they must go over to John Barrow's and join his democratic club, or what they had got was just a taste of what they would get in the future. They say they were going to break up this damn radicalism, and that the colored men of that section must join democratic clubs and vote the democratic ticket if they wanted any protection. I run out of my house at their approach and laid in the bush, and overheard their threats, and in the following week I went over to Mr. Barrow to find out the conditions upon which I could get protection for my life; as one Isaac Michel and Gilbert Carter had been killed in my neighborhood, I feared my time would come soon.

I asked Mr. Barrow what was required of me to insure my safety. He said he wanted me to join his club, (democratic,) and support the democratic ticket on the day of election. I told him that if these were the best terms I could get I must take them, but that I had been a life-long republican, and was now, and that I would like to vote the republican ticket. He said I could not defend myself, and the bull-dozers would surely call on me as I was considered as a leader among the republicans, and would have to be suppressed in order that the democrats might carry out what they had determined should be the result of the election; that is, the complete success of the democratic ticket in my parish. Finding there was no alternative but to join his club or to leave the parish, I joined it, and from time to time was notified to attend its meetings, and also the speakings and barbecues of the democratic party in the parish. On the day of election there were many members of the club at the polls, and I and many other colored men who would have voted the republican ticket if we had dared to marched up to the polls in the tenth ward and deposited a democratic ticket. There was but one republican ticket, and whoever voted that feared to let it be known. There was no freedom of will on my part in voting as I did, but I thought my life would pay the forfeit if I dared to refuse. Armed bands of democrats patrolled the parish for several months, and by their whooping, hallooing and whipping, and sometimes murder of colored men, kept them in such a state of suspense and terror that they feared unless they obeyed the bull-dozers in everything they ordered that their lives would pay the forfeit. The republican majority in the tenth ward, were there a free, fair, and unintimidated election held there, would have been about 190 or 200; but as it was, there was no choice for a colored man. He must vote the democratic ticket or leave or be killed. After the election, on the same day, I was required to sign a memorial, stating that there was a fair and free and full election without any intimidation. I signed this paper, but it was done under the same feelings that caused me to vote the democratic ticket—a mortal fear that some harm would be committed against those who refused, and not because I wanted to sign it.

JAMES H. MORGAN.

I am a resident voter of ward No. 4 of the parish of West Feliciana. Sometime in September or October, 1875, a band of bull-dozers came into Saint Francisville, and by their yelling and hallooing through the streets, and their threats and bad language, put the entire inhabitants in a mortal terror. They had hung John Gair, and were going to hang and shoot other damn radicals and niggers. They came to the house of Senator Webber, and hallooed to him to come out; that they wanted to fix him. They staid all night in town, and by their drunken carousals, firing off their pistols, and abusive threats, they put all the people in a state of excitement. This caused the formation of committees of safety, formed by the planters and their hands. One was formed in my ward, and Mr. Barrow was the president. All the colored men in the ward were asked to sign the rolls, and it was stated that any man who signed could vote as he liked, as it was a non-political organization, whereby all the colored men joined in it; and all went well until some time in June, 1876, when some member offered a resolution binding the club to support the democratic ticket. Many of the colored men objected, stating that they were republicans and could not support the democratic party. Mr. Barrow said they must do so, as the people of that parish were tired of the damn radical nigger rule, and that the State must go democratic, if they had to kill all the damn radicals. He thereupon declared the resolution passed, and the colored men, I among the rest, were afraid to make any objection, but at the next meeting few colored men attended. The bull-dozers at once appeared, and among them were many of the white men of the parish. They killed Jack Russell, a colored man; this, accompanied with the threats of the bull-dozers, who warned the colored men that unless they attended the democratic meetings, struck terror to my breast, and that of all others. I at once began to sleep in the woods at night, as did many others, for fear of being killed in my house. This murder was quickly followed by that of Gilbert Carter, Isaac Michell, and Ed. Armstrong, all living in my part of the parish, besides Primus Picket, Juber Johns, and many others, who were shot at Brent Saws. Marsch Gray and others were whipped nearly to death during the same period, from June to the day of election. These acts confirmed my terror and that of other colored men.

These acts and raids of the bull-dozers were all in the night-time, and when day returned there would be no traces of them. Many of their men were recognized by me and others as the white residents of our neighborhood; among others, Cortney Smith and Charles Barrows. By these acts of violence, and after repeated warnings, I joined the club and attended the meetings and the democratic speakings. These acts of intimidation caused many colored men to stay away from the polls, and many others were compelled to vote the democratic ticket against their wishes. We had been told that on the day of election there would be a man present at each poll with a spot-book to take down the names of all colored men who voted the republican ticket, and that on the night following, or in a few nights, they would be visited by the bull-dozers, but that those who voted the democratic ticket would be let alone. Sure enough, on the day of election there was a man at our poll with his spot-book, and he called out the name of each man who voted the republican ticket, and said, "spotted." I saw many colored men who came up with republican tickets drop them when they heard this man calling the names. Some left the polls without voting, others were accosted by democrats and compelled to vote the democratic ticket. Many of these last came to me and said they were afraid to vote as they wanted to—the republican ticket—as the bull-dozers would kill them, but if I could insure them protection they would vote as they wished, but I told them I could not give them any security.

If there had been a free, fair, and unintimidated election the republicans would have had a majority of about 250 at my poll, whereas the democrats, by the foregoing intimidation, carried that poll about 70 votes. I am well acquainted with the feeling in my parish, and know if a free, fair, and unintimidated election had been held, and the colored men been allowed to vote as they desired, the republican majority of the parish would have been upward of 1,000. On the day of election the democrats had whisky at my poll, and all who voted their ticket was given a drink, which he could not get if he voted the opposition ticket.

JAMES SMITH.

James Smith says that he is a resident of the parish of West Feliciana, twelfth ward, and is a duly registered voter thereof; that for six months prior to the election armed bands of white men, styling themselves the "bull-dozers and regulators," patrolled the parish night and day. They at first notified all the colored people in the twelfth ward that they were about to organize a democratic club at Mr. Courtland Smith's plantation some time in June, 1876. The club was formed, and they visited all the colored people in the neighborhood, telling them to "attend and see what it is like," and that they could vote as they pleased. "Just come, we only want to have a large meeting." They went, knowing full well that if they failed to the democrats would make the attempt to kill them. At the meeting the colored men were told if they would join the club they would be protected by the white people. They replied, "We are republicans, and intend to vote the republican ticket." They were then forced to swear and kiss the Bible and join the democratic club.

After three or four meetings of said club, Mr. Courtland Smith, James Stewart, Robert Wilson, Hugh Connell, and others, white democrats, members of the club, visited those colored men who failed to attend every meeting, telling them they must attend regularly or they would be bull-dozed. As all the colored men were afraid to stay away, they nearly all attended. Mr. Smith in one of the first compulsory meetings introduced a resolution pledging the club to support the democratic candidates. The colored people said they were republicans and could not do it. Mr. Smith replied, "You shall, or be killed." He then declared the resolution passed, the colored people being afraid to say anything to the contrary.

On the next meeting-night few colored men were present. The bull-dozers then commenced riding around armed, warning those colored men who had failed to attend that they would be killed or whipped. And to show they were in earnest, they took a colored man from Mr. Gibbon's place and gave him a horrible beating. They took him to the woods for that purpose. They informed him that that was a "mere brushing" to what would be given him if he again failed to attend their meetings, as well as to all other colored men who failed to attend. Some were threatened with hanging, some with whipping, and others with being driven away and their crops, stock, and property confiscated. In this manner, and by riding up and down the road, yelling and shooting off their pistols and guns, they so terrorized the colored people that they were afraid to stay away from any democratic club meeting that they were told to attend. And if there was a republican meeting held anywhere in their parish the colored people were notified by the bull-dozers not to attend it "at the peril of their lives." So those who did brave the bull-dozers were in constant fear of bodily harm. Many of them were whipped, some hung, and others shot, and if from any cause the colored people failed to attend the democratic club meetings they slept out in the woods until the next night of meeting for fear of being dragged out and hung or shot.

Affiant was assaulted and beaten on the head with a pistol by one Courtland B. Smith a few days before the election, the wounds of which he carries now, they being not yet healed, for the alleged reason that he was a republican and had refused to vote the democratic ticket. Said Smith told affiant that he would carry him to the polls and make him vote the democratic ticket, or, "by God," he would take him out and hang him. All the bull-dozers carried ropes on their saddles for that purpose. Affiant was discharged from employment and driven away from home, leaving at least ten bales of cotton in his fields, together with all his corn, gathered and ungathered, potatoes, &c., besides his hogs and chickens, furniture, &c., valued in the aggregate at some $500. He owed no rent to Mr. Smith, but said Smith sent affiant word through his wife not to return to his place, neither for the purpose of securing his effects, &c., nor for any other purpose. If he did so it would be at the peril of his life.

On the night before election the bull-dozers picketed and patrolled every road in the parish in order to prevent the colored people from going to vote at the poll in the town of Saint Francisville. I know that at the first-ward poll at Saint Francisville young white democrats were there with "spot-books," taking down the name of every colored man who voted the republican ticket. These young men threatened to kill every colored man whose name was on their list. Affiant voted at the poll in the town of Saint Francisville, as he could not have voted in any of the country wards as he desired.

He has not been home since being discharged and driven away, and it would not be safe for him to return, as his life would pay the forfeit; knows of at least three or four dozen colored men and their families who have been discharged from employment and driven away from home for attending republican meetings.

The white people even invaded the colored churches to see if they were discussing political questions, as they said.

Affiant knows of the murders of Ike Mitchell and Gilbert Carter by the bull-dozers; saw them when they were going to the place, and saw them when they returned, just before daylight in the morning. These two men were murdered for political purposes; know of many other cases similar. The bull-dozers said they were going to rule the country, as it is a white man's country, or they would murder all the damned radica's. Affiant's experience is that of every other colored republican in the ward. We all work for our landlords during the day and when night comes they bull-doze us. As soon as the crops are ready for harvesting, especially in an election year, they run us out of the parish, possess themselves of our crops, property, &c., all because we consider ourselves capable of judging for whom we will vote.

The parish of West Feliciana is republican by at least 900 or 1,000 majority, on a fair and full election at which the colored republicans will be allowed to vote for the candidates of their choice.

Have often heard the bull-dozers say they were going to kill off all the leading republicans in the parish.

BENJAMIN H. ROGERS, CAPTAIN THIRTEENTH UNITED STATES INFANTRY.

Question. How long have you been stationed here?

Answer. Since the middle of July last year—1876—about the 18th of the month.

Q. State whether you were here continuously from the time you came here until after the election.

A. I was, continuously, with the exception of being absent at Baton Rouge for three days at two different times.

Q. State whether you were about over the parish any during the canvass.

A. I was riding about over the parish a great deal—mostly all over the parish.

Q. State whether the campaign was quiet in the parish or not.

A. I only know of two cases of violence that I thought was on account of politics.

Q. Will you state those?

A. One was the beating of a colored man for attending a republican meeting here.

Q. What was his name?

A. I don't know his name. I didn't make any note, as I turned him immediately over to the civil authorities and he made an affidavit before a justice of the peace.

Q. Do you know the names of any parties who were arrested?

A. Skipwith and others, living near Shady Grove. They came in and said to me, five or six, that they had slept in the woods all night; that they were threatened with a whipping because they came to hear Mr. Packard when he held his meeting here. I advised them to go back, and they went back. A day or two after one of them came back badly beaten over the head. They had been sitting up with a corpse—one of the brothers. There was two or three in the affair. They drove them out of the house and beat one very bad with a pistol. He came in and made a complaint, and I took him before the civil authorities, and he made affidavit and the parties were arrested.

Q. Was there any trial?

A. I don't know.

Q. Did you ever investigate the matter beyond the complaint that they made to you, to see whether their statement was true or not?

A. Yes, sir; I made some investigation. The defense on the other side was that they had threatened the negroes because they took a mule belonging to them. It seems that the man hired land of them and used their animals to cultivate his land, and that morning, instead of going to the field, he rode his mule into town, and that was about all the defense.

Q. Do you remember whether they denied it being done on account of politics?

A. No, sir; I didn't hear that they did deny it.

Q. What was the other case?

A. It was a colored man by the name of Zeke Glover; think that is his name; he was badly whipped. He stated to me that he was whipped for reading republican papers to the negroes in his vicinity. He was sent to New Orleans, and made his affidavit.

Q. Did he state by whom he was whipped, do you remember?

A. I can't remember names. I only remember that there was a man by the name of Roberts, and another by the name of Doty. There were other men that I didn't know, and I don't remember their names.

Q. Did any evidence upon the subject come to your ears, except what he told you?

A. Yes, sir; the statements of the opposite party, that they wanted him to go coon hunting and he would not go. I never put any faith in that all, though.

Q. Was that the only reason given?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You say you came here last July?

A. On the 18th or 19th of July, I forget which.

Q. Now will you state what you heard in regard to the colored people being intimidated in this parish, with reference to voting?

A. I heard before I came here that the darkies were completely cowed, and that they did not dare to hold any republican meetings, and that they were being forced to join democratic clubs and would be compelled to vote the democratic ticket whether they wished or not. That I heard before I came here.

Q. Where were you stationed before you came here?

A. East Baton Rouge barracks, Louisiana.

Q. What was the first you heard or learned after you came in regard to the same matter?

A. The first I heard or learned was colored men coming to me, and asking what they should do; that they were being forced to join democratic clubs. I asked them if they joined of their own free will, and they said they were forced. I asked how they were forced. They said that they were told that if they did not join they would have to quit the country, or be whipped. I suppose some twenty or thirty different colored men told me that. I asked them why they didn't make affidavits, and they said they were afraid. I never could get any colored man to make an affidavit except that one who was beat over the head with a pistol. That is the only one that I could ever get to make an affidavit.

Q. You may state whether that continued; whether these colored men continued to come to you with these complaints down to the time of the election.

A. Down to the very day. I staid at the barracks with my company, and there was at least thirty came to me that day. I will say thirty, as near as I can recollect. They came in squads, stating that they were afraid to vote; that they wanted to vote the republican ticket, and that they had been told that if they did they would have to leave the parish. I advised them to go home and not vote at all. They said that they were afraid to do that; they had been told that they must vote the democratic ticket. One squad told me that men had been riding through, knocking at the doors, and telling them that they must vote the democratic ticket, and frightening them in that manner.

Q. How may colored men, do you suppose, came to you previous to the election with complaints of that character?

A. There was not as many came to me as I asked. When I have been riding through the country I have stopped and asked them in regard to the political aspects of the country. I don't suppose there has been over fifteen or twenty who have come in to me. Yes; there has been more than that, because there has eight or ten come at one time—I suppose thirty.

Q. You took no note of the number?

A. No, sir.

Q. You may state whether, during the time you were here previous to the election—whether you rode through the parish a good deal.

A. Pretty nearly over the whole.

Q. State whether, when you were out, you took pains to question colored men in regard to the voting.

A. I talked with them a great many times; talked with colored men from nearly all parts of the parish.

Q. What did you learn from them?

A. I learned from all of them that they felt as though they were obliged to vote the democratic ticket for their own safety. That was the general tenor of all their statements.

Q. State whether you have talked to them, and whether any of them have talked to you, since the election?

A. No, sir; there has been but very few that I have seen since the election, except a few who came to me and told me that they were obliged to sign an affidavit certifying that they voted the democratic ticket of their own free will. They said that if they had not signed it they would be turned out; parties rode up to their houses and put the affidavit before them, and they said that they signed it for fear of bodily harm.

Q. When you first came here, when did you first learn there were bodies of armed men riding through the parish intimidating colored people?

A. The only statement made to me about bodies of armed men was the night before the election.

Q. Did you hear anything about an organization called the regulators?

A. I have heard of them before I came here. I think they were disbanded shortly after I came. There was a piece in the paper to that effect; that they considered themselves disbanded, and any acts of violence hereafter should not be laid to the regulators, as they were disbanded. That was some time about the 1st of August, I think.

Q. These two cases of personal violence that you have spoken of, after the investigation that you had made in regard to it, had you any doubt in your mind but what it arose from political motives on the part of the men who injured them?

A. I had very little doubt of it.

Q. From all that you have seen and learned in regard to the colored people of this parish, what do you say as to there being a full and fair vote at the last election?

A. As far as my judgment goes, I should consider, I should think the way the colored men have been speaking to me that at least two-thirds of the colored men in this parish would have voted the republican ticket if they had been left free and untrammeled by other parties—left alone.

Q. You may state what these colored people told you about attending republican meetings here.

A. There never was but one in the parish.

Q. Did anybody say anything about that?

A. Two or three told me that they did not go, for fear; that they dare not go.

Q. Did they say why they did not go?

A. They feared bodily harm if they did go.

JOHN C. REILEY.

Question. What is your age?

Answer. I am sixty years of age.

Q. State whether you are a minister of the gospel.

A. I am, sir; a regular minister of the gospel; connected with the Presbyterian Church, of the presbytery of New Jersey. I have been performing voluntary missionary work in this State for the last ten years.

Q. Where do you reside?

A. I reside ten miles from here.

Q. In this parish?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long have you resided there?

A. Ten years last November.

Q. Where did you come from?

A. I came from Blairstown, New Jersey.

Q. You may state, if you please, whether you know of your own knowledge, or whether it has come to you by report from others, any facts in regard to the intimidation of colored people in regard to their voting. State all you know about it.

A. Of my own knowledge directly, I have not been present when any persons have been intimidated. Persons have come to me and have told me that threats had been made to them. Men on my place have come and said that they felt unsafe in their houses and that their houses were entered into by men, and they wanted to move inside of my yard for protection.

Q. How many colored men did you usually have on your place?

A. Men, properly, there were perhaps twenty. About a little rising of twenty men.

Q. Were these the colored men that came to you and made these reports?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Against whom were the complaints made?

A. Well, unknown parties.

Q. State whether they said what the object of the visits of these men was to their houses.

A. They did not state. This one man that came as a representative character—that is, he spoke for the rest, and I would not accede to his proposition—he said this: "There is hardly a man could sleep on this place at night." He went away. I don't know whether I answered your question.

Q. My question was, what object these men had in visiting the houses of these colored men in the night-time. Did they make any statement to you as to the object?

A. No, sir; no statement was made. It was presumed. When I understood the case, on one particular time, there was a political meeting—a democratic meeting—held a short distance from this man's house; and two of this man's sons-in-law were there. They had been stopping in the neighborhood. They were stopping at this man's house; they were stopping with this man, and there was a raid made on the house, and one of these men was shot, and the other I was told; I know one was shot, because I saw his wound; he was in my yard, and the other, they had a rope around him; he got away.

Q. That was the night of that political meeting?

A. The same night of the meeting.

Q. After the meeting?

A. Yes, sir. I must state, however, that I don't think those connected directly with the meeting, (that is not my impression,) that they had anything to do with this matter at all; but they came the same night. Perhaps those parties had been at the meeting; but there are two classes of persons that attend such places, men who make speeches; and so far as I have heard their speeches have not been of an intimidating character, so far as I have heard them; I heard them here, however, only, but I have not heard of any speeches reported of that character. But there are on the outside persons who come after and do this work; at least that was the case that night. I don't know anybody who knew who they were.

Q. When did this happen that you have related about this man being shot?

A. That was two or three weeks before the election.

Q. During the last canvass?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you remember where the meeting was held?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. At what point?

A. It was a place called Reiley's Bridge, a half or three-quarters of a mile from my house.

Q. Now, you may state whether any other complaints were made to you by colored men with regard to being intimidated.

A. One man came to me and told me that he was going to leave the place. I asked him why, and he said, "I think more of my life than I do of my crop. I want you to gather my crop, sell it, and keep an account. I will be back in two or three months." He said that "My life is threatened." I tried to persuade him that it was not so. He said "You may think so; but don't you know this man out here was killed, and this man out here was killed? Don't you know how they took me out of my bed and whipped me last winter? No; I am going to leave." He did leave. He remained away two months. He owned his own team and he made large crops.

Q. When was it that those men you have mentioned came to you and made these complaints? About what time was it?

A. A couple of weeks before the election.

Q. You may state whether there were any other instances of that kind.

A. I have not inquired of the hands on the place, and in the cases of one or two of them——

Q. Did they volunteer to give those statements to you?

A. One did volunteer to tell me that he was waited upon by two men, and he was told unless he voted the democratic ticket he certainly would be punished, and one of them told him he was captain himself of the bull-dozers, and that he would see to it after the election.

Q. When did he say these men stated that to him?

A. A week or two before the election; a short time before.

Q. Do you think of any other instances?

A. Well, those persons have come to me off the place. There is a negro settlement about three miles below me, and most of them went and settled there from my place; bought lands and teams, that they had made on my place, and goods. They settled there. That settlement was very much disturbed. They were working for nobody, but were supposed to be proprietors. They came to me one night very much excited, but that was at a time when I felt there was no cause whatever for it. I told them that there was no cause; that "Nobody in the world will disturb you now; you need not think of such a thing; go home and sleep quietly in your beds; the election is over, and there are no persons going to interfere with you." They went home. They had proposed—they asked me if they could not come up on my place. This was after the election. Before the election I know only what they told me. They had not slept in their beds for weeks; even women told me that they had to lay between logs out from their houses. Now, they were frightened; that they could not say as to who was responsible for it; that I don't know.

Q. What did they say they were frightened about? What did they say frightened them?

A. I can only state what I have heard. They were told unless they voted the democratic ticket they would have to leave their homes. They were told so repeatedly.

Q. State whether that was a short time before the election.

A. No, sir. Not long before the election, one of those men living down there, who left on that account, said his life was in danger, and left the country, and was gone fully two months, and his family did not hear from him; he never wrote. They wrote, and never received any answer from him. Their letters came usually into my box. I inquired, over and over again, for the letters, but never saw any. This man left and went into Bolivar County, Mississippi. He came back about two weeks ago. Now, I don't know whether politics had any connection with it. I heard his name in connection with it, because the old gentleman who sold them the land, only two or three days before his death, told him, "Isaac, I guess you had better vote the democratic ticket."

Q. This old gentleman told that colored man so?

A. Yes, sir; and then Isaac said, "Need I vote at all?" And Mr. Lee (this old gentleman) said, "No, you need not vote at all." Some one present said, "He shall vote, or leave here."

Q. This man said so to Isaac?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And Isaac left?
A. Yes, sir; he was the one who left. He was gone a couple of months. He just returned within the last two or three weeks.
Q. If there are any other instances which have come to your knowledge—people that have been intimidated—you may state.
A. Well, one man told me he had voted the democratic ticket, not because he wanted to, but because he was compelled to.
Q. State how was that.
A. Said he, "I and all the other colored people on the place of Mrs. Brown, we always voted the republican ticket. They held meetings, but we did not go to those meetings at all. None of us went to any of the meetings, and the night before the election men came and said, 'You know to-morrow is election, and you are expected to be there,' and all of us said that we felt we ought to go, and we would have to go; and, perhaps, we thought if we did not vote we could not stay here, because they had told us so." The men were informed that they had to vote, or they could not live on the place. His language was, "Unless you go and vote the democratic ticket, you must leave this place." I am positive now this was the night before the election. They said, "We all went and voted the democratic ticket."
Q. You may state whether you said anything to him in regard to what he told you.
A. I asked him if he knew who these persons were, and he said they were strangers to him. He said, "You are Mr. Reiley; that's the reason I speak to you." I said, "I understand why you tell me the story which you would not tell a democrat; you would not tell a democrat that story, would you?" Well, he stopped a little and he said, "Mr. Hardisty asked me why I voted the democratic ticket; I did not want to tell him as I told you, that is so; I did not want to tell him as I told you, but I told him I voted because the rest did."
Q. Now, sir, you may state when you had this conversation with that colored man.
A. It was this morning.
Q. This very morning?
A. Yes, sir; I asked him his name, and he said, Fizor Reiley.
Q. Did he tell you where he lived?
A. Yes, sir; Mrs. Brown's place.
Q. Well, sir, are there any other instances that occur to your mind, Mr. Reiley, of where you have heard complaints from these people?
A. Well, I met a man with an ox-team about three weeks ago; he had formerly lived on my place. I had not seen him for years, and at first I did not know him. I think he lived in the eighth ward. He related to me the old story of being compelled to vote the democratic ticket. That is about all. He spoke about their raids, and he likened it unto a sage-grass field on fire. Perhaps he colored the story a little; I don't know. That is the story he told me.
Q. Any other one that you know of?
A. Simply in regard to the last canvass, I suppose you want to obtain testimony?
Q. Yes, sir.
A. There was one man on my place that voted. I never asked him why he voted. I never asked him one question. I saw him afterward and I was told he voted. The rest never told me one word before or after the election. Only one said, "We all knew that if you wanted us to vote you would have told us so. But you did not say anything to us. There has been so much disturbance, so we staid at home." There was not but one of the hands that was at the election at all; that was near the polls. I was commissioner at this place. I saw some negroes, two of them, as I went to dinner at Mansker's, as I was going right across, who stated to me, "Mr. Reiley"—I was recording the names of voters—they told me, "you see we voted the democratic ticket, but we want to tell you we did not want to do it of our own free will."
Q. Were these colored men?
A. Yes, sir; colored men. That is what they told me voluntarily. The first thing they said to me as to their way of voting—indeed it looked like an apology. I, of course, felt no interest in the questions; I voted myself the parish ticket I voted. I voted at the primary election, and for the reason that I had made my selection, voted for each office. I voted the ticket which happened to be the popular ticket that was carried at the popular primary election. I voted for every one of them at the election myself; I felt no zeal, of course. I did not know myself when I came to the poll that there was not going to be a republican ticket. I did not know; I would say that I could not feel that it would make any difference; it could not be successful, because there had been no canvassing by the republican party.
Q. You may state now, Mr. Reiley—unless you think of some instances where you have had talk with colored people where they have complained to you, I will ask you another question.
A. Well, I don't know of any others occurring at this time.
Q. You may state how it has been in your ward and the wards of this parish generally in the previous elections of 1872 and 1874 in regard to forming republican clubs and holding republican meetings.
A. There were republican clubs in the different wards, but not being a politician myself and taking no stock in them, I never encourage republican clubs on my place; in fact, discourage it. I did not have any taste in that direction. They had clubs at the upper end of the ward. I may say of the men on my place one voted, but scarcely ever attended political meetings. They had a majority in each ward of the parish in 1872 and 1874. There were republican clubs organized and republican meetings held through this year.
Q. How was it in this last canvass? Do you know whether there was a republican club in the whole parish or not?
A. I don't think so.
Q. Do you know of any republican meetings being held; if so, how many?
A. I never heard but once. One was held when Mr. Packard was here, the only one I have heard of until I heard of one in the court-house here that had been held. I heard of it day before yesterday, but I spoke to a number in regard to them, and they said they never heard of that many at all.
Q. The only one you heard of in fact was the one held here when Mr. Packard spoke?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you attend very many?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What was the spirit manifested by the outside crowd that day where the speaking was going on?
A. It was not pleasant at all.
Q. Please describe it.
A. Mr. Packard was interrupted with questions. He was asked questions. He begged of them to let him proceed. He treated the matter with a great deal of pleasantry, and stated, "If you do not let me speak I will make a failure; and, my friends, Nicholls would not like it if he was speaking here;" and with such things as that would pass it off. The interruption was repeated by some parties on the outside, with kind of jeers, and such words as "Will you let me ask you a question?" and so on.
Q. State whether any spirit was manifested, in language or otherwise, by any of these outsiders.
A. Well, I could see the parties who were on the stand felt scary and they were glad to get away. They intended to go to Jackson that night, but the effect of the meeting here put that entirely out of the question—out of their line.
Q. The demonstration was such that they were alarmed for their personal safety?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Mr. Reiley, you may state what you know and all you saw and heard about these killings and whippings that took place.
A. I only heard of them. There were whippings; perhaps for different causes. Some were really whipped for stealing; one man—to be sure it is a little over the line in Baton Rouge; I sold him myself a lot of fifty acres. I gave him the contract, the article of agreement, to go and occupy it. He got permission from me to occupy the house and to build some additions to it. He took possession of it, when about three months after a crowd of men came one night and ordered him to go away, and then set the house on fire and after firing the house killed him.
Q. What was his name?
A. Joe Johnson; he was constable; I don't know of any other reason for killing him. He was a constable in Baton Rouge. He was a man who worked for me years before. I had not seen him for several years. After he came to buy that land he stated that he had half a dozen to buy the rest of the tract.
Q. Do you know of any other case? Did you ever hear of any other case of killing or whipping in this parish? I mean within a year or a year and a half past.
A. Well, within a year and a half, perhaps, yes. There was the killing of John Gair and a colored girl, his sister-in-law. I know nothing of the facts; I happened to be in the road next morning and heard it.
Q. Do you know whether you heard of any whippings?
A. Well, yes; I have heard of several being whipped, but for what causes I have not heard. I don't know. I know at this time, so far as I have heard, in my immediate vicinity I have not heard of any whippings that had any political bearing or consequences. It was threats simply. I did not hear of any whipping—no; I will recall that. On a plantation two miles below, the plantation of my son-in-law, there came a party one night and took one of his men out of bed, whipped him very severely, and told him if he wished to remain to notify certain men on my place, such and such men on that neighbor's place, that unless they all left they would be served in the same manner. They gave them their choice: to leave or to be whipped.
Q. What was that for? Was it stated?
A. It was not stated.
Q. He was to notify certain men on your plantation?
A. Yes, sir; and men on different plantations, that they must all clear out or be whipped.
Q. Now, do you know of any theory of your own why there were not republican clubs organized or meetings held in this parish during this last campaign?
A. I have a theory.
Q. Let us hear what it is.
A. My theory is that there was manifested a determination, a desperate determination, on the part of the democratic party to carry this election—to carry it anyhow. That sentiment was prominent from week to week; that the republicans had had their time; that their time was up; now that they were driven out of the parish, that there should be no more of the same kind here again.
Q. In the campaign the same sentiment was spoken?
A. Yes, sir. I do not believe anybody would have been safe on that account to have canvassed the State against the democrats. I asked a neighbor—a very strong democrat—I asked him if I had been a politician and started out with A, B, C, and D, if we could have got through without sacrifice of life. He said he did not believe we could. I don't think it was possible. On election day, however, I must say I never saw so quiet and peaceable an election. I could have voted five hundred republican tickets if the tickets had been here. But there was no hope of carrying on a canvass, as it was believed it was not safe. It was not because the republican party did not want to carry the election, but because they saw no hope under the circumstances of accomplishing anything; the pressure was too great.
Q. So that you think it was not even safe for any man to have gone about canvassing for the republican party in this parish or to organize republican clubs?
A. I am very positive of that in my mind, that it could not have been safe.
Q. You may state whether a great many leading republicans have been driven out of this parish since this last canvass.
A. Yes, sir; they were all colored republican office-holders.
Q. Owing to this last canvass?
A. This last canvass only commenced in the middle of last summer. I don't know that they were driven out since then. They had begun the summer before with the recorder and sheriff and a member of the Legislature, an ex-member of the Legislature not in office; they had all gone, and those left of the republicans in office I think resigned. I would like to be posted in regard to them. I know some of the members of the police jury resigned. Why they all resigned I would like somebody to tell me. I know one that did. I saw his resignation published in the Patriot Democrat and the reasons given.
Q. Now, sir, you may state what your opinion is as to the vote of this parish; what it would have been in the last election if the colored people had been left to vote as they pleased.
A. I suppose it would have been as the previous election; no reason to doubt there would have been any change at all if left to vote as they pleased.

JAMES LAW, (COLORED.)

Question. How old are you?
Answer. About twenty-six.
Q. Where do you reside?
A. Jackson, Louisiana.
Q. Do you reside there now?
A. That is my home, but I am in New Orleans, and have been here for the last month or so.
Q. Why are you stopping here in New Orleans?
A. There was such a reign of terror existing in the parish of East Feliciana, on account of politics, that I, being a republican—I was afraid that if I staid there I might have been killed.
Q. What part of the parish do you reside in?
A. I live in Jackson; I am a merchant there, and have kept store there for the last three or four years.
Q. You may state, in the first place, if you know of your own knowledge of any acts of intimidation of any white democrats in the parish of East Feliciana upon colored voters in that parish, either yourself or any other colored man, if you know of any of your own personal knowledge.
A. Well, I know of the organization of a democratic club in the town of Jackson, and I know of colored men being notified by white men to join the club.
Q. Give the names of persons as far as you can?
A. I remember Thomas Cook, a colored man; he has a carriage-shop in Jackson, and was advised by one of the leading citizens there, Dr. Pond, a white man.
Q. A democrat?
A. Yes, sir; he gave it to him as a piece of friendly advice, to connect himself with the democratic club; that he would not be safe in his property and person unless he did. I know of Thomas Carney, an intimate friend of mine, and one who has always heretofore acted with me in politics on the republican side. He joined the democratic club, and came to my store and told me, the evening of the same day, that he had joined—that he had to join the club; said that he could not live there. He had been notified that if he didn't join he would be killed or have to leave the parish. I was notified by a young man by the name of Camp Catlett, said to be a lieutenant in that organization they have there, secret organization—I think they go by the name of "298;" they meet regularly in Jackson there Thursday night—to keep out of politics. He said that he never deviled in politics himself before, but he was going to take an active part in politics this year; the white people propose to carry this election, and he anticipated the shedding of a great deal of blood if the colored people, or the republican party, attempted to organize and put a ticket in the field. I asked if it was possible they could disfranchise colored men in that way. He said that the negroes and damned radicals had been ruling there long enough. The white people had been ruled by them for the last ten years, and they proposed to get rid of them. At that time I was treasurer of the insane asylum, and in a few days my term of office would expire, and I had given satisfaction to the board, and it was known that I would have been re-elected. All the officers and attendants, employés of the asylum, were enlisted in my behalf. I don't think there was one opposed to me. They were continually bothering the members about my election. Before I became treasurer of the asylum it was badly managed. Mr. Irvin was treasurer of the asylum, a merchant of Bayou Sara and a democrat; but I succeeded Mr. Falls, and had got the thing into good shape, and that was the reason why the people wanted me as treasurer. Before I became treasurer they had not been paid regularly, but after I became treasurer they were paid regularly, and that is the reason why they were enlisted in my behalf. It was known that I was going to be a candidate, and Mr. Catlett came to me and said, "You have seen the notice in the papers that the bull-dozers had disbanded, and every man now that committed an outrage would be acting upon his own responsibility." He said, "That is no such thing." He said there was a little dissatisfaction in this primary election a few days ago that gave rise to the publication of this notice. But he says, "It is not true; don't you fool yourself. We have decided that no more republicans shall hold office in this parish, and don't you run for that office. If you do and are elected, you won't get home from the asylum." The board met in the asylum. Of course I knew he represented the sentiment of that organization. I have heard a great many acts that they had committed, and I did not allow my name to be used as a candidate.

Q. You may state whether the colored people voted at that primary election.

A. Not a single one to my knowledge.

Q. That primary election, as I understand it, is for the purpose of nominating candidates to be voted for on election day?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What we call conventions or caucuses?

A. Yes, sir. The thing is something new in our parish. Mr. Porter, a white democrat, said to me, "By God, you have figured in politics long enough, and if you attempt to organize the republican party in this parish you will be killed. I know what it is for; you may think Colonel Powers is able to protect you, but he is not."

Q. What was it about Isaac Perry?

A. This was also told me by Isaac Perry himself.

Q. Is he a colored man?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And a republican?

A. Yes, sir; he ran for the Legislature in 1874; he has always figured in politics, and was secretary of the republican parish committee; he lived, I think, about eight miles from Jackson. Perry and I have been in our childhood associates. We went to school together and were very intimate. We differed sometimes in politics, not as to principle, but as to men—as to who should fill different positions in the party. We never differed as to principle. We always agreed as to principle. I sent for him to know if he would go over to Pointe Coupée to a senatorial convention as one of the delegates, and also to go down to New Orleans to the State convention as one of the delegates of our parish representing the republican party. He told me no. I asked him why. He said that he had been visited two or three times by the democrats, and they failed to find him at home on the first two visits; on the third visit they found him; that time was in the day-time; I am not certain whether it was in the day-time or night. I know that they had visited him in the night and he was not at home. They asked his mother for him, and his mother told them he was not at home. She went on to say, "Your object is to whip Isaac because he is a republican, and you intend, if Isaac is fool enough to let you catch him, to whip him." They had a line with them, and they pitched into her by way of retribution. The last visit they found Isaac Perry at home, and they asked him if he was secretary of the republican parish committee. He told them yes, he had been, but he was not in politics at all. He was asked if he had the proceedings of the parish committee. He told them "No; Mr. Gair kept the books containing the proceedings of the parish committee all the time, and he didn't have the books to give them." They made him promise that he would keep out of politics. He said that was one reason why he could not go to the State convention or go to the senatorial convention; if he did, he would break the promise that he had made them, and death would be the punishment.

Q. State any other case that occurs to you.

A. I know of a man by the name of Nelson, who lived with John Scott Smith, a white man, near the corporation of the town of Jackson, who was whipped the very day that General Nicholls spoke in Clinton. He was whipped by a man by the name of John W. Smith and another by the name of Tom McCuen, both promi nent democrats.

Q. Were they white men and democrats?

A. Yes, sir; they were prominent white men and democrats.

Q. You may state whether there has been any other acts of intimidation against you—whether, in the latter part of September, 1876, you were notified by anybody that you must join a democratic club.

A. Yes, sir; I was visited by Mr. William Northsworthy, a citizen living in Jackson

Q. A white man?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. A democrat?

A. Yes, sir. He was a candidate for nomination at the primary election—was at that time. He came down, he said, not in the capacity of a politician, but in the capacity of a citizen, to advise me. He says, "You own property here, and are interested in the country. The colored people in this section of the country will do as you do." He says, "We have had two or three meetings, and we could not get any colored men to join, with the exception of two or three." I think there was some colored men who had joined the democratic club—four of them boys under age—under twenty-one years of age. I subsequently hired one of them to clerk in my store. He was about sixteen, I think. He says, "You are interested in this country; have got property here, and you must live here. You cannot leave your property and go away from here, and I want to know if you won't go and join the democratic club." He did not say "democratic club," but "join this club up here." He says, "You know the condition of the country; you know that your people are being whipped and murdered and everything of that kind, and we want to get—want to stop that thing, and if you all will join this thing will be stopped." I said, "There is no probability of stopping it before that time?" He said, "No." I asked why. He said, "Well, you see the republican party have been ruling." I said, "You are willing to admit that these acts of violence are committed by democrats." He said, "Certainly." "Well," I said, "you know the effect the democrats are trying to produce by whipping these colored people—keeping up a state of terrorism in this parish." He said, "Yes, and that is the very reason why I want you to join the democratic party." I said "You want me to help you put these men in office." He said, "Yes." "How do you expect to have a better state of affairs when you want to make the government out of the same materials that has kept up this state of terrorism?" He says, "That is something that I didn't come here to discuss. I want to know if you are going to join this club." He said, "You are a republican; can you afford to live in this community and be a republican?" I said, "I have always been a republican heretofore, but it is rather different now to what it was then." I said, "I am going to risk it." He said, "Well, you must accept the consequences, and not blame anybody but yourself." I said, "Now, Mr. Northsworthy, there is no use in trying to scare me into joining that club, because if I did it you would know that I did not do it with the sincerity you expect." I said, "You have got seven names on your list." I said, "There is not but one of those men who will vote the democratic ticket on the day of election—no, two." He asked who they were, and I told him Charles Shattuck and George Keller. The next day Shattuck came down to my store and told me he was a republican in principle, but, he says, "I am a poor man, and I have got a family." And he says, "I am working for these democrats." One-half of the town of Jackson, in the early part of last year, had burned up, and he was a carpenter employed in rebuilding the stores burned down; and he says "I have been notified by these very men that have got me employed that if I don't join their club I cannot expect to make my meat and bread off of them." He says, "You understand me; I am a republican, but we have not got any protection. I am not secure in being a republican; besides, I cannot afford to have the bread taken out of the mouths of my family and my mouth" And he says, "I have connected myself with them." He says, "You see, we always expected protection up there. We expected every day that something would turn up that would furnish us some protection so that we could organize the party, and go around, as we have all the time heretofore, and make speeches and put republican candidates in the field." He says "that the Government affords you no protection, and you cannot organize the party and go around making speeches. I am as good a republican as you are, and I shall not say anything about you. The democrats want me to go about and talk for them." And he says, "If they pay my expenses and pay me for my day's work I will go round and talk for them; but I will not abuse any republicans." That was George Shattuck.

Q. Was there any attempt made to injure your property?

A. On the 15th—I think it was between the 12th and 15th of September, 1876—S. B. Packard, the present governor of this State, in company with Col. Jack Wharton, J. Pinkney Harris, James Lewis, and Judge Campbell, they sent me a lot of notices before that time that they were going to hold a mass-meeting.

Q. A political meeting?

A. Yes, sir; a mass-meeting we call it. They were republicans, and they were going to be speakers, and I posted the papers as best I could; sent them around through the country by private couriers. I hired one man and paid him to take the posters around, but they failed to post them up, because they were afraid, and brought them back. I have got the posters now I believe. At any rate they had a meeting, and I went there.

Q. Where was the meeting?

A. In Clinton. It was either the 12th or 15th. I went there, and Captain De Grey, who was just on the stand, Colonel Powers, and Mr. Anderson, who was supervisor of registration, had held a meeting and had chosen Rev. John A. Reiley as president of the meeting. Mr. Reiley was afraid to act as president. Said that he would not act as president, and wanted Captain De Grey to act. He said, "That he would not." Then we were at a loss to find somebody to introduce the speakers. They did not live there. I volunteered and told the gentlemen that I would act as president of the meeting. I went up and introduced the speakers and carried on the meeting. I went home. I anticipated trouble on the way, and I didn't go back the same way I came—the same road. I got home at night. That was on Friday. The next day we were to have a large mass-meeting in Bayou Sara. I went down to Bayou Sara to that meeting. On Saturday night the front of my store was saturated with coal oil and set on fire.

Q. Do you know who by?

A. I will tell you in a few minutes. It was put out by my clerk or the man keeping books for me. I got home Sunday evening; Monday morning a man by the name of Crilly, (him and I were friends, but he was a democrat and I was a republican,) he told me that politics was the cause of it. He says, "You have got property here, and you live here," and he says, "you are going around here making political speeches for the republicans, and the first thing you know your store will be burned up. You make a living in that store?" I said, "Yes, sir." He said, "Very well, if you are not careful your property will be burned up." He said, "I advise you as a friend to keep out of politics; let politics alone, and come up and connect yourself with this democratic club." I told him that I would not do that. He said in addition to that, "You are charged with having held a meeting in West Feliciana a few nights ago, a republican meeting, speaking to about sixty negroes and advising them to raise clubs and vote the radical ticket." I said, "That is a mistake." I said that "the condition of my health would not permit me to go out, in the dark hour of midnight and make speeches; you know that is a lie." He said, "You are accused of it, and unless you go before the democratic club and make an explanation you may be hurt." I said "I didn't believe, and didn't know, that they had a right to ask what I should do." He said, "this democratic club tyrannizes this part of the parish." I said it didn't control me, and I did not mean to go. He insisted that I should go. He felt very friendly to me and he didn't want any trouble. He told me the name of the two gentlemen who set my store on fire. He said, "One saturated the door the last time after it had been put out, and he went to him and tried to get him to go away. He said, "he is a damned radical anyhow." He said, "If you burn his store down you will burn other property.' He said that he was going to burn it up; and when they were saturating it the second time, the first time it was put out, my clerk told him, if they were determined to burn the store to wait until he got his individual effects out. He had his clothes in there and he wanted to get them out. This man said that he persuaded these gentlemen to leave there.

Q. Any other acts to you or threats that were made to you or any other colored men?

A. I know of lots of colored men who were threatened in Jackson; if they didn't join the club they could not expect to live in their houses safely.

Q. Do you know of any colored men who were whipped, or shot, or hung for any reason or purpose?

A. Yes, sir; I know that William Chaney—he was president of a republican club in the sixth ward—he was hung until he was supposed to be dead; he was insensible when he was let down. He promised to interfere with politics no more or be president of the club, and they let him alone. I know of one Monroe Meyers, who was taken out of his house by a lot of white democrats, as he said. He was president of a club also, and was turned loose because he said he would have no more to do with politics. I know that Aaron McKenzie was whipped so bad that his finger-nails were whipped off, and, as he says, put in a yellow-jacket's nest. Do you know what a yellow-jacket's nest is? It is a kind of little bee. He promised never to have anything of the kind to do with politics.

Q. Were there any republican clubs in that parish?

A. No, sir.

Q. Any republican meetings held, except this meeting when Packard and others spoke at Clinton?

A. There was no republican meetings held, to my knowledge. I have heard of this Alonzo Brooks attempting to organize a club, and, being threatened, subsequently abandoned the idea. It was never attempted to organize a club in that parish.

Q. You may state whether, in your opinion, it would have been safe for any republican.

A. It would not have been safe. I will relate another instance that occurred. General Hugh J. Campbell came up in August to see if he could not organize the republican party in that parish. He came to Clinton and sent Colonel Powers over to Jackson. Colonel Powers arrived in the night, and he found me and this man Chaney and Tom Cook and one or two more leading colored men, and he requested us to go the next day to Clinton and consult with General Campbell and see what we could do to organize the republican party, Tom Cook absolutely refused to risk himself. He said that he didn't want to have anything to do with politics; there had been so many men killed and whipped that he was afraid to risk it. He refused to go. Tom Chaney that night refused to go, and I sat down and wrote a letter. I told Colonel Powers the whole thing, about the general state of insecurity of life of any man who would attempt to organize the republican party. The fact of his being in Clinton and me going out to Clinton that day would arouse suspicion in the minds of the democrats, and my life would not be safe. I said that I had "some business at Clinton," and I went to the president of the democratic club and told him that I had "some business at Clinton," and wanted to disabuse his mind as to my purpose, and hired a horse and buggy from him and went out there to see General Campbell. I slipped in the room back of the tax-collector's office and held a consultation with him and came out; and when I got home that night I was asked by several democrats—I was in conversation with this man Hazzard who is now town-mayor, and another man, and some parties called this other man out and said, "Don't you talk with Law. He is a dammed rascal. He is trying to organize the republican party. He is been out to-day in conversation with General Campbell." I went back, and I heard several times that they were coming down to talk to me, and wanted to know what I was going to do, and I told them that I was not going to have anything to do with politics, and was not going to vote.

Q. Why were not you?

A. I was afraid. I am attempting to convey that idea into your mind now. I was absolutely afraid. I was elected in 1872 to the Legislature in that parish by the republicans; beat the democratic candidate in 1872. In 1874 I was a candidate and was defeated. There was a division in the republican party and I was defeated.

Q. Would it have been safe for a republican to have gone through that parish holding republican meetings?

A. I rode over from Clinton with Mr. McClennan, a prominent democrat, in July, 1876, in a buggy, and he said "that the republican party is dead in this parish," and he said, "I understand that Packard has announced in the paper that he would be here on the 15th of September. My God! If I was in his shoes, I would not come to this parish. If he comes here I bet he will never get out."

Q. What was your opinion as to the result of the election of that parish of East Feliciana if the colored people had been left free to vote as they pleased?

A. My dear sir, they would have elected the republican ticket by a large majority. There is eight colored men that voted the democratic ticket. We always counted on about eight that we knew would vote the democratic ticket. They were under the influence of democrats in the parish. They were employed by democrats, and they used their influence over them and took them to the polls. Some would take them in their buggies. Some are old, feeble men, and they took them right on to the polls and voted them and put them in a buggy and carried them back home—that is, these democrats would. Outside of that there is not a democrat in in the parish. That is my honest conviction.

Thus I might go on, Mr. Speaker, and cite the positive testimony of scores of witnesses in regard to all the other bull-dozed parishes, to the same effect, but time will not allow.

The testimony already referred to establishes beyond all question the fact of intimidation in all the disputed parishes, which it seems to me virtually settles all the questions of fact involved in this investigation, and convinces every fair-minded man that the electoral vote of Louisiana should be counted for Hayes and Wheeler.

But in addition to all this positive evidence of murder, violence, and intimidation, we have the admissions of a vast number of witnesses called by the majority of the committee which fully corroborates every claim which republicans have made with regard to the election in that State. I can refer to but a few of them:

Judge Hughes testifies that colored men have been intimidated to some extent.

Thomas T. More says that regulating may have run into political matters.

Nelson Ball says he saw one hundred mounted and armed men in one of said parishes in October, 1876.

John Haley swears that he heard that bodies of armed men passed through the parish the Sunday night before the election.

Littleton Jones heard of the presence of regulators in the parish; that they had attacked Senator Weber, and tried to kill him while crossing the river.

Major Wedge says that he knows that armed white men rode through the sixth ward of his parish.

Alex. Pool testifies that colored men told him they should vote the democratic ticket, but they would not if it was not for certain men whom they feared.

William King says he knew Willis Wisham; that in July, 1876, four or five men came to his cabin and inquired for him; that they were armed with pistols, and he was frightened. These men said Willis had been talking about the Gair and Matthews matter, and told King to tell him when he came back that he had better get out of there.

William Hansberry swears that one Maxwell, a white democrat, told him that he could not vote the republican ticket and live there; that he would be cleaned out. He says he was afraid and went and joined the democratic club and voted the democratic ticket, as he was ordered to do.

Henry Matthews says he heard that bodies of armed white men were riding through the parish during the canvass.

John Sensley says that he heard that it was said at a democratic meeting the night before the election that the colored men must vote one way or the other, or they could not live in that country.

He says he believes that many of the colored men did not vote as they wished to; that many of them would have voted the republican ticket if they had been allowed to.

Josiah Johnson testifies that he voted the democratic ticket against his will; that Anthony Wilson, a white democrat, told him the night before the election that if he did not get out and vote the next day the head and foot boards of his coffin would be nailed the next night. "I had intended to vote the republican ticket before that."

He also says that squads of armed men rode about the parish; that they stopped at his house and told him he must come out to the democratic meeting; this was in the night-time, after he had gone to bed.

He says that he thought if he did not go to the election and vote the democratic ticket he would certainly be harmed.

Solomon Jefferson swears that he heard a speaker at a democratic meeting say that unless the colored men voted the democratic ticket they would have to suffer the consequences; that if colored men did not vote with the white democrats they would find out that there had never been any bull-dozing such as there would be after the election.

W. A. Cane says that he did take the names of the colored men who voted the republican ticket on election day.

Austin Williams says that he was told that if he did not vote the democratic ticket he could not live in the parish.

J. P. Monahan admits that he told Henry Smith, when he came back to Clinton, that his life would not be safe if he staid there.

Isaac Butler says that he heard that the bull-dozers were riding around the parish whipping and beating colored men.

Dan Wisham testifies that he had always voted the republican ticket, and should have done so at the last election, only that he did not want to be bothered.

Anthony Wilson swears that he did not vote the democratic ticket of his own free will; he says that white democrats came to his house in the night-time, after he and his family had gone to bed, and threatened him because he had been organizing republican clubs. They told him they were bull-dozers, and that he must join their club and vote the democratic ticket. They also visited other colored men the same night, whom they threatened in the same way. I told a white democrat about it, and he said the white people were determined to change the government, and were going to make the colored people help them.

Nathan Morgan testifies that one white democrat told him that if he did not vote the democratic ticket he would wish he had. Other colored men told me I must vote the democratic ticket or the white people would hurt me.

Bruce Pipes says that more or less of the colored men voted the democratic ticket because they were frightened; he understood that if they did not vote that ticket they would be killed or hurt. He also says that he did not vote that ticket of his own will.

J. W. Mann testifies that he did not get up a republican club because republicanism was not popular in that ward.

Henry Brookhart swears that regulators were around down to last summer; heard that colored republicans were killed. Knew Watson; his store was burned and he shot at. Julius Green, an active republican, was shot at on his way home from church.

Alex. Robbins admits that he rode around with fifteen or twenty other armed men in night-time down to September, 1876; that they took colored men out of their beds; that they practiced this all through the summer and fall of 1876.

Leon Jastrumski says I heard of bodies of armed men called regulators, who traveled through the country last fall and in the early part of the winter.

J. W. Dupree swears that he heard of an organization of men who were in the habit of going about the parish committing acts of violence upon colored people.

V. M. Lange testifies that he has heard of colored men being killed in that parish on account of their politics.

L. C. Morris says that he had heard of bodies of armed men riding through the parish in the night, and that the colored people were intimidated thereby; that these men had shot Myers and his son, and committed other acts of violence.

E. D. Wood says he has heard within the past year that bodies of armed white men were riding through the parish in the night-time, committing depredations upon colored men.

A. H. Levy says he has heard the reports of violence upon colored people by white democrats for some time past. The colored people all have the impression that there is intimidation, and that it is carried on by white democrats. He says he saw a man, only a week before, who told him he was forcibly taken from his house, and a rope put around his neck, and whipped, and told to leave the parish, and that he left. He further states that this man is a republican, as all the colored people naturally are when left free, and that he was roped because he was a republican. The effect of these acts of violence has been to hinder a fair expression of their opinion at the ballot-box. He says he knows, from report and otherwise, that many colored men were compelled to vote the democratic ticket and join democratic clubs to save their property and lives. The colored men had all been sufficiently cowed and intimidated before the day of the election.

Jackson Hamilton says he heard of acts of violence to colored men because they were republicans.

Mortimer Price swears that it is his opinion that many of the colored men voted the democratic ticket because they were frightened to it.

These colored men are weak-minded and timid. They had families and did not know but what they would be hung, and so they thought if they joined the democratic party they would get along.

Charles J. Verbois says he had heard of the bull-dozers, and that they were riding around the parish a few months before the election.

Gustave Le Blanc swears that there was considerable bull-dozing done in the parish; that the general complaint among the colored people was that they were afraid of them. The colored people are republicans when left to their own judgment, but a good many were afraid to vote as they wished.

Some of the colored men were scared by these bull-dozing stories. They are timid. The stories had an effect upon their minds.

Mr. Speaker, in weighing this evidence and considering the grave questions involved in this investigation I have endeavored to divest my mind as far as possible of all partisan and political bias and to arrive at the truth.

I have given to the subject careful thought, earnest study, and mature reflection; and as the result I find myself forced to the conviction that the following facts will be found from the testimony proved beyond question or reasonable doubt:

1. The organization and existence in said parishes as early as the spring or summer of 1875 of bodies of armed and mounted white men, called the White League, or Regulators, with complete regimental and company organizations.

2. That these bodies of men were in the habit of riding through said parishes in the night-time, whipping, shooting, hanging, and driving off colored republicans.

3. That the colored people, being naturally timid and easily frightened, were intimidated by these acts of violence from voting the republican ticket, and forced to join democratic clubs and vote the democratic ticket.

4. That in the last political canvass the democratic party was desperate, and was determined to carry the election at all hazards, as will be seen by confidential circulars issued from headquarters; to accomplish which a certain element in the party did not hesitate to resort to any measures to secure the colored vote, without which they knew they could not succeed, as the colored men in Louisiana, when left free, are almost unanimously republican.

5. That the alleged original and ostensible object and purpose of the White League, or regulators, was to break up thieving and the destruction of property; but the testimony shows that when they were fully organized they were manipulated by the leaders, changed into democratic clubs, pledged to vote the democratic ticket, kept in working order and on duty down to the very time of the election, and made to do the work they were originally designed to, and that was, by terror and acts of violence, to control the colored vote.

6. That these bodies of armed men were seen at different points in said parishes during the spring and summer of 1876, in squads of from five to one hundred, all mounted and armed with rifles, shot-guns, and pistols.

7. That the white democrats shot Henry Pinkston, John Gair, Gilbert Carter, Isaac Mitchell, and scores of other prominent republicans, for political reasons, and whipped and drove away most of those they did not shoot or hang.

8. That a large portion of the white people in said parishes have no proper appreciation of the value of human life and believe that the only way to manage the colored voter is with a bludgeon in one hand and a pistol in the other.

9. That at one poll, at least in one of said parishes, on the day of election, every colored man who voted the democratic ticket was furnished with a passport or safe-conduct, which showed that he had voted the democratic ticket and that he was to be protected against the White League, the regulators, or any other body of armed white democrats.

10. That in every political campaign, until the last, republican clubs had been organized and kept up in every ward in said parishes, but during the last canvass not a republican club was organized in either of the three parishes investigated by us, and only one republican meeting was held in each parish, and these were attended with great peril both to the speakers and the republicans who were present.

11. That democratic clubs were early formed in every ward of each of the parishes, and the colored voters were given to understand that unless they attended and joined they would be obliged to leave their homes and flee the country, or suffer the consequences.

12. That the great increase of democratic clubs, and in the number of colored voters roped into them, and the immense change and falling off in the republican vote since 1874, in the light of the testimony we have taken, shows the terrible pressure of fear and terror brought to bear upon the colored men in these parishes by the desperate men working in the interest of the democratic party.

13. That no democratic colored man, and scarcely a white democrat, has ever been killed in either of said parishes; it has generally been the colored republicans; and in nearly every case where it has been attempted to be claimed that the cause of the homicide was a personal difficulty, it has failed, but has generally disclosed the fact that the murderer was a white democrat and the victim a colored republican.

14. That from July 24, 1875, to December 24, 1876, twenty-four murders were committed in the parish of West Feliciana, twenty of the victims being colored; while in the parishes of East Baton Rouge, where Morgan, the coronor, was notified not to hold any more inquests, and East Feliciana, there were nearly an equal number during the same time, many of which could be traced directly to political causes, that being the most reasonable apology for most of them.

15. That on one occasion a large body of these democratic white-leaguers or regulators, entered the office of Judge Dula, parish judge in West Feliciana, and, with violent language and threats of personal injury, demanded his resignation, on some false pretense, but really because he was a republican.

16. That the same, or another body of armed men of like character, entered the court-house in Saint Francisville, in the same parish when the court was in session, and in a threatening and violent manner broke up and dispersed the court, and then compelled the immediate resignation of all the republican members of the police jury.

Every man engaged in these lawless outrages upon law and order was a white democrat, and each man they drove out of office was a republican, and yet these men say it had no political significance.

17. That men supposed to belong to the same marauding party made an attack upon Senator Weber and attempted to shoot him in his own house; and not succeeding in this, afterward waylaid him and attempted to kill him while crossing the river on his way to his home at Saint Francisville.

18. That a large body of armed white democrats, supposed to be a portion of the same organization, under the lead of Joseph A. Norwood, lieutenant-colonel of the White League in the parish of East Feliciana and chairman of the democratic central committee in said parish, in October, 1875, entered the court-house in Clinton, while the court was in session, drove Henry Smith, the republican sheriff, out of the court-house, and shot him, firing twenty-five or thirty shots at him while he was running across the court-house yard to avoid them; and with threats and violence broke up the court, and drove Judge Dewing, a republican judge, out of the parish, because, as they alleged, they took offense at the manner in which he charged the jury in a certain case which had been tried before him; and, in consequence, there has not been a term of court held in the parish since, as Judge Dewing does not dare to go back there to attempt to exercise the functions of his office.

19. That on the 11th of July, 1876, a body of armed men took Gilbert Carter, a bright, respectable colored man, and an active and earnest republican, out of his bed and house in the night-time, and when he attempted to escape from their tortures, they shot him to death at his own door, in the presence of his wife and children.

20. That they also killed Isaac Mitchel and Ephraim Armstrong, two other colored republicans, in the same way, and attempted to murder Julius Green, another active colored republican, while on his way home from church with his wife on a Sabbath afternoon. That on the night of the 27th of May, 1876, the white democrats attempted to assassinate W. G. Lane, a prominent republican and candidate for the Legislature, at the Harney House, in the city of Baton Rouge, because he was a republican and had been the prime mover and principal actor in a republican convention which had been held there on that day.

21. That they tied John Gair, one of the most intelligent and bravest of the colored leaders in the State of Louisiana, to a tree and shot him to death, and hung his sister-in-law, Babe Mathews, to a tree in the court-house yard at Clinton.

22. That in addition to these cold-blooded murders, they have, during the past two years, whipped and beaten scores of colored republicans; for which no possible reason can be assigned except that they were republicans, and that they refused to join the democratic clubs or vote that ticket.

23. That nearly every leading republican, both white and colored, residing in said parishes, has been driven away from his home by the threats and acts of white democrats, and are now exiles in New Orleans and other places, and dare not return for fear of being killed.

24. That no republican in either of said parishes has dared to come before this subcommittee, for fear of losing his life or his property, to assist in the examination of the witnesses or to testify, although they have been invited and urged to do so.

25. That it is very apparent, from the testimony as taken, that the majority of the committee have been generally very careful in this investigation not to put upon the stand those who have been personally engaged in these acts of violence and murder, as shown by the testimony which was used before the State returning board at New Orleans.

26. That during our whole investigation there has seemed to be a studied effort on the part of the majority of the committee, as will be seen on reference to the testimony, to so frame every question as to clearly and plainly suggest to each witness the answer to be given, the effect of which has been, as I think, unintentional, of course, on the part of the majority of the committee, to cover up and justify all these acts of murder and violence, and thus to bolster up and strengthen the democratic theory, instead of getting at the real truth and inwardness of the conduct of the white democracy during the late campaign in Louisiana.

27. That nearly every negro put upon the stand, except some few who had always voted the democratic ticket, has plainly shown by his manner that he was testifying under compulsion, and that he dared not go back upon those in whose presence he was testifying, or refuse to testify to what he had been told.

They all told the same story, in very nearly the same language, which indicates very clearly the perfect system to which this intimidation has been reduced, and the complete and utter subjection of the colored people in said parishes.

28. That a great many of the colored men who have testified before us have been forced to admit that they joined democratic clubs and voted that ticket against their will, and because they were given to understand, in various ways, that unless they did so they would be murdered, whipped, or driven from the parish.

29. The testimony, I think, also shows most conclusively that although it was given out in 1875, when the White League or regulators were organized in these parishes, that they were to break up thieving and lawlessness, yet it was then intended and designed that they should be used in the then approaching political campaign, and that during the fall and winter of 1875, and the spring and summer of 1876, they were used for that purpose; in consequence of which the colored people were so perfectly frightened and cowed by the murders and acts of violence committed by these armed democratic bands that when the canvass commenced they had only to say to the colored men that they had better join the democratic clubs and vote that ticket, and they knew at once that such an admonition meant compliance or death.

30. That making liberal allowance for disaffection toward the State ticket, and for loss of colored votes through enticements, there must remain a republican majority in Louisiana on a fair and free election of not less than 15,000.

Mr. Speaker, tongue cannot utter, pen cannot describe, pencil cannot paint, the imagination cannot conceive of the terror and consternation which filled the minds of the colored people in the bull-dozed parishes of Louisiana during the late political campaign. None who have not seen it can realize or even fully believe it.

But, sir, the facts exist and thousands of American citizens in the South are to-day as fully and completely disfranchised by fear as they were by law when offered for sale upon the auction-block or crouching in fear in the slave-pens.

In view then, sir, of the startling disclosures which have been made in this investigation, is it not time for the loyal and patriotic men of this country to arouse from their lethargy, crush out this spirit of tyranny, protect the sacredness of the ballot-box, and preserve the purity of the elective franchise?

Is it, sir, to be tolerated that in these United States any illegitimate organization of armed men, acting in sympathy, open and avowed, with a great political party, shall seize upon the public highway, establish illegal military control of a whole parish, stop travelers on the public road by armed force, close access to the polls to peaceable citizens, domineer over the right of election, and shoot to death all who decline to submit to their villainous tyranny?

Is it to be tolerated that murder shall be a recognized part of the machinery of politics, and that terror is the best ally of democratic reform? That force, unmeasured and unrestrained, is the substitute for law? That reason shall be dethroned by passion, and the regular course and progress of legal rights become the prey of evil and unregulated malice, with no limit but the will of the tyrant mob, which makes and executes at once its own wild and bloody decrees?

It will be noticed, Mr. Speaker, that the great mass of the testimony has been taken by the majority of the committee with a view to show that no violence, improper influences or intimidation was resorted to or practiced by the white democrats during the late election toward the colored voters in said parishes, for the purpose of changing or influencing their votes; but that the cold-blooded murders, whippings, and beatings which have been perpetrated upon colored republicans by white democrats during the last two years in said parishes have all been committed for the purpose of breaking up a system of stealing which prevailed; and a violent, but unsuccessful, attempt has been made by interested, and I have no doubt, in many cases, guilty witnesses, to explain and justify the scores of wicked and atrocious murders which have shocked the civilized world, caused cruelty to blush, and brought a well-merited stain of reproach upon the white people of those parishes.

Most of this testimony is of a purely negative character, as will be seen by reference to it, which, weighed by the well-established rules of law applicable to such evidence, is of little value, and especially when met by the positive testimony of such witnesses as have been called to the stand by the minority of the committee.

Such testimony, it seems to me, can have but very little weight as bearing upon the question as to whether the colored people were intimidated or not.

The weight to be given to this negative testimony and the rule of law applicable to its consideration are well illustrated by eminent writers whose attention has lately been called to this subject:

As might have been expected, the testimony adduced to establish the fact of intimidation is positive and specific, giving place, date, names, and circumstances, while the rebutting statements are general, negative, and vague. The man who sees, hears, and feels must always be able to speak to the point, while he who does not see, hear, nor feel can only say so. On questions of outrage, dead bodies, scars, wounds, invalids, and cripples are convincing witnesses.

When fifty men testify that they did not see a certain thing, and fifty more or less testify that they did see that thing, which side is to be believed? Everybody knows the rule of law and of common sense. One man who saw and swears to it outweighs fifty who did not see and swears to that. Strip the Louisiana case of all disguises and excrescences, and it is simply an illustration of this well-known rule. One man who saw that his life was in danger if he voted as he pleased ought to outweigh many men who did not hear any violence or hear any threats. We are supposing that the witnesses are equally credible; that there is no reason to doubt that each swears to what he believes to be the truth; yet the knowledge of one man outweighs the ignorance of thousands. Assassination, beating, intimidation of voters in any form, are crimes in Louisiana. No man takes pains to commit crimes with all possible publicity. The one witness who saw a murder committed and identifies the murderer, is infinitely more important than the many who did not see, and who thinks that the murder was not committed at all or was committed by somebody else. Thousands swear that they personally know certain facts. On the other side, thousands swear that they did not see any intimidation nor hear any threats, and that they know nothing to warrant the belief that the election was not fair and free. Which set of witnesses is to be believed? Which would be believed if the issue were the guilt or innocence of a man accused of horse-stealing?

In these few words the Louisiana case, as it now stands, is summed up. Thousands swear that they saw, and thousands more that they did not see. The Presidency of the United States depends, in equity if not in actual result, upon the degree of credibility to which such conflicting testimony is entitled. As to these, we must either believe the thousands who swear to what they saw and suffered, or the thousands who swear that they did not see and did not suffer.

Considerable testimony has been taken by the committee tending to contradict the affidavits made by the supervisors of registration and some other witnesses, which were used before the State returning board at New Orleans, and also tending to impeach the character of said affiants for truth and veracity, touching the matter of intimidation during the registration of voters, and also on the day of the election. Most of this class of testimony comes from very bitter democratic partisans and politicians, or from defeated and disappointed candidates for office, and can, therefore, in my judgment, have very little weight in the minds of candid and impartial men in determining the grave questions involved in this investigation. But even if they are contradicted and shown to have made statements or admissions in some respects inconsistent with the sworn affidavits they afterward made, how can that affect or in any manner neutralize the great mass of positive evidence coming from witnesses which the majority of the subcommittee put upon the stand, showing that there was violence and intimidation, and that the statements in said affidavits are in fact true?

The majority of the committee has taken great pains to have given in the testimony the names of the colored members of the various democratic clubs in said parishes.

To my mind nothing could be more conclusive than this array of names of the terrible effect of the acts of violence committed upon the colored people of those parishes by the democracy during the last political canvass.

A large number of the colored witnesses examined by the majority of the committee were ministers of the gospel, who, by their own concessions upon the stand, had studiously avoided conversing with their colored brethren upon the subject of politics, had taken no part in the canvass, and, of course, were entirely ignorant of the sentiment and feelings of the colored voters in their parishes upon political questions.

Something has been said in the course of the examination in regard to there not being any republican tickets at the polling-places in the parish of East Feliciana at the last election. But all democratic anxiety on that point is set at rest by the evidence of James Law, which shows why there were none was because no man could be found in that parish bold and reckless enough to receive and distribute them.

In regard to the testimony of many of the white witnesses I am compelled to say that the desperate and reckless manner in which they testified I have never seen equaled, and I only put it in the mildest form when I say that no man who is not blinded by prejudice, or willfully obstinate through partisan zeal, can read their testimony, taken before the committee, and give it the least possible weight.

A large number of witnesses were introduced for the purpose of proving that the shooting of Gilbert Carter, Isaac Mitchel, and John Gair, three prominent, active republicans, was in no way connected with political considerations, and that the killing of eighteen other colored men, in the parish of West Feliciana, between the 24th of July, 1875, and the 24th of December, 1876, and the murder of about an equal number in each of the other parishes of East Baton Rouge and East Feliciana, during the same period of time, was not for political purposes; yet when we consider that in every case the evidence shows that these colored men were obnoxious to the white democracy on account of their pronounced republicanism, and that they were in most instances leaders among their race, it raises, in my mind, a presumption which cannot be overcome by the testimony of ther murderers.

It is not denied that these horrible crimes have been committed in these parishes; indeed, I understand all to admit it, but claim that they had no political origin.

Now, the questions arise, were these crimes committed for political ends, and was the effect of them, and of other acts of violence and threats, such as to deter men, who wished to do so, from voting the republican ticket?

As to the purpose, we must say that the facts speak for themselves. A great many persons were killed, or assaulted with violence; they were nearly all republicans, and in nearly every case they were republicans of such local importance that the fact of their assassination would necessarily alarm many others and deter republican voters. Precisely in the parishes where these things occurred the republican vote most unaccountably decreased—unaccountably, if we suppose that these acts of violence were not the cause. Nobody has attempted to give any explanation of the fact that, out of thousands of known republicans in East Feliciana, for example, only one solitary man dared to vote, excepting upon the theory that they were deterred by violence. No man has given, and no man can give, any explanation of the amazing decrease of republican votes in certain localities, and not in other parts of that State, who ignores the fact that in those very localities acts of violence were most frequent.

Now, as to the nature and effect of these misdeeds.

Scores of witnesses swear that they saw the effects of this violence; some that they were personally assaulted; some that they knew of the murder of others and were warned that it would not be safe to vote the republican ticket; some that they were personally threatened or warned; many that they did not vote as they wished, because of the real or supposed danger, and many others that among their acquaintances there were many republicans thus coerced or driven from the polls by fear. A superficial reading of this evidence, conflicting as it is, might leave the mind in doubt, and a partisan of either side, giving credence only to what pleases him, might find it in confirmation of his prejudices; but an impartial judge, carefully weighing the testimony, would conclude that there was such intimidation as the law of Louisiana denounces and renders penal, and that such intimidation did materially affect the result. Such is the nature of the evidence, and from it a fair minded man can come to but one conclusion.

The testimony also reveals the fact that during the late political campaign a large number of colored republicans were taken out of their beds and their houses in the night-time and cruelly whipped by bodies of armed men, until, through pain and loss of blood, they fainted and were left for dead, while others were beaten with bludgeons and pistols until life was nearly extinct.

The fiendish spirit by which a portion of the white people of East Feliciana have been moved during the last two years toward the colored people of that parish is well exemplified in the case of two inhuman wretches who took a colored boy, fourteen years old, and, after subjecting him to all manner of tortures, tied him to their horse's tail, dragged him nearly a mile, and then shot him to death.

Nearly equal to that in atrocity and wickedness was the case of the murder of John Gair and his sister-in-law, Babe Matthews, without, as I say, one word of evidence upon which a reasonable man would have acted in the smallest matter.

John Gair was a bright, active, intelligent colored man, in the prime of life, a thorough and earnest republican, and an oracle and leader among his people in the State of Louisiana. In every political campaign he was the first to lead off in the organization of republican clubs, getting up of republican meetings, and doing whatever was necessary to an active and successful prosecution of the canvass.

This, together with the great influence he exerted over the colored people of the State, made him extremely obnoxious to the white democracy, and they set about to concoct a plan by which they could get rid of him.

Fortunately for those who were compassing his death, they hit upon the very creature who was in every way qualified to aid them in the execution of their murderous purpose.

Babe Matthews, a colored girl, about eighteen or nineteen years old, was a sister-in-law of John Gair, and was at that time, October, 1875, living in the family of one Dr. Saunders, in the said parish of East Feliciana.

On a certain day, this Dr. Saunders pretended that he had been poisoned and that Babe Matthews had committed the deed.

On this false and malicious statement of Dr. Saunders the poor colored girl was immediately taken into custody by some of the friends of Saunders, and, if rumor is true—and I have no doubt of it myself—submitted to a system of torture which at last compelled her—to save her own life—to sign a confession which the counsel for Saunders had prepared.

This pretended confession was to the effect that she had some time before been to Baton Rouge, where John Gair then lived, and while there one John George had given her some poison, and told her to poison Dr. Saunders, as he "and Gair had fixed it all up." That after she had returned from Baton Rouge to Saunders's house she put the arsenic in the water-dipper, and put the dipper in the water-pail, and Saunders swore that he drank out of it and was poisoned.

It will be noticed that no pretense is made, in this pretended confession or anywhere else, that the girl ever stated that Gair had spoken to her about the poisoning of Dr. Saunders, but only that George had told her when he gave her the poison that he "and Gair had fixed it up."

Now, upon this statement, forced from that poor, timid, ignorant colored girl, under the most inhuman and cruel tortures, without one scintilla of evidence to connect John Gair with the transaction, Deputy Sheriff Woodward, with a posse of six or seven men, is started for Baton Rouge to arrest Gair and bring him to Clinton. Woodward and his posse go to Baton Rouge, arrest Gair, a telegram announces the time when they leave with their victim for Clinton, Dr. Saunders gives the word, and in a twinkling from seventy-five to one hundred armed and mounted desperadoes come together and proceed toward Baton Rouge to meet the sheriff and execute the orders of the league.

At a proper time and in a proper place they meet the sheriff and his posse, go through the farce of disarming them, and then take possession of their victim, while the miserable treachery and collusion of the sheriff are disclosed by two of the murderers, who ride up to him saying that they "report to him." They have now in their possession the man who has so bravely borne the standard they hate and marshaled the clans they despise, and with curses and execrations they bind him to a tree, and with hellish glee riddle him with bullets, while he attests his innocence and calls upon God to have mercy upon his soul and protect his wife and little ones at home.

They have killed Gair, but democracy cannot breathe free until the last vestige of evidence against his murderers is blotted out, and the blood of Babe Matthews cries to-day from the ground against Joseph A. Norwood and his blood-thirsty crew.

Now, in order to justify all this crime and wickedness, which they are compelled to admit, and avoid the conclusion that it was done for political purposes, Dr. Saunders comes before the committee and swears he was poisoned, and Dr. Langworthy swears that he subjected some of the water that Mrs. Saunders gave him to a chemical test and discovered the presence of arsenic.

But on cross-examination it was shown that Dr. Langworthy was totally ignorant of every principle of chemistry under which he pretended to have made the test, and that he did not know where the water came from upon which he had tried his experiments.

Mrs. Saunders could have informed the committee where the water came from which she gave to Dr. Langworthy, but for some reason unknown to me she was not called as a witness.

In addition to this, the evidence shows that Dr. Saunders uses intoxicating liquors to excess, and has for the past ten or fifteen years, and would be very likely to have just such burning sensations in the stomach as he has described.

I only desire to add that in my opinion the attempt to prove that Saunders was poisoned was a miserable failure, and leaves the impression a thousand times stronger upon the mind than before that John Gair was foully murdered, not because he was suspected of advising the poisoning of Dr. Saunders, but because he was a hinderance and vital obstruction to democratic supremacy in those parishes.

It was well known to the colored people, not only of those three parishes but of the whole State, that John Gair had been murdered by the democrats, and that it was because he was a republican, and for no other reason.

The effect of it upon their minds was electric and tremendous.

It was the handwriting upon the wall, comprehended and understood by them as an admonition and warning to all other colored republicans that they must submit to the dictates of democracy or share his fate.

That act, alone, of democratic violence, designed by one party and understood by the other, as it was, to frighten and intimidate the colored people in the State, would have been sufficient of itself, without the scores of others which they afterward committed, to alarm and frighten all the colored voters, so that, when the campaign commenced in the spring of 1876, a single word or a nod from any white democrat would have been sufficient to excite the most intense alarm and drive them all into the democratic clubs, where protection was guaranteed.

In order to support and fortify this false and groundless theory that Gair was in some manner responsible for the attempt to poison Saunders and that when arrested he showed guilt, one of Woodward's posse swears that when he attempted to arrest him he ran to the river, got into a boat, and pulled off from the shore, and that he brought him to by firing at him from the bank.

This witness is not corroborated by any one, as none of the other six or seven men who were with him swears to anything of the kind, while one of them testifies that when they met Gair upon the street and were about to arrest him he drew two pistols and then ran away.

The whole transaction, as detailed by these two witnesses, is unreasonable and inconsistent, in perfect keeping with the whole democratic theory in regard to all the murders and assassinations in said parishes, and is only another demonstration of the fraud and deception to which many of the white people in that State are ready and willing to resort in order to gain power and elect Tilden to the Presidency.

In the early part of the investigation it was boldly insinuated that Gair was killed by colored republicans who had become opposed to him in consequence of a split in the party, but the facts afterward elicited, and the names of some of the men who killed him, forced from the unwilling lips of Norwood, the chairman of the parish democratic central committee and leader of the gang, set that theory at rest; and his murderers hid themselves under the confession that they could disclose no more without criminating themselves.

The killing of Gilbert Carter was a cold-blooded, wicked murder, attended with circumstances of malice and cruelty which scarcely find a parallel in the history of crime.

The men who committed it were known, and although the spirit of lawlessness and savage butchery then held high carnival in Louisiana, and colored men were slaughtered by hundreds without provocation or mercy, and the judgment of a just God for a time withheld, yet the murderers thought the time might come when force and violence would give way to law and order, when truth and righteousness and justice should set up their standard, and murder become a crime to be prosecuted and punished, then the innocent blood of their victim might be required at their hands.

Then a denial would not save them, for those who saw them take him from his humble cabin in the dead of the night and strike him down with a bludgeon near his own door, who heard his wife as upon her knees in the very agony of her grief she implored them to save her husband, who had seen the assassin and knew him when he put the murderous pistol to the head of his victim as he lay writhing upon the ground and shot him dead, who heard their savage yells and hellish imprecations as they disappeared in the darkness of the night, were living and beyond the power of their persecutions. Prudence and safety, therefore, required that some excuse or justification should be given for the commission of such an unnatural crime.

These men knew that Gilbert Carter had been an active, earnest republican; that he had been trying for weeks to organize a republican club in his ward among the colored voters; that he and his colored neighbors had already had one meeting and were soon to have another, when the organization was to be completed.

These white democrats knew that they had complete control of every colored man in the parish, and that the whole democratic party was in hearty sympathy with them. And they knew also that no colored man would dare disobey their orders or refuse to perform whatever they might command.

Such men, Mr. Speaker, are equal to any emergency and their resources are unbounded. In less than twelve hours after Gilbert Carter had been murdered they had one of his colored neighbors before a pliant democratic magistrate and compelled him to make oath that the meeting of Carter and his friends was not to organize a republican club but to concoct a scheme to kill Barrows and his whole family.

And this miserable subterfuge of deception and subornation of perjury is now attempted to be palmed off before a committee of this House, and through that committee upon the country, as evidence that Carter was not killed for his political opinions.

Shame, Mr. Speaker, upon the men who propose it, and shame upon the party which is compelled to resort to it.

The testimony of a large number of colored men has been taken which tends to show that they joined the democratic clubs and voted the democratic ticket of their own free will, and it is quite possible that some few of them may have done so; but the great mass of them, as will be seen from their testimony, by their confessions and admissions upon the stand when subjected to a rigid cross-examination, and the fact that there has been no republican clubs, and only two or three republican meetings in the three parishes during the late canvass, when it is shown that in previous campaigns there have been clubs and scores of meetings in every ward, together with the fact that in 1874 the republican vote in West Feliciana was 1,358, and in 1876 only 780; that in East Feliciana it was 1,688 in 1874, and in 1876 only 1; and in East Baton Rouge it was 2,546 in 1874, and only 1,051 in 1876, is sufficient to convince an unprejudiced mind; and when no other cause is or can be assigned for the change, it becomes absolutely impossible to account for it upon any other hypothesis than that of intimidation and compulsion.

The excuse which has been put in the mouths of some of these colored men by their tormentors is so painfully similar, giving the same reasons and in almost the same language, as to raise in the mind a clear and thorough conviction, not only of its falsity, but also that they have learned the lessons they recited upon the stand from the lips of those whom their evidence is designed to benefit.

The attempt to explain why every prominent republican in those three parishes is now in exile, and dare not return to his home, is a complete and utter failure, and is the very strongest kind of corroborative evidence of the illegal and outrageous manner in which those colored men have been forced to vote the democratic ticket.

The theory, which was sought to be set up, that the White League or organization of regulators was formed and kept up for the suppression of theft and lawlessness, and that it never had any political significance, is abundantly refuted by the fact, which the evidence discloses, that on the day of election colored men who voted the democratic ticket were furnished with passports or certificates of safe-conduct, to be shown or used by them as a protection against the White League, regulators, or any other armed democratic organization, which might chance to be prowling about the country.

These armed bands of reckless and wicked men not only shot down, hung, and whipped defenseless colored men and women without cause or provocation, but they entered the court-houses when the courts were in session, drove the judges from the bench, shot the sheriff, compelled the police-jurors to resign, and broke up the courts, giving as a pretended reason that it was because the judge had charged a petit-jury in a manner not agreeable to the mob, but really because the judges and officers of the court were all republicans.

In this connection it is worthy of remark that in none of these cases have the perpetrators been brought to justice, although in nearly every instance it has been well known to the authorities and the people generally who they were. Now, it is no answer to this to say that the courts have been in the hands of the republican party, when the testimony shows that whenever there has been an attempt made to hold a term of court in these parishes the courts have been broken up and the judges driven off by bodies of armed democrats.

The state of the public mind among the white democracy in those three parishes upon political matters and the safety with which republicans could have advocated their principles and exercised the elective franchise is well illustrated by the answer given by a white democratic witness, called by the majority of the subcommittee, to a question put by the chairman, in which he said that it would be safe enough for a republican to come there to live "if he behaved himself;" and when inquired of what he meant by that, he replied that a republican would be safe to come there to live if he let politics alone, and did not attempt to stir up the negroes by taking politics to them.

The honest, candid men in this country will, when they read this testimony, be led to inquire whether the mission of this committee to Louisiana was to find out whether the vote of that State had been materially changed by the intimidation of colored voters by white democrats, or whether it was to avoid the truth, disguise the facts, justify the acts, and bolster up and give strength to the democratic theory of peace and good will to all men. If they had desired the truth they would not have cared from what source it came; if they had wanted the testimony of truthful witnesses they would as soon have taken it in New Orleans as in Clinton or Monroe; if they had been honestly in search of justice they would have sought every avenue by which it could be obtained.

Now, the majority of the committee must have been aware, when they arrived in New Orleans from Washington, that most of the witnesses which the republican members of the committee would desire to call—and who were cognizant of all the facts—were then in exile in that city from their homes in the parishes, and that their testimony could not be obtained unless it was taken there.

It must also have been well known to the majority of the committee that those republicans, both white and colored, who remained at their homes would not dare to come before the committee in said parishes and testify, for fear of violence and bodily harm from white democrats who would be present and hear them testify; and they must also have known that the colored men who had been forced to join democratic clubs and vote the democratic ticket would not dare to testify in the presence of these men that they had done so through fear or in consequence of any intimidation.

Armed and guided by this knowledge and information, and in pursuance, as I have reason to believe, of a preconcerted plan, the first step was to divide the committee into subcommittees, so that the testimony should be taken in the several parishes, where the witnesses would be confronted and surrounded by the men who had intimidated and subdued them.

This arbitrary and, as I deem it, unjust act was accomplished by the majority of the committee against the earnest protest and votes of the republican members.

By this decision of the majority of the committee, had it not been for the Senate committee, we should have been deprived of the testimony of many of the men who had personal knowledge of the acts of violence and murder committed by white democrats during the late political canvass or who had been the victims of political malice and intimidation.

It was the business of this committee to ascertain and report all the facts in regard to the late election in Louisiana, and the persons who knew would seem to be the legitimate source of information; this the majority has, to a certain extent, cut off, and the people will demand of them some good reason for such an arbitrary and unjust exercise of their powers.

I have not had the time, Mr. Speaker, to sort out and classify the testimony so as to give the names of the witnesses whose evidence applies to each specific poll excluded from the count by the returning board. Neither should I deem it necessary or important to do so, if I had the time; because I am fully convinced that any man who will take the trouble to read this testimony, as I have done, will come irresistibly to the same conclusion that I have, that the returning board had evidence enough before it to justify the exclusion of every democratic vote in all the disputed or bull-dozed parishes.

Mr. Speaker, I went to Louisiana determined if possible to satisfy my own mind in regard to the truth of the reports I had heard of the condition of society in that State, and the intimidation of the colored people, and I not only gave close attention to the investigation which was conducted by the committee, but wherever I went I sought out both white and colored republicans and urged them to come before the subcommittee and assist in conducting the examination of the witnesses, as the democratic party was always represented by men who prepared witnesses and suggested questions; but was informed by them, in every instance, either personally or in writing, that they dare not do it, or even come to my lodgings to see me, for if they should their lives would be in danger as soon as the committee had gone.

I have also taken great pains to talk with colored men whom I have accidentally met in all of said parishes in regard to their coming before the subcommittee to testify, and every one of them, without a single exception, with whom I have conversed upon the subject, has told me that if he should go upon the stand and testify to all the acts of violence and intimidation which he knew, or had good reason to believe had been practiced upon his people, his life would pay the forfeit. They have invariably told me that they did not want to be summoned before the committee, but if they were they would not dare to testify.

Such, sir, is the evidence, and upon that evidence I have come to the conclusions I have stated.

With such convictions fastened upon my mind, I have no hesitation in saying that in my judgment, notwithstanding all that may be said with regard to the action of the returning board, Hayes and Wheeler fairly and honestly carried the State, and that her electoral vote should be counted for them.

The people of Louisiana are continually complaining of their hard lot and destitute condition, and comparing their present poverty and distress with the comfort and affluence they enjoyed before the war. It is true that in former days they lived by the unpaid labor of the bondsmen and fattened upon the sweat and the tears of those whose wrongs cried to Heaven for vengeance for a century.

In the onward march of justice and Christian civilization this has all been swept away. In the red flame of war the chains were broken from every limb and the shackles removed from every soul. Upon the ruins of a slave oligarchy more cruel, audacious, and unrelenting than the world had ever before seen has been set up the standard of universal freedom and the political equality of all men before the law.

Before the war the people of Louisiana robbed men of their thoughts, their liberty, and their labor. Now they are compelled, in common with the people of the North, to earn the bread they eat by the sweat of their brow.

These facts they have been slow to acknowledge, and in no one of the States lately in rebellion has there been shown a more reckless determination not to accept the situation than in the State of Louisiana.

One of the striking and alarming features of society in that State—and no one can fail to remark it who goes there—is the fact that very little manual labor of any kind is performed by white men. It is considered by these people degrading and dishonorable to work, and no white man or woman would be admitted into what is termed good society whose hands were stained with toil.

These false and destructive theories must be abandoned if they desire prosperity and contentment. Let the people of that highly favored Commonwealth learn a lesson from some of their less favored fellow-countrymen. Let them go to my own honored little State and experience her cold, bleak climate and see her rocky, sterile soil. Let them see her intelligent, industrious, prosperous, and independent people, among whom poverty is not allowed to exist and pauperism is almost unknown; when the callus made by the plow-handle, the flail-staff, the ax-helve, and tools in the workshop and quarry, is regarded as more honorable than scars received in street broils or upon the field of honor, falsely so called.

What the people of Louisiana need now to make them prosperous and happy is to abandon and ignore the trade of politics and office-seeking and learn to be industrious; instead of allowing a certain portion of their people to hang about the street-corners and villages, armed with pistols and shot-guns, talking politics and intimidating the ignorant and weak, both white and colored, they should induce them to bend their energies to labor, to re-organizing society, to reviving the industries of the people, building up her commerce, restoring her waste-places, and developing the vast and valuable resources of that great State. They should teach them to obey the laws and all of them to respect the rights of others, educate the masses of the people, offer no more premiums on idleness and crime, accept those great principles settled by the issues of the war, and Louisiana will soon take her proud and rightful position in the front rank among our glorious sisterhood of States.

In justice to one class of white people in Louisiana, I am frank to say that to all appearances they are intelligent, high-minded, and worthy men, and that I cannot and do not believe that they would be guilty, personally, of such crimes and acts of violence as are conceded to have been committed in that State during the past ten years.

But, sir, how are these men to avoid the awful responsibility which follows, even if they did not in fact hold the knife and the pistol, when they stand quietly by while others commit them, without raising voice or hand against it, and complacently and gracefully share in the spoils and profit by the results?

These men have lived in Louisiana during these terrible and bloody years; the men who have covered the land with desolation and death are their neighbors and kinsmen. They cannot plead ignorance or imbecility; the knowledge of every murder and act of violence has been brought home to their very doors. They have known that the object of it all has been to disfranchise the colored people and restore the democratic party to power.

The colored people of the South to-day represent thirty-five electoral votes. These the democratic party propose to steal by denying them the right of free suffrage as guaranteed to them by the Constitution.

All this is laid at their door and charged to their account, and the American people demand by the same voice which will place Rutherford B. Hayes in the presidential chair that they cease their cry of republican fraud, corruption, and military despotism, and turn their attention to the cleansing and purifying of their own party, to stopping the murder of innocent men for opinion sake, and restoring order, justice, and law among their own people. They must take the power into their own hands; suppress and punish the marauding bands and armed banditti which infest the State; set up the standard of law and order, and restore the lawful authority of the government; and then, and not until then, will they have or deserve to have the sympathy and assistance of the loyal and patriotic people of this country.

It is said, and I think with perfect truthfulness, that the people of Louisiana have suffered, some portion of the time since the war, in consequence of the local government being in the hands of ignorant and bad men; that the execution of the laws and the administration of the government have been intrusted to a class of adventurers who have had no interests in common with the people, and who were there only for office and gain; and that they have endured this until patience has long since ceased to be a virtue.

Now, sir, granting this to be true, if we look back a few years in the history of that people we shall find that all the wrongs they have suffered, and all the ills they have endured, have been the natural results of their own acts and the legitimate fruits of their own transgressions.

When, in the providence of God, slavery was abolished from this whole land, and universal liberty and freedom were established by the fiat of Jehovah through the instrumentality of His people; when a wicked and causeless rebellion had been crushed out and universal amnesty and suffrage proclaimed, the republican party, moved by a spirit of forgiveness and patriotism, sought to bind up the wounds and restore the integrity of the Union by bringing back those who had ungratefully wandered, and restoring them to honor and power.

The people of Louisiana were among the first to spurn the offer; they refused to accept the situation; they drove the colored man from them with contempt, and refused to acknowledge the right with which God and the people of the North had endowed him; and when the General Government interfered to protect him, they, in sullen madness, fell back upon their dignity and refused to take any part in the administration of the Government even so much as to vote.

The result was that, in consequence of this mistaken and disloyal policy on the part of the white people, the power and control of their parochial affairs passed into the hands of unworthy men who, in many cases, robbed the people and disgraced the positions they held.

We are also told that the republican party in Louisiana is made up of bad men, and that those who receive the government patronage are not only disreputable but dishonest and vile. While I know, and am proud to bear witness, that the great majority of the republicans in that State are noble, honest, and patriotic men, yet I am free to admit that there are many exceptions, and the only wonder with me is that there are not more, as the course of violence and intimidation toward republicans pursued by the democracy for the past eight or nine years has been directly calculated to breed a spirit of animosity and ill-temper, and lead them to acts of retaliation and revenge.

In addition to this there has grown up all over the South since the war a generation of young men, of dissipated habits and reckless conduct, who have imbibed all the bitterness and prejudices entertained by the southern people against their northern neighbors, without any respect for northern courage and magnanimity which the men who met them upon the field so nobly accord. Against this class of wild and vicious men the republicans of Louisiana have had to defend themselves with such weapons as came within their reach. Again, instead of encouraging northern labor and capital and enterprise they have spurned them all, ostracized or driven out every man who would not subscribe to the articles of the democratic faith, and murdered colored republicans by thousands; and now, having brought all these evils upon the people, and made their name and history a reproach, they seek to avoid the responsibility by charging it all to the frauds and crimes and military despotism of the republican party.

The charge is not only unkind, but it is untrue. The republican party is not responsible for the past evils endured by or for the present unfortunate and unhappy condition of the people of Louisiana. Sir, every law of Congress, every act of the State Legislature of which they complain, and every United States soldier sent there has been absolutely necessary to protect the lives and property of inoffensive and law-abiding citizens against the lawless and violent conduct of the democracy of that State.

Mr. Speaker, we have been often told during the last four years that the mission of the republican party is ended and that its days of usefulness are passed.

Sir, as well might we be told that the mission of the Saviour of mankind has been accomplished before the last wandering sinner is brought in and there is but one fold and one shepherd.

No, sir, the mission of the republican party is not ended and it cannot and will not be until every man, be he bond or free, rich or poor, white or black, can go to the ballot-box and deposit the ballot of his choice without fear or intimidation as well in Mississippi and Louisiana as he can in Massachusetts and Vermont.

When that glad day shall come, and that noble work shall be accomplished, then, and not till then, may we be told that the republican party has outlived the days of its usefulness, or that its great and patriotic mission has been fulfilled.

In the face of this public record, and under the blazing light of the history of Louisiana for the past ten years to which I have so briefly referred, the opposition have the brazen effrontry to tell us that Tilden carried the State and that the electoral vote ought to be counted for him.

I am one of those, Mr. Speaker, who in common with thousands of other republicans solemnly believe that Hayes and Wheeler were legally and fairly elected on the 7th of November, and I have from the beginning down to this moment resisted every attempt which has been made by the democracy to frighten the republican party out of that honest conviction.

I know that if there had been no violence or intimidation in the South, no assassinations or massacres, no whippings or murders for opinion's sake, and the colored men had been left free to vote according to their own judgment and the dictates of their own consciences, the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, Georgia, and Louisiana would have each given a handsome majority for our noble ticket.

Believing that, knowing it, I have no concessions to make, nothing to compromise, nothing to arbitrate. I take my stand upon the Constitution and the laws, backed up by the will of a majority of the American people, scorning the idea that it can, under any circumstances, become necessary, in order to maintain that position, that I must temporize, arbitrate, or compromise with the enemies of my country.

When I am told by blustering braggarts that I must surrender my honest convictions, stultify every word and act of my whole life, stifle every patriotic emotion, see the Constitution violated and liberty dethoned, abandon every right held dear and sacred by a free people, violate the solemn oath I have taken as a member of this House, and give up what I know to be mine, or submit to the evils and horrors of a civil war, I cannot hesitate, I ask for no time to consider.

Much as I should deplore such an awful calamity, much as I would do and suffer to avert it, still amid the storms and the tempests I will stand firmly by the Constitution, that great ark of our safety, fearing no evil and trusting in the judgment, intelligence, and patriotism of the American people for a safe deliverance from all our troubles.

Mr. Speaker, the republican party had a right to suppose that the great issue of universal suffrage, that principle which underlies the very foundation-stone upon which rests the stately structure of our Government; that great idea which had been discussed and combated in the world's forum for centuries; that had cost rivers of blood and treasures untold; the contest over which in our own country had carried the weeds of mourning into every loyal household and left a vacant chair at every fireside; that had at last been taken from the forum of discussion and submitted to the dread arbitrament of war; that had finally reached its last ditch at Appomattox and surrendered its vanquished sword on the 9th of April, 1865—I say, Mr. Speaker, we had a right to suppose after all this that all opposition to this principle had been buried beyond the call of any party and beyond the reach of any political resurrection.

But, sir, this investigation shows that it is not settled, that the venomous reptile was only scotched, but not destroyed, and that the loyal men of this country must again prepare for the contest. This question must be settled; the republican party of this country has abolished slavery, emancipated the slave, and clothed him with the sacred rights of citizenship. That party is solemnly pledged to sustain and protect him, and its most solemn obligations and promises will be broken unless it does so. I believe it is the settled and determined purpose of the party to do it peaceably at the ballot-box if it can, but at all hazards to do it. The American people fully realize the issue: a free, honest ballot will give us peace and the perpetuity of our republican Government; a forced or fraudulent vote or a corrupt ballot-box will bring us misery, anarchy, and ruin. The right of suffrage and the freedom of the elective franchise must be preserved and protected in every State in this Union, to every citizen; and no labor is too severe and no sacrifice too great which shall be necessary to preserve and defend this rich and glorious heritage.

To that, Mr. Speaker, let us "pledge our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

Coinage Department in the Assay Office in New York—Its utility on grounds of national economy.

SPEECH OF HON. ELIJAH WARD,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 1, 1877,

On the bill (H. R. No. 4472) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, having in the preceding session of Congress introduced a bill providing for coinage in New York, and as the committee to whom it was referred have omitted to report thereon, and the bill now under consideration is the one through which appropriations for coinage are made, I deem the present opportunity suitable for calling the attention of the House to a subject of much importance, not only to the city and State I have in part the honor of representing, but also to the country at large.

The signs of the times unequivocally demonstrate that inflation can no longer inflate, and that by a natural reaction a most favorable time for returning to specie payments is near at hand. Gold has lately been at a premium of less than 5 per cent. Our exportations of it are large; our mines are producing vast quantities of the precious metals; and currency is yet abundant at low rates of interest, although during the year ended on the 1st day of November, 1876, there had been a decrease of nearly $25,000,000 in the amount of national-bank notes. Since the act of June 20, 1874, came into operation, the outstanding amount of these notes has been reduced $32,300,000. Between January 14, 1875, and January 1, 1877, the reduction in the amount of legal-tender notes was $15,900,000, and the amount of legal-tender notes lately deposited in the Treasury to provide for further withdrawals of bank-notes was $18,900,000. The three items indicate a contraction amounting to $67,100,000 in the circulation of the two classes of notes between June 20, 1874, and January 1, 1877. This is about 9 per cent. of the whole paper currency. The natural laws of finance are asserting their power. Arbitrary and doubtful measures for the restoration of a sound currency redeemable in the metallic standard of the world are no longer necessary. It seems impossible that those to whom the legislation of our country in monetary as well as in other affairs is intrusted should not patriotically take advantage of so golden an opportunity to confer incalculable benefits upon the people. My purpose at present is simply to urge the adoption of one of the most important means of aiding in the restoration of specie payments by removing unnecessary, expensive, and unjust obstacles to their essential precursor, coinage of the precious metals into the coin of our own country.

While I am desirous of applying the principles of justice and good will in the fullest measure to all other parts of our country, I deem it my duty to state what is strictly due as regards coinage to the city I have in part the honor of representing. In one year alone there was sent from the assay office in New York to Philadelphia for coinage no less than $62,480,508 in gold and $2,663,046 in silver. That certainly was an exceptional year, but during the twenty-one years which have elapsed between the time when the assay office in New York was organized and December, 1875, the amount of bullion thus transmitted was no less than $172,221,463, at a cost of $182,281, a waste of money and labor as complete as any ever typified in modern proverbs or ancient mythology. As we seem to approach nearer to specie payments the amount of the bullion thus transmitted increases. In the three years ended with 1875 it was two and a half times as large as in the three preceding years. In these calculations the amount of the silver purchased for coinage under the provisions of the law of 1873 and subsequent acts now in operation is not included. Its amount, passing from and through New York to the Mint at Philadelphia during the last two years, may be computed at millions. During the two years and a half ended on the 30th of last December, the amount of gold and silver bullion transmitted from the assay office in New York to the Mint at Philadelphia was no less than $22,487,803, and the charges of the transmission were $22,680.05. The amount thus transmitted is no fair criterion of that which would have been coined in New York if the needed facilities for that purpose had existed there and the loss of time as well as the cost of transportation had been avoided. The means thus wasted undoubtedly would have been much larger if for the last sixteen years the ordinary and natural demand for specie had not been checked by legislation. Yet under these circumstances the direct and needless expense thus actually incurred for transportation of bullion since the establishment of the assay office was over $200,000. I do not believe there has ever existed under our Government any more flagrant instance of the power of habit and established patronage in resisting the most just and needful conformity to the requirements of the times.

For at least thirty or forty years the justice and expediency of converting bullion and the gold and silver currency of other countries into our national coin at New York have been urged by leading statesmen, irrespective of party or the locality of their residences. Hon. Robert J. Walker, in four successive annual reports, with arguments which it is impossible to controvert, earnestly directed public attention to the subject, and the same recommendations were made by Hon. Thomas Corwin, Hon. W. H. Seward, and many others. The right was not sought for New York or for the benefit of its commerce only, but for the benefit of the whole Union. No unjust or exclusive advantage was asked for that city, but simply that the great center of our foreign and home trade should have equal facilities with other cities of less commercial importance for coinage and recoinage.

Apart from the commercial emporium where the precious metals are first brought from the places of their production on the other side of the continent, it is evident that where the chief market of commerce is there also the precious metals will center, and it is no less clear that in the same place there should be every opportunity for increasing their value and bringing them into active use. While this is true at all times it is especially so at present, when the people are desirous of a safe and economical return to a currency at par with the commercial standard of the world.

It may be argued that the impediments to coinage by compelling the citizens of the center of the exchanges of the Union to carry their specie to and fro, for hundreds of miles, are to some extent removed by modern facilities for rapid transit; but, whatever the cost thus incurred for freightage may be, it is to that extent a tax primarily upon New York, but ultimately upon the nation, and an obstacle to its foreign and domestic trade. In our commercial system bullion and coin, the representatives of value and current circulation among all nations, pass and repass to and from New York as the blood in the human system tends toward the heart and is then distributed again.

The risk, expense, and delay of sending the precious metals from their natural emporium to be coined elsewhere, must, so long as they are continued, be hinderances to the production of the coins of the United States and tend to keep the precious metals out of common use. Millions of dollars are thus as utterly lost to the industry and business of the country as if they were thrown into the sea. Coinage of a metallic currency is prohibited at the place where the Government collects its chief revenue in coin. Needless and artificial obstacles created by law are kept in the way of an abundant supply of the stable currency most needed for a return of general prosperity. As gold and silver are articles of commerce, they naturally gravitate from all quarters to the commercial center of our country. They are brought there not only from our own mines, but from Mexico, Peru, Chili, Central America, Europe, and all other regions of the world, as part of the exchanges. A large amount of them is also brought, chiefly in the coins of other countries, which it is desirable to convert into our own, by hundreds of thousands of immigrants.

The imports and exports of New York in 1874, if compared with those of all other ports of the United States added together, were almost exactly in the proportion of seven to five, the precise value of them at New York having been $750,127,354 and at all other ports in the aggregate $573,977,352. This was no exception to the rule. In 1875 the proportion of these imports and exports received or shipped at New York was somewhat larger. At that port alone they amounted to $713,341,549, while they at all other ports in this country were of the value of $506,092,995.

The difference in the value of foreign imports alone is yet more striking; and, as the Government depends on them for that part of the revenue which is collected in coin, the comparison is especially important and suggestive. In 1874 the imports at New York were almost twice as large as the aggregate of them at all other ports in the Union. In New York they were $395,133,622, and in all other ports of the United States $200,727,626. In 1875 the proportions were nearly the same, having been $368,637,580 at New York and $185,268,573 at all the other ports added together.

The laws of the United States require that the duties on imports must be paid in coin. A far larger proportion of these duties is collected at New York than at any other port and than at all other ports added together. For the ten years ended with 1875 the amount of duties thus collected at New York has been more than twice as large as those at all other ports of the Union; the aggregate at all the ports, including New York, added together, having been $1,800,650,297, while it was $1,239,615,311 at New York alone. As this city is also the chief depot and market on the Atlantic coast for the precious metals, it is most manifestly inexpedient and unjust, on grounds of obvious principles of public policy and right, to refuse to her the power of coinage.

As New York is the commercial so also is it the monetary center of the Union. The capital employed in banking in the State is more than twice as large as that of any other State except Massachusetts. The average exchanges of the clearing-house in the city every day on the average of the last twenty-two years were over sixty-one millions, and for the last ten years were nearly ninety-four millions.

These enormous commercial and monetary transactions do not redound to the benefit of the city of New York alone. They only exhibit in a conspicuous form the business the people of the whole country find it for their interest to transact at that port on more profitable terms than elsewhere, and would have removed long ago if they had not continually found this to be true. The whole is a question of superior natural advantages, together with the skill, enterprise, and industry which have been used in developing them for the common advantage of the people of the Union. Hence it follows that if New York is refused equal facilities with other cities for coinage and recoinage, the unjust disadvantages under which it is compelled to labor are inflicted not upon it alone, but upon all parts of the Union with which it has commercial dealings.

On the 10th of October, 1854, an assay office was established in New York. From that time to June 30, 1876, gold and silver to the value of no less than $343,533,911 had been deposited there. Of this amount $253,757,757 were prepared as bars of fine gold and silver by the melter and refiner. Leaving out of consideration the three mints at San Francisco, Carson, and Denver, which are to be judged by a different standard, as they depend on the production of the precious metals in the mountains between the great plains of the continent and the Pacific Ocean, nearly all the bars manufactured at the mints and assay offices of the United States in 1875–'76 were manufactured in New York. In 1875, at Philadelphia, they amounted to $318,786.66, in Charlotte to $6,690.03, and in Boisé to $7,779.48—altogether $443,256.17, or considerably less than a twentieth part of their amount at the New York assay office, where it was nearly ten millions, ($9,925,727.28.) In 1876 the disparity was yet more striking; the total value of the bars of gold and silver made and issued at the mint of Philadelphia and the assay offices of New York and Boise having been $8,791,591, of which not far from nine millions ($8,602,991) were made and issued at New York, and less than two hundred thousand ($188,599) at Philadelphia and Boisé added together. More decisive proofs of the natural tendencies to bring the precious metals to New York, rather than to any other city east of the great plains, can scarcely be imagined. Doubtless the proportion of gold and silver brought to New York would be vastly increased if facilities existed there for their coinage. If any manufacturing firm sent its goods hundreds of miles for the sole purpose of receiving a stamp or label which might as well be conferred at home, it would be a fair way to ruin; and the only reasons why the pernicious system is permitted so long to exist are the force of habit, the difficulty of reform, and the fact that the loss is borne by many and in the end is paid out of the pockets of the people at large.

This shameful maladministration of public affairs becomes yet more apparent when it is known that the desired change might, so far as the buildings are concerned, be made with little cost or none at all to the national Treasury. The Director of the Mint and the Supervising Architect, after conferring together, unite in the opinion that there is a necessity for the speedy erection of a more suitable building for the purposes of the assay office in New York. They concur in saying that a less central location than the one now occupied would be equally adapted for the proper transaction of the work which is carried on in refining the precious metals, and that the injury to surrounding property through the action of the acid fumes resulting from the processes employed is so detrimental that it should have weight with the Government in its selection of a proper site for these works. The iron-work of the building is so far injured and weakened that, although efforts have been made to render it as secure as possible, it is yet in a dangerous condition.

The Director of the Mint and the Supervising Architect state positively that a new building, located in a less central position, should be commenced at once, so constructed as to be proof against burglars and fire, and that the part of the building particularly devoted to the reduction should be built of such materials as will suffer no deterioration from the processes employed. They add that on the completion of the new edifice the old building and site will realize by sale a sum more than sufficient to defray the expenses of the purchase of the new site and erecting thereon a suitable structure.

In these statements I emphatically concur, and from my own local information and knowledge I have no doubt that the surplus to which they refer would be amply sufficient not only to erect and complete an assay office of durable materials and sufficiently capacious, as the present building is not, for the processes to be conducted in it, but also to provide the room and outfit necessary for coinage. Thus, without charge to the national Treasury, arrangements might be made for giving the people of the country ample facilities for coinage at that port where they would be incomparably more conducive to the national welfare than they can be at any other place on this side of the continent. The change is imperatively demanded on grounds of economy.

South Carolina.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN F. PHILIPS,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 21, 1877,

On the report of the select committee to investigate the recent election in the State of South Carolina.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, in returning to this House the commission which sent me to South Carolina, I wish to accompany it with some observations and reflections which I trust will not be without interest to the many people deeply concerned in the troubles of that State. The power of attorney under which the committee went to South Carolina limited its agency mainly to an investigation of the vote cast for presidential electors. But necessarily such work, to be thoroughly done, took within its range a wide field of inquiry, developing collateral facts and circumstances all concurring to illustrate and explain the true and lawful results of the election.

To comprehend a political contest and its results in South Carolina, one must go and look at it. The newspaper correspondent of this day is pre-eminently the product of American genius and enterprise. His faculty for pertinent and impertinent inquiry; his capacity for acquiring and manufacturing information under circumstances of discouragement to a modest man, or to one of little heart and less cheek, make him the marvel of the age. To his indomitable pluck and perseverance the country is indebted for many pen pictures, true and untrue, of the political, social, and industrial conditions of South Carolina. But to know and realize what these conditions actually are, you must see them with the eye. No pen can portray them, much less can I hope to paint them with any poor words of mine. This fact was ineffaceably impressed upon my mind in my first day's experience in the State.

The committee decided to visit informally the capitol at Columbia and look in upon its renowned Legislature. There was no sun in the heavens and none in the faces of the people. The dark and dismal day seemed but a prototype of the sorrow and misery brooding on every face. Two of my associates, with myself, determined to go in advance of the rest of the committee, unheralded and unknown. The sight that caught my eye at the very threshold of the building was not novel. I had seen its counterpart in the late war where court-houses were occupied with military recruits. It presented the aspect of guns stacked, bayonets bristling, sentries pacing to and fro, cooking utensils in disorder, rude bunks, and a rare combination of smells, mingling the odors of unsavory linen, unventilated rooms, and jail fevers, compared to which Sir John Falstaff's buck-basket was a bed of roses in young spring-time.

The stairway to the upper floor, the hall and passway to the house of representatives presented a strange scene. They were thronged with negro women and men, intermingling and jabbering in a dialect sui generis, with huckster stands in every corner laden principally with peanuts and the provincial gingercake. The hulls of the peanuts and the crumbs of the gingercakes lay in profusion over the floor, mingled with tobacco-juice, cigar-stumps, and negro babies, which no broom, scrubbing-committee, or wet-nurse had seemingly interrupted for a fortnight. The door to the hall of representatives was guarded by double files of colored police, called the constabulary force, selected from the notorious "hunkidori clubs," made up principally from recent inmates of the penitentiary. A beggarly crew were they, calling vividly to my mind Falstaff's exclamation over the soldiers he was to march through Coventry:

A commodity of warm slaves as had as lief hear the devil as a drum; such as fear the report of a caliver worse than a struck fowl. * * * Ancients, corporals, lieutenants, gentlemen of companies, slaves as ragged as Lazarus in the painted cloth, where the glutton's dogs licked his sores; and such as, indeed, were never soldiers, but discarded, unjust serving-men, younger sons to younger brothers, revolted tapsters and ostlers trade-fallen; the cankers of a calm world and a long peace; * * * tattered prodigals, lately come from swine-keeping, from eating draff and husks. * * * No eye hath seen such scarecrows. * * * There's but a shirt and a half in all my company; and the half shirt is two napkins tacked together and thrown over the shoulders like a herald's coat without sleeves; and the shirt, to say the truth, stolen!

Of such even Falstaff was ashamed, but not Governor Chamberlain. There was neither, however, in that defiance, springing from the insolence of office, to men unused to power, nor in the bludgeon or revolver they so vainly displayed as the baston of authority, from which the citizen of ordinary nerve and sensibility shrunk so unresistingly as from the fumes of miserably bad whisky, exhaled from the breath of these legislative guardians. To me it was as the breath of the monster that checked the conquering march of Regulus. I halted midway between these sentinels of liberty, where I was rudely ordered by the most drunken of this rabble "not to crowd the 'gemmen.'" I looked in vain to see the "gemmen," and my essay at a feeble protest of my right as an American citizen, even if not of African descent, to look in upon the pretending Legislature of a once proud old State, was silenced by this swaggering bully pointing with one hand to the insignia of his high office, emblazoned on the lapel of his coat, while with the other he grasped the revolver. I fell back in order.

After it was ascertained we were from Washington and perhaps might have power to call on the Federal Army, the door was opened and we were permitted to look in upon the sacred temple wherein South Carolina law is made. It was a spectacle no intelligent man would defend unless he fattened and battened on such meat. I cannot better express that Legislature than to say that it was essentially negro. There was visible but one white man in it; that was the speaker, Mackey. The sergeant-at-arms was a negro; the doorkeeper was a negro; pages and attendants were negroes; the lobby was of negroes, and the atmosphere gave unmistakable evidence of the presence of negroes. Among its members were some colored men of unquestioned ability, of a certain order. They displayed a creditable aptness in parliamentary usage and some facility in forensic debate. Its aggregate, however, was assembled ignorance, grotesque and gross; large numbers of them totally illiterate, unable to read or write; some of them mere boys, indicating that the South Carolina negro is a born politician, and her statesmen are indigenous to the cotton-patch and rice-field. In the hall of representatives they loll in listless indolence, with feet on top of the desks that look like scows upturned on the beach for repairs. Numbers of them were smoking so furiously that if a locomotive had rushed under full head of steam through the hall it would not have sent up a much denser volume of smoke.

In these days of "piping peace" and advanced republican ideas, we hear much of Congress guaranteeing to each State a republican form of government. What a theater is South Carolina for the exercise of this high Federal function. That Legislature is a complete autocracy. One man, the speaker, is the Legislature. He seems to devise all measures; puts before the house what he sees fit, and decides this or that measure carried as he prefers it. Its whole legislation is political and partisan. Its aim and work has been and is to maintain in the State the supremacy of those who live and thrive through the constituent elements of such a body. Not one measure of financial relief for a people prostrate with poverty and taxation was devised. Nothing was done to revive her smitten industries or revitalize her once noble prosperity. Nailed to the cross of proscription are her greatest and best men, who when they cry out for relief get only the vinegar of derision and when they ask for bread they receive only a stone. Her eleemosynary institutions were unprovided for. The deaf, the dumb, the blind, the lunatic, God's afflicted and God's poor, were all left to hunger and perish or be let loose, crying and howling, upon a community already in despair. But care was taken to install Chamberlain and his cabinet under guard of Federal bayonets and turn over for two years more the body-politic and industrial interests of the State to be plucked bare by the swarm of insatiate vultures he was to commission for all the county offices in the State.

No higher evidence of the miseries and woes through which that people have passed in the last decade could be furnished than the boast of the republican party that this Legislature is of a higher character than its predecessors and that Chamberlain's administration is a reformation. That the evils of misgovernment have been in a degree mitigated in the State in the last few years is conceded; for the extremes of poverty, bankruptcy, and degradation incident to a long existing policy which drained the people's resources, mocked their enterprises, emasculated their energies, and blighted their hopes, so stung and quickened the public conscience that even such men as Chamberlain called a halt in the career of ruin. But when the people saw last summer that he, for his personal preferment, coalesced with the political mendicants and audacious thieves who had rioted in the misfortunes of the State, they read his purposes and understood the man. They rose in the might and majesty of honest men, determined to strike one more blow for the redemption and regeneration of the State. What man, with heart to feel or country to love, will blame them? It is the true function of conservatism in government to recognize the lessons of the past, to foresee the future and guard against it. The conflict was a fierce as the prize was great. For the first time in eleven years of suffering and forbearance, the democracy hung out its banner and cried:

Once more unto the breach, dear friends, once more.

This was a mortal offense to radicalism. South Carolina had been first in the war of secession; she had brought down upon her head the curses and maledictions of the Unionists; and a policy which should cause her to repent bitterly of her fatal saturnalia, that should humble her pride and leave her perpetually kneeling like a stricken mother amid "the thick graves of her unreturning dead," pleading for peace and mercy, was deemed as retributive justice by a party which seems to have forgotten Christ's Sermon on the Mount. They thought, if there was one spot on southern soil where their footing was sure, it was South Carolina. They thought they owned the State in fee-simple absolute. For the democrats to contend for participation in its governmental affairs was downright treason and the re-appearance of "red-handed" rebellion. This fact manifested itself at the polls in Charleston and Beaufort Counties, where the negroes declared that that was "republican ground" and no democrat should vote there. This declaration they made good in many instances.

The ignorance and credulity of the negroes all over the State were played upon by their unscrupulous white allies to impress them with the conviction that democratic success meant re-enslavement of the race or such restrictions upon their personal liberties as to interfere with their social privileges, their right of locomotion without passports, and to subject their wives and daughters to the intolerable deprivation of their "hoop-skirts." Hence it is that in the recent campaign and election the negro women were present at the hustings and the polls, armed with clubs, staves, and rice-hooks, jeering and raving like fiends incarnate at every colored man suspected of the offense of voting a ticket that was to tear from their brows the diadem of freedom and from their bodies the ornamental "hoop-skirt." The escape of Tam O'Shanter from the at Kirk Alloway was less hazardous than that of a democratic negro who ran the gauntlet of staves, palings, hoe-handles, and rice-hooks of these sable goddesses of liberty.

Hence it is, also, that the evidence discloses the fact that the worst proscription in the State is that of the colored people against their own color. They seem to think it but natural for the white man to vote the democratic ticket, but a sin against the race for any colored man to exercise any freedom of opinion in politics. For him to vote the democratic ticket required a degree of moral courage akin to heroism and martyrdom. He did so at the risk of social ostracism, religious excommunication, or punishment of a brutal severity shocking to humanity. Many of them had determined to trust the government of the State and nation to a change. They had grown weary and sick over promises never fulfilled by the white man who had come among them for office. They felt the impoverishment of labor and the gnawings of increasing want. They saw disorder everywhere and lawlessness unchecked; and they concluded that it was not the sole office and destiny of the enfranchised race to sing peans to the ever-marching soul of John Brown, and give their suffrage to a set of men who care not what becomes of the ship of state so that they save themselves "in the cock-boat of their own fortunes." The white men of South Carolina, too, had discovered the fact which has broken upon the northern republicans like a clap of thunder from a clear sky, that the southern colored man is the natural ally of the southern white man.

Bound together by ties of nativity and those sympathies springing from family associations, the memories of dear old homesteads, they have stopped to counsel together. In the providence of God they find the two races together and see that their entire separation and segregation is a matter more for speculative philosophy than of practical import; that they have a common interest and a common destiny, pleading for peace and a common prosperity; that it is the sublime mission of the white South Carolinian, a splendid type of that seed planted on the American continent by the Cavalier and Huguenot, not to wrong or oppress, or see sink to lower depths of degradation the black man; but by the specific ascendency of the superior race lift the black man up and teach him that there is a better destiny for him than to be made a rod of vengeance, a bone of contention, and a prey to faction.

Wade Hampton caught the inspiration of this idea, and went before the white and colored people of his native State and made an appeal to them to forget all but the common welfare of the State and all its people. These appeals went direct to the hearts of thousands of colored men, who asked as the only condition of their support assurances of justice to their race, and protection against the spirit of violence existing among the colored republicans. This was given. Chamberlain and his coadjutors did not second this beneficent work. He met it by a proclamation disbanding the white rifle clubs, leaving the colored militia organized with guns in hand, and called on the President of the United States to flood the State with Federal soldiery. This had its desired effect. It demoralized the colored democrats by impressing them with the belief that the white democrats were powerless to protect them, and that if they voted with them they would be at the mercy of the incensed colored republicans.

The gregarious nature of these people was stimulated by their orators teaching that the sole mission of the democratic party is to strike down their personal liberty, take away from them the ballot, and remit them to slavery. The effect of this was to make them inaccessible to our orators. This is the explanation of a matter so much complained of by the republicans, that of the white democrats going in force to republican meetings in counties like Edgefield and demanding an equal division of time. I would not, ordinarily, if ever, justify such methods in politics; but there is this extenuation for it there, that it was the only means the democrats had of meeting the republican orators face to face before the colored people and correcting the miserable lies imposed upon their uninformed hearers. Its purpose was not to break up meetings or stifle free speech, for it invoked full, fair, honest discussion. This was the only mode possible for the democrats to reach the colored masses. You cannot judge of this action by applying to it the usages of northern society. There the press is pervasive. The people read, and think, and hear both sides. The press of the South has no access to the colored people. Few of them even can read. They are taught to regard a democratic orator as traveling small-pox. Nine out of ten of them never heard a democratic speech. The studied effort of the white carpet-bagger and scalawag is to insulate the colored men that they alone may enjoy office through their suffrage. Look at Charleston and Beaufort Counties, the mere skeletons of their former self; rich in all the material elements of prosperity, with a soil of inexhaustible fertility, with a climate and surroundings of Arcadian loveliness, fanned by ocean breezes and lulled with the perfumes of perennial flowers. They are now almost Africanized. The black man bestrides them, a very colossus; while the few whites left there "peep about beneath his huge legs, to find themselves dishonorable graves." The South sea-island cotton-fields are measurably untilled, and the productive rice lands are returned to swamps. They are exuberant now in nothing but African loyalty! The voice of a democratic orator on many of their populous islands would be as strange to them as that of the missionary of the cross among the Schaggas of Congo.

There is one colored man in the city of Beaufort named Abram Jenkins, who ought to have a martyr's crown for his heroic fortitude and sufferings for opinion's sake. He had the temerity to run for office on the democratic ticket in that county. At once he became the despised Nazarene among the republican infidels. He was reviled, cursed, threatened by words and anonymous letters; his home was assaulted by night and battered with a storm of brickbats. Amid it all he kept the faith and fought the good fight, for which he was set upon at night by colored ruffians and beaten most brutally. His eyes, nose, mouth, and face were bruised to a mere pulp. He exhibited to the committee the shirt he wore that night. It was the only "bloody shirt" I saw in South Carolina. It was saturated with blood as it spurted from his face under the hammer-strokes of his fiendish assassin. After having been laid up a week "for repairs" he went, yet half blinded, to the civil magistrate of the town to invoke the civil law of the State. His cause was referred to the United States commissioner and the accused was recognized for his appearance before the United States circuit court at Charleston. Jenkins was there to testify before the grand jury when we examined him before our committee. Since we left there Judge LAPHAM, of the committee, brought to me and asked to have incorporated in the testimony the record of the United States court, showing that the grand jury had ignored a true bill. The judge seemed to regard this, I thought, with a spirit of triumph. To me it is a pregnant suggestion. It shows how justice is administered in South Carolina. When it is remembered that Corbin, United States Senator-elect of Chamberlain's black parliament, is the United States prosecuting attorney, that the grand jurors are composed of republican negroes, it is not strange that a true bill was ignored. The true "inwardness," too, of this matter may be yet further understood when it is stated that one Major Stone is the assistant United States attorney at Charleston. He was one of the State board of canvassers which, by omitting certain counties from their canvass, returned the Legislature to elect Chamberlain governor and Corbin United States Senator. It was he who at Charleston "coached" the witnesses for the minority of the committee. He knew of Jenkins's testimony before the committee and recognized the importance of having the grand jury ignore the bill. Therefore, so soon as it was done, this United States court-house clique hastened to have made out, of their own motion, a duly certified copy of the record and forwarded it to their political friend of the committee. So this poor man Jenkins, turned first from the State authorities and then the Federal, is left unvindicated by the law to bottle his wrath and nurse his wounds of body and soul, while his persecutor is lionized as a loyal avenger of recusant negroes.

W. H. Niver, a white citizen of that county, a native of New York, testified before the committee: "I have always voted the republican ticket until this year. I could not stand it any longer." He was, on the day of the election, at the polls, for being a democrat, assaulted and beaten by negroes with fist and club. When asked whether he had made any complaint against, or had had his assailants arrested, he answered, "No; because I would not have got justice. I could not get justice in South Carolina; not down there." The explanation of the truth of this is best illustrated by the following extract from the testimony of Judge Carpenter, a republican judge of one of the Circuits of that State, delivered before the joint committee of Congress a few years ago:

> The juries being composed of colored people, as well as of white, it was difficult to indict anybody. The moment a question of indictment came there would be some difficulty of race about it. I think there was none with the white people, but of course the colored people had a strong predilection for their own race, and they were not very clear in their ideas of the difference between right and wrong. Then, if the parties were indicted, it was very difficult to convict them, and if they were convicted they were very sure to be pardoned. I have known in more than one instance, where a man preferred a charge against a party, the accused was discharged by the grand jury and the accuser indicted for false imprisonment, or something of that sort. In Christ Church Parish four indictments were found that my successor on the bench said were an outrage, and he was a Simon Pure Scott man. Some colored men had been stealing some cattle and the owner had them arrested and taken before a justice of the peace and they were bound over for trial, the proof being very clear. The jury were nearly all colored men and were summoned by the sheriff of my county, a man of very extreme partisan views, Mr. Mackey, son of Dr. Mackey. The jury discharged the prisoners for stealing the cattle and indicted the two young planters for false imprisonment. I have information that it was not a singular case. It has been repeatedly done there. In that case the judge charged the jury that there was no ground at all. (See page 398, report of the committee, second session Forty-second Congress.)

Apropos to this is the tragic history developed before my committee growing out of the case of Peter Johnson, colored. He was an old man, crippled and almost helpless. The white people, as he told me, had been his friends. In want they had fed him; in distress they had counseled him. He determined to vote with them. For so doing he was taken out from his home by his colored neighbors at night and lashed and carved in hellish cruelty with a "bull whip" or rawhide. The trial justice issued his warrant for the arrest of the perpetrators of this outrage. When the constable and his posse made the arrest they were set upon by a band of negroes, a part of one of Chamberlain's militia companies, armed with State guns and bayonets. The prisoners were rescued; two of the posse were shot and frightfully mutilated. One of them was left on the field. The top of his head was shot off; and with a barbarity that would grace the atrocities of the savage butchers of Custer's command, this militia—Chamberlain's conservators of law and guardians of the peace and dignity of the State—took cotton-stalks and dragged out the brains of this poor man, yet warm and almost sentient with thought and life; just as at the massacre of Cainhoy, after shooting down the unarmed and helpless whites, they hacked the bodies, chopped off the arms, and hewed the flesh until the victims almost defied the recognition of family and friends. I have no heart nor language for such recitals. Like Mark Antony—

> I have neither wit, nor words, nor worth,
> Action, nor utterance, nor the power of speech,
> To stir men's blood: I only speak right on;
> I tell you that, which you yourselves do know;
> Show you sweet Cæsar's wounds, poor, poor dumb mouths,
> And bid them speak for me.

On pages 192 of the subcommittee's report, part 3, and following will be found the testimony of a colored man named Peter Jones. The following questions and answers tell their own story and convey their own moral:

> Question. Why did you not vote earlier?
> Answer. Because I was afraid to vote.
> Q. Why were you afraid to vote?
> A. The time of the strike I was taken and whipped and threatened not to vote on that day the way I wished to vote. In the strike they came after me to go. I said, I can't go in the strike, because Mr. Fuller gave me certain wages and I stay with him, because $20 could support me, and for that reason I didn't want to go into the strike, and they said if I don't come in the strike they would hit me a hundred and eighty lashes on the bare skin. They hit me eight or ten, and my wife began to squall, and one fellow cut her across the head and she begged me to "strike," and I did go. I telled them I would vote for General Hampton this time because the way the strike is going on and nobody to govern us and in a mob like that of eight or ten hundred of them and make a man do what they had no right, and the Constitution of the United States didn't allow cowhiding. They said if I vote for Hampton they kill me and so I had to wait until I got a chance to vote. * * * A good many fellows who wanted to vote the way I did, didn't, because they were afraid. I suppose about nineteen or twenty of them. A good many didn't vote at all. * * * After the sheriff go down there they thrashed him.
> Q. How came they to do that?
> A. When the sheriff came out there, Mr. Sams, they telegraphed for him. Wilson, the present sheriff, was off North somewhere, and Mr. Sams came to quell the riot, and these mens of course gathered and said they would not be quelled, because the posse the sheriff had was white mens, and they didn't intend to be quelled; and Mr. Fuller, being the trial justice out there, was along and they turned on him and thrashed him and run him off, and Sams telled them if they didn't behave themselves better than that the United States would have to send troops down there and make them do something and put them under military law. So they run Sams off and gave him five or six hits and thrashed him, and ran the whole posse off, white and colored.

Civil law in the State is deaf and dumb. It does not command respect, because it inspires no confidence. The causes of it are apparent. The great majority of those appointed to administer it lack character and ability. Ignorant, licentious, venal, corrupt, and selfish, the law in their hands is omnipotent only for evil and powerless for good. Everything in the State runs in a political rut. Offices are party bequests. The governor appoints all the civil magistrates and ministerial officers, who are selected as rewards for their fidelity to his political fortunes. Last, though not least, the military arm of the Federal Government has been so repeatedly invoked to interfere in all domestic broils and disturbances that it has virtually emasculated the State government. The vitalizing energy of home rule is gone. Instead of self-governing, the State is either governed from without or left a prey to the worst passions and dispositions of the worst men within her borders. Therefore the people, relieved of that sense of self-dependence which is the inspiration of local self-government, have either relapsed into indifferent despair or total reliance on physical military force. So that, if they swing to and fro over the abysm of anarchy or the maelstrom of mobocracy, it is the logical result of the policy and work of the republican party in the State. It is literally a government of force. It is violative of the fundamental idea of republican institutions. It rests not on the consent of the governed. Its foundations were laid on the yet hot ashes of consuming war. No corner-stone resting upon the granite of the Constitution, cemented with fraud and propped up by bayonets, it is a continuing source of uneasy apprehension, and must, before the sweeping winds of a constantly increasing healthy public sentiment, go down and bury its builders with it.

Under this sense of insecurity and reliance on mere brute force, such a thing as a free lawful election in the State is scarcely possible. Those who control the State regard not its laws.

Article 8, section 3, of her constitution provides that—

It shall be the duty of the General Assembly to provide from time to time for the registration of all electors.

For eight years this mandatory requirement of the fundamental law has remained a dead letter. With a population like hers, so migratory, so lacking in individuality, and so difficult of identification, a registry law is essential to a pure ballot; but the Legislature of the State, always republican, has obstinately refused all petitions and strangled all attempts to enact the necessary law. Superadded to this, the electors are permitted to vote at any precinct in the county. With the polls and the returns in the hands of the governor's appointees there is no limit to the voting capacity of a South Carolina patriot. The election law of the State requires that the voting shall be by ballot; that the ballot shall be folded and placed in the box by the voter. The evident object of the law is to secure a free expression of the voter's will, by enabling him to cast a secret ballot. The evidence shows that in Charleston and Beaufort Counties this law was totally disregarded. The republican tickets were printed in red ink, with a flaming "spread eagle" at the top, so that when the ballot was folded its political character was plainly discernible to the crowds of negroes that invariably thronged the polls. The voter, too, was required to hold up to the view of the crowd his ballot in his hand while taking the voter's oath. The only exception to this blood-red ticket was in the city of Charleston, where the republicans substituted a ticket with a crowing cock on the back and a representation of a hustings meeting with a speaker rampant, the artillery booming, and the crowd shouting. This ticket should be preserved in the archives of Congress as evidence of what a secret ballot means in republican South Carolina. Old chanticleer in life-size, on the back of it, is I suppose awaking the echoes of the precinct every time a colored voter tallied one for Hayes by crowing out "Loi-al-i-te!" And the scene below it, as large as a patent-medicine sign, is significant. It represents, I assume, Tim Hurley, one of the Hayes electors, far above the ignoble crowd, telling the "cullud gemmen" to send A. P. Ford and all the other sixteen negroes to the Legislature, and the good olden times again would come, of Greeneville and Columbia Railroad "slush." The classic motto over the Gatling gun, (the great factor in recent Southern politics,) "Let her bang, ye heroes; victory is ours!" typifies, I suppose, the triumph of the military over the civil authority. The apparent unbounded enthusiasm of the motley crew beneath and around him is born, I imagine, of the anticipated return, in case of victory, of those days of golden harvests described in the report of the joint congressional committee, made in 1872, touching the affairs of South Carolina, as follows:

The journals of the last session of the Legislature show that a joint resolution was adopted to adjourn on the 7th day of March last. The proceedings for several weeks prior to that time show great activity and industry in the passage of private bills, to get through by the day fixed for adjournment. In the house, particularly, this was so, holding frequent night sessions as late as the hour of midnight. The journal of the house shows that on the 4th day of March, only three days prior to the final adjournment, the house took a recess from ten o'clock in the morning to seven in the evening. One F. I. Moses, jr., from Brooklyn, New York, was the speaker of the house. There was a negro member of the house by the name of Whipper, who was the proprietor of fast horses. Moses and Whipper had made up a match race for $1,000 a side. The race was fixed to come off on the said 4th day of March; and the explanation of the recess on that day is, that the house adjourned to attend this horse-race. The race was run; and the speaker lost the bet of $1,000. Three days afterward, on the day of final adjournment, and the very last thing done in the house, as shown by the journal, was a motion made by Whipper, "That a gratuity of $1,000 be voted to the speaker of this house, for the dignity and ability with which he has presided over its deliberations." The motion was passed by a large majority.

This seems to have been the founding of a custom which has since been religiously observed by every succeeding Legislature. The condition of disorder and lawlessness, born of republican rule in the State, was conspicuous at the late election. The polls were frequented and in some instances surrounded by negro militia, armed with guns and bludgeons. They drilled and paraded at the ballot-box and exercised a military surveillance over the ballot. No colored man could cast a democratic ballot with impunity. Men were threatened, assaulted, and beaten, and their tickets taken from them, and there was no one in authority to protect them. There was not disclosed in all the evidence taken in these counties of Charleston and Beaufort one single instance of violence or intimidation offered by any democrat to any republican at the polls, and I aver it as my most solemn judgment that there was scarcely a republican ballot placed in the box at any of the precincts investigated by the subcommittee of which I was a member which in a community where law and morality were respected and enforced would not have been cast out as a fraud. They were purposely printed so as not to be a secret ballot. They were designed to require every black hand placing a ballot in the box to display the bloody talons of the loyal eagle.

Though it must be conceded that on the face of the papers as made out by Chamberlain's election commissioners the electoral vote of the State went for Hayes and Wheeler, no man will ever know what the real vote of the State was, nor will it be possible in any future election under the present election system of the State to ascertain the real vote at any election. Of one thing, however, I am well assured from the evidence, and that is had the ballot-box been free and honest the State would have gone as decisively and overwhelmingly for Tilden as it did for Hampton.

The republican party have much to say about the "color line" in South Carolina. To whatever extent it does exist, it is the result of the wicked, mad, and selfish policy of that party. The white people of the State are almost a unit, not through personal antagonism to the colored race, but because they are heart-sick of the personnel and morale of republican administration and domination. And if at times, here and there, there have been acts of violence and wrong committed by white men, educated or uneducated, let us be wise enough to comprehend the causes and just enough, without defending the acts, to admit their mitigating circumstances. Bad government ever has and ever will produce bad men and public disorder. It gave a Robin Hood to history and to romance. It scourged Italy with the Carbonari, moved to "vengeance for the lamb torn by the wolf;" and gave France the Free Companions, as the legitimate fruit of the government of Louis XI. The Moss Troopers, who cavorted over England and again appeared in Scotland, were but the brood of Norman oppression and the tyranny of the English crown. If our republican friends would see disappear the much dreaded "red shirt" in political campaigns in South Carolina, and the rifle and revolver as political factors, let them disband their negro militia, withdraw from office the miserable adventurer and lazzaroni, who out of the public treasury exchange their rags for rich apparel and then banish from public confidence the political bandits who have popularized robbery, plunder, and bribery.

There is scarcely a white man in South Carolina to-day whose prosperity rests upon low taxes and honest industry who sustains Chamberlain. He himself, before the dazzling prize of chief magistracy flitted before his unsteady eye, said in a letter designed for public attention that—

No man of common prudence, or who was even slightly familiar with the working of social forces, could fail to see that the elements which went to compose the now dominant party (of South Carolina) were not of the kind which produce public virtue and honor, or which could long secure even public order and peace.

And he characterized the republican prrty of the State as composed of "equal parts of ignorance and rapacity." What they were then they are to-day. His leadership has neither changed the component parts, nor elevated their moral or intellectual tone. Chamberlain's character and qualities bring to mind what Lord Bacon said, "Scientia tanquam angeli alati, cupiditatibus vero tanquam serpentes qui humi reptant." The difference between the soaring angel and the creeping serpent is just the difference between Chamberlain, a citizen, joining in the then popular clamor against Moses, the infamous governor, and Chamberlain, governor, now defending and living by the agencies that enabled Moses to commit his robberies of the State.

Barring a few intervals of apparent disgust on his part, no man has catered more to the worst prejudices of the black people of that State than he. And it is such conduct on the part of selfish, calculating, cold, intellectual men that has borne such a harvest of bitter fruit. It has almost reproduced in South Carolina Warren Hastings's Carnatic of Hyder Ali. The sweep of the civil bandit and the despoiling of the political caitiffs have left a desolating track as black as the cinders of war. It has loaded the State with a bonded debt and burdened property with such consuming taxes that "you may buy land now as cheap as stinking mackerel." It has bred distrust between blacks and whites and set the blacks in deadly hostility against the land-owners. Like all such madness it ran into extremes. The white man sought to make a Poland there. The black man said he preferred a Hayti. Recognizing his numerical strength he concluded to set up for himself. He wants no white immigrant, for he distrusts his fealty and suspects his integrity. This fact cropped out in the Missionary Record, published at Charleston, edited by Rev. R. H.

Cain, colored, elected to the Forty-fifth Congress from that district. I quote:

The time has come for every honest man in the republican party to assert his liberty and declare his opposition to a class of men who have proposed to rule the colored people of this State with a rod of iron, of damnable corruption. For the last two years a certain set of unmitigated scoundrels (carpet-baggers) have dictated to the masses of voters of this State what they should do, what they should think, and how they should act. There has been a certain class who have been picked up out of the prisons and gutters of poverty coming to this State, begging their passage, and lifting contributions to start them in business, who have since grown so proud and arrogant that they now wish to dictate to the whole people what their duties are and what they should think.

This feeling of the blacks extends in some degree toward the mulatto, which was developed in the testimony of Miller, of Beaufort County, a mulatto and member of the Mackey legislature. In a public speech he paraded his African lineage and expressed his contempt of his white blood because it came not through lawful wedlock. There is no preferment in the State without the African aroma. The white man who aspires to Congress with any hope must either trace in his heraldic delineations the ebony hues of the Congo, or form a matrimonial alliance with the house of Ham, or swing in the mazes of the ball-room the dusky maidens, and take into his law office none but colored students!

This predominance in politics of the race has borne other fruit. The white demagogue and ambitious colored politician in their rivalry for colored votes cajoled the Legislature into an appropriation of $700,000 to buy up for distribution among the blacks "lands for the landless." This was the fulfillment of the old promise of a mule and forty acres of land. It was the opportunity of the patriotic carpet-bagger, like Chamberlain, "who had gone South with his sword and remained after the war." This money went into the evolutions of the "ring," from which it never emerged. It went to the purchase of swamps like "Hell-hole," which cost $26,000 but was booked to the State at $120,000. It has bred a sentimental philanthropy like that which caused the Legislature to take control of the old Columbia College, the alma mater of the brightest geniuses and ripest scholars of the Augustan age of southern literature, and convert it into a model automatic manufactory for colored lawyers, lawgivers, and statesmen, each one of whom receives a bonus of $20 a month from the State treasury during his term of years in the college. I looked in upon its commencement exercises while there. I saw but one white man in the classes. He was from Canada, a student of divinity, a genuine Johnny Bull, like Falstaff, "so fat-witted with drinking of old sack and unbuttoning after supper" as to suggest that he was the probable offspring of the flaming-nosed Stiggins, in Pickwick, whose unction so disgusted the senior Weller.

These allusions will serve to illustrate the only real "color line" of the South. It is a policy of exclusiveness founded in mere party greed, which must ultimately return to plague its inventors. The God of nature and the forces of an advancing public sentiment set their faces against it. That black legislature is the only one to-day, lest it be in Louisiana, on the Christian earth which is the representative of a white constituency. How can it endure in this age and land—the professed exponent of an advanced type of civilization? South Carolina can never be Africanized. It belongs to the constellation of the Federal Union. It cannot escape the light. The sunshine will gleam over the waste of darkness. The narrow bigot and ranting fanatic, who are but snails that see only the walls of their shells and think it the only palace of the great universe, may like ghouls loiter amid the graveyards of our unhappy war and seek to devour the white children of the old South Carolinians because their fathers taught secession. You may hold them under a government for a time which is a perpetual reminder and menace, but you can never unman those people; conscience, a sense of right, and a love of freedom are still theirs. The busy actors in the olden strife have gone to their graves and the old issues died with them. The monuments of her great men are thick. On them are inscribed the fame of their intellectual achievements. They recount the triumphs of genius and perpetuate the feats of heroes, jurists, orators, and statesmen. Her young men, in whose veins courses the blood of the Cavalier, the Huguenot, and the Pilgrim, walk by them and feel the kindling inspiration. They wish to emulate their greatness and prove that ambition and patriotism belong to no section. Shall the rewards of virtue and culture be denied them? Shall the dark frown of the Federal Government now upon them never be irradiated by a smile? Shall the guns of Fort Sumter continue to point inland toward Charleston, or be turned with our commerce out to sea? And in the flag floating from its historic ramparts will the time ever again come when every citizen shall see only the symbols of justice, equality, and union? Surely it has been dishonored by base uses long enough. The army that should follow it ever and everywhere as the beckoning inspiration of patriotism has in later years marched under it so often as the mere executioner of the will of the politician, that its members, rank and file, blush with shame and hesitate longer to obey. For they see that on the ruins of States overthrown by them have arisen governments of monstrous iniquity, whose very existence is a fraud and national reproach; that, robber governments as they are, they are made the instruments first of plundering the people of their homes and estates and then of their suffrage, and finally culminating in subjecting the American people to the hazard and infamy of having imposed upon them for President a man whose title is grounded and steeped in fraud and perjury.

The Election in Florida.

SPEECH OF HON. W. A. J. SPARKS,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 21, 1877,

On the decision of the electoral commission in the Florida case.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Speaker, I propose to detain the House but a few moments in giving expression to the views entertained by me on the reported decision of the electoral commission on the conflicting certificates of the electoral vote of the State of Florida, which is now before us.

That decision, sir, has startled this whole country from Maine to California. On the one hand it has drawn to it the applause and approbation of one class of political partisans, and on the other hand it has been received by another class with unqualified condemnation and met with the severest censure.

It will therefore hardly be doubted by impartial men that the better course in regard to it is, so far as we can with the influences surrounding us, and the prejudices that we find it difficult to restrain, to apply to it the tests of an honest, fair criticism. And this it is my purpose as well as my hope now to do.

Sir, it is beyond all question believed by a large majority of the people of the whole country that the electors represented in certificate No. 1, known as the Hayes electors, (and which it is decided by the commission should be counted as the electoral vote of the State of Florida,) were not elected by the vote of the people of that State; but that they were repudiated at the polls, and that their opponents, the gentlemen known as the Tilden electors, did receive a majority of the votes and were elected. And it is insisted that this clearly appears from the certified vote as sent up by the officials of the various counties of the State, and now on file in the office of the secretary of state.

And it is also insisted that there is no law in that State that authorizes the board of State canvassers to subtract from or add to that vote.

Then if it be a fact that a majority of the votes cast and duly certified by the county officials to the secretary of state or to the canvassing board were cast for the Tilden electors and that the laws of Florida do not warrant the board to take from or add to the vote thus certified, it is palpably plain that those gentlemen should have received certificates of election and have cast the electoral vote.

But to prevent this it is charged that the majority of the canvassing board, being bitter partisans and in opposition to the election of these gentlemen, conspiring with the then governor of the State, (also a bitter partisan and their opponent,) so manipulated the votes as to defraud the true electors of their certificates and to install other men (the Hayes electors) into office, and that through that fraud the electoral vote of the State was cast contrary to the will of the majority of voters, duly expressed and certified by the county officials. In other words, that seven conspirators, consisting of the republican governor, two members of the canvassing board, and the four republican candidates for electors, (one of whom was a convicted felon,) through fraud and in opposition to the expressed will of the people at the ballot-box, have usurped the offices of electors and attempted thereby to defraud the people of a State with respect to their voice in the election of President and Vice-President of the United States.

Now, sir, this is the charge; and I am warranted in saying that it is limpingly, if at all denied; and, if denied, it is of easy solution, the points in it being very few and readily and easily proven by a resort to the facts.

It is a certain fact that the State of Florida has a right to an electoral voice in the election of President and Vice-President; and if a voice, it is its own voice, given by a majority of its legal voters at the ballot-box, and not the voice of a scoundrelly returning board controlled by two characterless rascals, aided by a few other scoundrels equally as characterless.

Now, sir, the inquiries necessarily arise: This fraud committed, how is it to be remedied? or is there no remedy? The first inquiry is an interesting and grave one, for it involves high interests to the people, not only of a sovereign State, but to the forty-five millions of people of this great Republic. The second inquiry, it seems to me, is not only a negation of our proud boast of advancing civilization and freedom, but is an insult to the spirit of our free institutions, which are, as we claim, based upon justice and regulated by law.

Sir, it is now insisted by a class of statesmen who have quite recently become converts to the doctrine of State sovereignty, that Congress has no power to investigate and extirpate this fraud, for the reason that electors are State officers and under the control of State authority.

Now, sir, with me that argument has such force as to demand serious consideration, for the doctrine of local self-government and of State sovereignty is a dogma of political faith with me that came not of yesterday to end to-morrow, but is a permanent and lasting conviction, and, within the limits and as restrained by the Federal Constitution, is in my judgment the pivotal point of our democratic theory of government. But the offices of President and Vice-President are for the whole Union and are national. The Constitution expressly provides for electors for these offices, and while it leaves their appointment to the States it defines the department of their government that directs the manner of their election, fixes their number, and prescribes the qualifications of the persons to be elected. Now, with this provision of the Constitution before us, can it reasonably be maintained that Congress has no power to investigate as to the fraudulent electoral vote of a State and to correct or defeat it? Have we not, sir, in this identical case acted in that direction and attempted to do this? If not, what meaning can be attached to the investigating committees sent by both branches of this Congress at great expense into the State of Florida during the present session?

But, sir, if there be no power in Congress to remedy this monstrous wrong, then where is it vested? The authority to do this must be lodged somewhere or our Government is a cheat, a fraud, or a failure.

If this power be not in Congress, is it in the State? It must be in one or the other. If the State, let us examine the record and see what the State of Florida has done to correct and relieve herself from this fraud upon the sovereign rights of her citizens.

When it became apparent that this fraud would be perpetrated, an honest official and member of the canvassing board certified (informally by necessity) but certified to the election of the true electors. They met at the time and place prescribed by law and cast the electoral vote of the State truly according to the will of the majority as shown by the certified votes, and this, together with a certified statement of the true votes as certified by the county officials of all the counties, is forwarded to the President of the Senate and is now before us, and constitutes what is mentioned as Certificate No. 2, being the returns of the Tilden electors certified by Attorney-General Cocke.

Now let us analyze these two certificates and judge between them. Certificate No. 1 (the Hayes electors) is a falsehood and a fraud formally certified to. Certificate No. 2 (Tilden electors) is the truth and the honest vote informally certified. Now, must we stand by the falsehood and fraud and reject the truth and honest vote? or shall we stamp the formally certified falsehood under foot and uphold the truth, though not credited by formal attestation? But this is not all, in fact is but a small part of what the State of Florida has done to shield itself from this outrage.

As soon as it became known that this wrong was to be done, proceedings were instituted in the State courts having competent jurisdiction by quo warranto against the fraudulent electors prior to the casting of the vote by them, and which proceedings thus commenced were prosecuted as speedily as possible to a final judgment, determining the illegality of their pretended claims as electors and establishing the legality of the Tilden electors. And it stands now upon the judicial records of that State as an unappealed and final judgment in the premises, and is by duly certified copy before us accompanying one of the certificates of returns.

But again, the Legislature of Florida after the date when the electoral votes should have been counted, but before the final count by Congress, (without which they are non-effective,) passed a law, which was duly approved, providing for a recount of the certified votes as they were in the secretary of state's office, with the view of preventing this fraud. The recount was made, and the truly elected electors certified to by the legal board. They met and cast the votes and certified the same under the governor's certificate and seal of State, in all respects formal and correct save only that it was done subsequently to the day on which the vote should have been cast, and which was clearly a necessity in correcting the fraud. And this Certificate No. 3, giving the true votes by the electors duly and honestly appointed, and in all respects formally correct as certified by the governor under the seal of State, is now also before us claiming our recognition.

Being a correction of the wrong done by these Hayes electors, it is of necessity of later date than that wrong. It is admitted by the commission that the law was not ex post facto; and it is also admitted that the recount was orderly done and completed in all its parts, the true certificates given to the electors elected, their votes cast, and duly and formally certified by the governor, under the seal of State, and forwarded to and placed in the hands of the President of the Senate some time before this present count commenced in the presence of the two Houses under the Constitution.

Now, shall this formal certificate of the honest vote of the elected electors be received and counted, though lately received? or shall the formal certificate of falsehood and fraud received earlier be counted? In other words, shall falsehood win because it is early, and truth be debarred admittance because of a delay in making an earlier appearance on account of the stumbling-blocks that falsehood has thrown in its way?

These, sir, appear to me to be questions of vital import and present this case in its true light, stripped of all verbiage and quibbling technicalities.

The high commission have decided that Congress cannot look behind the returns whatever of fraud may be reeking in the background; and not only that Congress cannot go behind them, but they have in effect decided that the State of Florida is now and ever has been powerless to correct this fraud; for, as I have attempted to show, that State has exhausted its powers in all its departments, executive, legislative, and judicial, to arrest this monstrous wrong. Congress through its committees has also exhausted all of its powers in the same direction. And thus, according to that decision, all efforts have proved unavailing; and fraud intrenched is impregnable, and, despite all assaults, comes out triumphant.

Shall we, sir, the immediate representatives of the people, sanction it? For one I cannot and will not. And I take occasion here to warn the leaders of that party, attempting to obtain a triumph through means like this, that the retributive justice of a long-suffering and patient people will certainly come; and when it comes it will be after the fashion of no petty quibblings nor technical evasions, but, as the whirlwind and the avalanche, driving all before it. Falsehood and fraud will then be uprooted and demolished, and truth and justice will be respected.

Pacific Railroad Acts.

SPEECH OF HON. J. B. GORDON,

OF GEORGIA,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

February 7, 1877.

The Senate having under consideration Senate bill No. 984—

Mr. GORDON said,

Mr. PRESIDENT: I thank the Senate for its courtesy in refusing to force a vote upon this question, of so much importance to the country, until, as the mover of one of the bills before us, I could be heard. I am still physically disqualified for the task before me, but I shall not ask the Senate to longer delay a vote upon the question after I have presented some of the considerations which influence my action, and which ought to decide, I think, the course of the Senate.

The bill which I have had the honor to introduce, and which has been approved by the Railroad Committee, I believe to be not only more in consonance with the ends of justice to all parties concerned, and more consistent with the terms of contract between the Government and the railroad companies, but also more certain than the bill of the Judiciary Committee to produce the great result which we all have in view, namely, to protect the public Treasury against loss.

There are three things connected with this subject about which I think a majority of the Senate will be agreed.

First, that the prime, controlling motive of Congress in granting Government aid to the Union and Central Pacific Railroads was to secure the construction and thereafter the use of the roads for the benefit of the Government itself.

Second, that these companies, having accepted this aid from the Government, were bound not only to build the roads within the time specified and according to the contract, and furnish the Government thereafter with cheap, prompt, and abundant transportation for its supplies, but also to provide means to meet all the obligations the Government had assumed on their account.

Third, that it is the duty of Congress to enforce the contract in respect to construction and transportation, and also to compel these companies to provide the means to meet all their obligations to Government by the shortest and surest processes compatible with the contract and the good faith of the Government.

Upon these three points a large majority of the Senate is doubtless in accord, the only question being how shall we arrive at the desideratum last named. We must secure the money from these roads; but we must do this in accordance with the contract and not outside of it. No temptation will induce me to travel outside of the contract we have made with them in order to secure concessions even for the pecuniary advantage of the Government. I view with unfeigned alarm any proposed legislation of an extraconstitutional character or in any degree violative of vested rights. The sanctity of contracts and the restraints of written governmental obligations, whether as agreements, constitutions, or laws, must remain inviolate, or a republic of law will speedily become a government of force. I propose, so far as I may, to exact of these companies a compliance with all their obligations; but outside of the contract which Congress has made I will never go.

The contract in a nutshell was this: The Government was to issue in round numbers to the two companies mentioned $55,000,000 in bonds to aid in the construction of a great trunk line of rail-way from near the Missouri River, across the plains, through the passes of the Rocky Mountains, to the Pacific Ocean. The companies accepting this subsidy were to construct the road, keep it in repair, hold it always subject to the use and benefit of the Government in peace and in war, and under the first law of 1862 were to give the Government a first mortgage upon the roads and to pay the bonds issued for their benefit by 5 per cent. of the net earnings and all of the transportation account against the Government. In 1864 it was discovered that capital could not be enlisted in the enterprise under the provisions of the law of 1862. Congress therefore, deciding that these roads should be constructed, so amended the act of 1862 as to make the Government lien only a second mortgage, and required payment of the bonds by the 5 per cent. of net earnings and one-half of the transportation account against the Government, instead of the whole of it as was required by the law of 1862.

All will agree that this is the contract briefly stated.

A careful analysis of the debates upon both the original bill and the amendments thereto demonstrates that there were three classes who supported those measures. The first was a very large, very intelligent, and very respectable class, who believed that the national necessity for a great highway to the Pacific coast was so imperative in 1862-'64 that the Government would be justified in donating to these roads every dollar of bonds required to aid them. Another class, unwilling to donate the bonds, were ready to take the risk of their loss in order to secure for the use of the Government a transcontinental railway with its attendant advantages, political, industrial, social, commercial. But there was a third class, a smaller class, who anxious to witness the consummation of this truly gigantic enterprise, eager to see the Government clothed with the additional privileges, power, prestige, and glory which the accomplishment of this great purpose would bring to it, were yet unwilling to issue any of the Government's obligations in aid of these roads unless assured that the companies accepting them could and would build the roads according to the contract, and could and would provide for the payment of the bonds and the interest at their maturity.

While I have no criticisms to offer upon the first two classes who supported these measures, I must admit that my sympathies run strongly with the third class. The object of the bill which I have had the honor to introduce is not to satisfy those of the first class who, like Senator Wilson, believed that the construction of these roads would justify the absolute expenditure by the Government itself of all the money that it would require to construct them, and that the Government would be abundantly paid from a thousand other sources. It is not to satisfy the second class, who, hoping, yet voted for the measures doubting whether these roads ever could or ever would pay the bonds issued in their interest. But the bill is intended to meet and, as I think, will meet the requirements and justify the hopes and the anticipations of the third class, who voted to grant the aid with the assurance that the bonds would be paid by the roads.

I assume, Mr. President, that every Senator is, as he ought to be, anxious to guard both the money and the honor of this Government. If I could be convinced that the bill introduced by the Judiciary Committee accomplished both of these ends, no man upon this floor would more earnestly support it than myself. But, sir, will such be its results? It might save the Government's money, but would it not, if it became a law, violate the pledges of the Government made to these her citizens? I say it might save the Government's money. I use the qualifying word might because I propose to show in the progress of my remarks that it is capitally doubtful whether it even accomplishes this purpose, while the bill reported from the Railroad Committee secures the Government against the loss of her bonds or the violation of her pledges.

Let us examine these two bills with reference, first, to their provisions for saving the money to the Government. What are to be the results of the adoption of the bill introduced by the Judiciary Committee? The first and most certain result is a lawsuit, the end of which no man can predict. I say a lawsuit, because we have positive information that the Judiciary Committee bill will be resisted in the courts; but if we had no such information, we should know the fact; for standing as these companies do upon the decision of the Supreme Court recently rendered, standing upon the definitions of "net earnings"—which, by the way, when boiled down to the last analysis, constitute nearly all there is in the judiciary bill for the protection of the Government's Treasury—standing upon the definition of net earnings as given by lexicographers and by the courts; standing upon the contract itself, interpreted not only according to the text of the law, but by the expressed opinions of the legislators who made it—standing upon these, what man of sense doubts that these railroads, in their own interests and the interest of their bonded creditors, will resist this bill of the Judiciary Committee to their utmost power in the courts?

Therefore, I say the first result of the judiciary bill will be a lawsuit; and who of us can tell when or how such a lawsuit is to end?

My strength will not permit me, and I do not know that it is necessary, to go into the discussion of the legal questions involved in this controversy. It is not necessary to inquire whether Congress has the power under the amended act to alter and amend its original grants ad libitum. It is not necessary to inquire whether the courts would construe the words "alter, amend, or repeal" in the amended act as limited by the objects for which they were introduced in the original act. I do not care to inquire now as to the vested rights of third parties under the original act of 1862, nor how far the courts would be controlled by these vested rights in their judgment as to the constitutional power of Congress over this question. It is enough for me to know that the bill of the Judiciary Committee involves litigation, long, tedious, doubtful, expensive. It is enough to know that of all the decisions recited in support of the position assumed by the Judiciary Committee, I believe nearly one hundred and fifty in number, not one of them is applicable to the case before us. So far as I am able to ascertain, and I think I am correct, every one of those decisions was rendered in cases where a grant was made for the benefit of the corporators or of some interest to be affected through the corporators, and not as in this case, for the benefit of the grantor, the State, or the Government. On the other hand, a bill is presented which avoids litigation, which, as we are informed, the railroad companies will accept, thus settling this vexed question which has consumed so much of the time of Congress, and securing the payment by the roads of the bonds and interest.

Whatever may be said about the constitutionality of the judiciary bill, it is certain, I think, that some of its provisions violate the contract made with these roads. The first section, as was so ably shown by the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] on yesterday, undertakes to define what net earnings are, and then proceeds upon this unwarrantable definition to demand what the contract does not demand. What are net earnings? The Judiciary Committee say they constitute all the receipts of the road, less "the necessary and actual expenses of operating the same and keeping the same in a state of repair." Let us see if that be a correct definition. What does Webster say net earnings are? Net earnings is a compound word and is not to be found, but "net" is defined to be "clear of all charges and deductions." Clear of charges for the running expenses alone? Is that the meaning? Not at all, sir. Clear of all charges. Clear of charges for interest upon the bonded debt, clear of charges for whatever floating debt may have accrued and become due at the time; clear of these and of all charges upon the roads for running expenses as well. That, sir, is the definition of net earnings.

What would railroad men, railroad experts, what would merchants, what would men of every class of business, say to this definition of the Judiciary Committee? What does my friend upon my left say? I doubt if there be a railroad man upon this floor who would agree that the definition of the Judiciary Committee is a correct one. I call upon my friend from New Jersey [Mr. RANDOLPH] to bear me out in this assertion, who is a railroad man, and my friend from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. RANDOLPH. If I am to answer the Senator from Georgia, I should, I think, disagree with his definition of net earnings. I have not understood net earnings to be exactly what he defines them. I was waiting to hear how much he explained the term to my satisfaction. I should like to have the meaning clearly stated by my friend from Georgia.

Mr. GORDON. Very well. What I mean to say is this, that when you undertake to ascertain how much money railroad men or any other class of men have made upon their investment, especially upon borrowed capital, you take their receipts and deduct therefrom the cost of running the business, and then the further deduction is to be made of the interest upon the borrowed capital, and further still all expenditures for wear and tear in the conduct of the business, before you reach the result—net earnings.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to ask him a question there?

Mr. GORDON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WRIGHT. Let me put a case. Suppose that this company instead of being debtors had their funds so increased that they had money and had invested it and were receiving interest upon their money, would this be taken into consideration in the matter of net earnings? Suppose instead of being debtors they should be creditors and have bonds outstanding in their favor upon which they were drawing interest, would that be taken into the account in considering net earnings?

Mr. GORDON. That is not a supposable case at all. These railroads did not have money. They undertook, under the contract of 1862, to get money with the Government holding a first-mortgage bond upon those roads. Everybody knows who knows the history of this case at all that they utterly failed. There was not one dollar of capital in this country or any other country that could be induced to go into the enterprise under those circumstances.

Suppose the Judiciary Committee to be right in their interpretation; suppose that net earnings would be held in a litigated case between these companies and the Government to mean their entire gross receipts less only their running expenses, what would then be the result? I undertake to say that the companies would become bankrupt under it, and that the Government would not only lose the interest but the last dollar of the indebtedness. There are seventy millions of outstanding bonded debt upon these roads in addition to the debt due the Government. The Government holds a mortgage but upon eighteen hundred and forty or eighteen hundred and sixty miles of this road, and a second mortgage at that. Suppose net earnings are correctly defined by the Judiciary Committee, and suppose instead of 5 per cent., as the law has prescribed, the Government requires of them 25 per cent., where is the railroad in this country similarly situated that could stand such a drain upon its resources for five years? The conflict in this case would be inevitable between the original first bondholders and the Government as a second-mortgage bondholder. And who does not know in such a contest, with seventy millions of this bonded debt hanging over these eighteen hundred miles of road, that net earnings, Government bonds, Government interest, and everything else would be swept away.

But what would the net earnings amount to even at 25 per cent., construing the net earnings to mean what I believe the courts have held and will forever hold they do mean? What would the 25 per cent. of net earnings amount to? If net earnings mean what I have defined them, there would be no improvement over the present law. I wish to ask any Senator who favors the judiciary bill what security has the Government that net earnings will amount to the interest upon these bonds five, ten, or twenty years hence? Who knows what is to happen in the future? Can you tell, sir? Can any Senator upon this floor predict what the net earnings of this great line of railroad will amount to when competing lines to the Pacific shall have been finished; when the Northern Pacific and the Southern or Texas Pacific shall have been completed, and when we shall have a water way across the isthmus, reducing freight to a point possibly below the actual cost to railroads. Is it sensible for the Government to lean upon such a contingency? But besides, suppose no competing lines are built, who is to guard the receipts of these roads against undue expenditures? Who is to prevent these corporations from so conducting their business as to absorb every dollar of their receipts? Who is to prevent these corporations under their charters from increasing their employés until their list shall be as long as the list of their stockholders? Who is to regulate the salaries that are to be paid, or the number of side-tracks that are to be built? To my mind there never has been introduced into this Congress a bill more indefinite, more uncertain as to its results, and more liable to utterly deceive us and defeat the great object we have in view. I do not charge that these roads would thus attempt to employ long lists of agents who might be their stockholders or parties interested in the corporations. I do not charge that large salaries are to be paid so as to consume the receipts, and thus defraud the Government. O, no, sir; far be it from me to make such a charge; but I insist that a bill which proceeds upon such a basis, offers such inducements, and presents such temptations is wrong in principle and ought not to pass.

Mr. RANDOLPH. If Congress has the right to alter or amend the charter of this company, it certainly will have the right in the contingency of which the Senator from Georgia is speaking to protect itself by additional legislation against any such danger as he suggests. As to the managers of the corporation hereafter being stockholders, I assume that the courts will step in and protect the Government. I think the Senator in making the argument does an injustice to those who are now managing and who may hereafter manage the railroad. I have no idea that the managers could ever be brought to any such iniquity as he suggests in his view of the case.

Mr. GORDON. I distinctly disclaimed in my remarks making any such charge. I am attacking the bill upon its principle. Undoubtedly the Senator is correct. If Congress can interfere ad libitum, if we can alter and amend this contract session after session, bring these roads into Congress and try them year after year, if we can impose regulations, abrogate contracts, or violate stipulations as we please, undoubtedly we could say that they should pay their president only a thousand dollars a year; that they should only run one train a week; that they should employ one conductor to manage two trains, if such an absurdity can be supposed. Undoubtedly we can do all this; but I apprehend that it is not the purpose of the Congress nor of the country to take charge of these railroads and manage them as a Government concern. It is with a view to rid these companies of the trouble we give them and to get rid of the trouble they are giving us that I want to have a settlement, definite, final, which will pay the debt and save both our credit and our honor.

I have already shown that there are seventy millions of outstanding first-mortgage bonds over these roads, and have expressed the belief, for which I have given cogent reasons, that if the net earnings are to be defined as the Judiciary Committee defines them, and we are to require 25 per cent. of that sum paid in annually, these roads must become bankrupt. Why, sir, some of them are already bankrupt. Some of these roads are in the hands of a receiver now. Sir, with such obligations as they have to meet, with such a bonded debt over them, for one I shall never consent to jeopardize the interest of this Government by relying upon any such feeble probability as net earnings.

I said there were but eight hundred and odd miles of the Central Pacific road upon which the Government had a mortgage. By the bill reported from the Railroad Committee, and I call the attention of the Senate to that point especially, we have pledged, in order to secure the Government against loss, the income from thirteen hundred miles of road. To four hundred and odd miles of this road the Government has never given a dollar. I am discussing the possibilities of getting this money secured to the Government of the United States under the provisions of these two bills. According to the calculation of men far better versed in figures than myself, according to the ablest actuaries, the provisions of the bill reported by the Committee on Railroads will meet all the indebtedness and interest assumed by the Government and half a million over.

But suppose I am mistaken in that. Suppose the railroad committee is mistaken, and the actuaries are mistaken; what then? Does the bill provide no provision for such a contingency? Are we left without resource? Is there a remedy? Yes, Mr. President, a remedy, prompt, direct, ample. What is it? Here it is. Whenever it shall be discovered that the annual payments with interest are insufficient to meet these bonds at the time specified in the bill, then the amount shall be increased. How much? Half a million a year? A million a year? Increased until it shall be sufficient. What could be simpler; what more emphatic; what could guarantee more absolute protection to the Treasury of the United States?

No, Mr. President, whatever may be said about ambiguity of or probable lawsuits under the Judiciary Committee bill, there is no ambiguity or uncertainty about this. It is plain, direct, and easily enforced.

Let me now recapitulate in one sentence. The Judiciary Committee bill attempts to define in the first place the meaning of "net earnings," about which definition there is great doubt. It provides that instead of 5 per cent., as the law requires, we shall exact 25 per cent. of the net earnings so defined, about the right of which there is also a very grave doubt. It also provides that instead of one-half of the amount for transportation as contemplated by the law we shall exact all. It is capitally doubtful whether Congress has the power to make such exaction. It provides, when brought to its last analysis, that this Government shall depend upon a measure to be litigated in the courts, upon the net earnings, the meaning of which is to be ascertained by the courts and the amount of which can only be determined by experience. It will thus be seen that we are to be involved in a lawsuit as to the terms and provisions of the bill and afterward with the first-mortgage bondholders, and thus to involve the possibility of utter defeat in accomplishing the purpose we have in view. On the other hand we have before us a bill free from ambiguity, involving no litigation, clear in its provisions, definite as to the amount of money to be appropriated, and with a full power granted to increase that amount indefinitely if necessary to meet the payment of the bonds in question. I submit that the Senate ought not to hesitate between these two bills.

So much for the moneyed side of this question. There is another light in which we are bound to consider these bills; we cannot ignore it; we cannot refuse to consider what good faith on the part of this Government toward its citizens demands. The question is not what the contract ought to have been with these roads, but what the contract is.

I propose to exact from these railroads the last dollar due to the Government, and to exact it by the shortest and safest process compatible with our plighted faith to them and with the contracts under which they undertook to build this gigantic work. I am not wedded to any particular plan. If any gentleman here can suggest a better one, a wiser, safer, sure one, let him suggest it, and I guarantee the friends of this measure will embrace it. But let us not break faith. Let us know what the contract is, and when we know it let us stand by it. My friend, the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] said the other day that we have made a very bad contract with these roads, and stated that it had no parallel in the legislation of this or any other country. That may be true. Perhaps if I had been a member of Congress at that time, with my peculiar ideas of the powers and rights of Government, with my democratic theories, I would not have voted for such a measure. But as I was not here, as I was engaged at the time in a very different enterprise, uniting with certain States in an effort to set up a government of their own, I certainly shall not be guilty of the folly or bad taste of standing here to criticize those who did vote for it. I believe they were men whose patriotism has not been challenged, whose inteligence the whole country recognize. They did believe that so great was the public political necessity for this road at the time, that they were justified in their votes. I shall not criticize them, and whether the contract was good or bad, righteous or unrighteous, it was a contract, and for one I propose to stand to it.

The Government must not repudiate its contracts with citizens, as citizens are not permitted to refuse to perform theirs to the Government. Especially will I never consent to a breach of contract under such a bill as the one offered by the Judiciary Committee, which, I believe, should it become a law, would not only prove a blunder in business, but a crime against the good faith of the Government. What was this contract? What was its spirit? How are we to ascertain it? How would the courts ascertain it? They would do it not only by reviewing the language of the law itself, but by ascertaining its meaning through the debate had at the time of the original passage of the act and the amendments thereto. Now, what did the legislators say they meant by that act? Let me read a few extracts, and I will take the liberty of incorporating some others in my remarks.

Mr. HEREFORD. I would ask the Senator whether he has considered the effect of section 5 in the bill presented by him, as amended by the Committee on Railroads, which provides—

That each of said companies shall be entitled at any time to anticipate any or all of the semi-annual payments provided for in section 2 of this act, by the payment to the Government of the then present value of such semi-annual payments, discounted at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, but the sum so paid shall not be less than $1,000,000 at any one time.

Mr. GORDON. I considered that as simply authorizing payment of any semi-annual installment in advance.

Mr. HEREFORD. Has the Senator considered that if this section 5 becomes a part of the law and goes into effect, how much money the Government would receive from the companies?

Mr. GORDON. I am unable to say what the amount would be. There may be some objection to that section, which was introduced by the committee. If there be objection, it ought to be rejected. But let me go on with the extracts.

Mr. Wilson said, while discussing the original bill:

I give no grudging vote in giving away either money or land. I would sink $100,000,000 to build the road, and do it most cheerfully, and think I had done a great thing for my country if I could bring it about. What are seventy-five or a hundred millions in opening a railroad across the central regions of this continent, that shall connect the people of the Pacific and the Atlantic and bind them together?

On the same day this distinguished Senator, who afterward became the Vice-President of the United States, used this language:

In my judgment, we ought not to vote for the bill with the expectation or with the understanding that the money which we advance for this road is ever to come back into the Treasury of the United States. I vote for the bill with the expectation that all we get out of the road—and I think that is a great deal—will be the mail carrying and the carrying of munitions of war and such things as the Government need, and I vote for it cheerfully with that view. I do not expect any of our money back. I believe no man can examine the subject and believe that it will come back in any other way than is provided for in this bill, and that provision is for the carrying of the mails and doing certain other work for the Government.

Again, sir, Mr. Ten Eyck, of New Jersey, said:

The great object of the Pacific Railroad bill is to have a national means of communication across the continent. That is the idea which the public have entertained for years past, and the only idea—a great national measure to cement the Union—to bind with a belt of iron the Atlantic and the Pacific * * * This is the inducement which the old States have in doing what they believe will be for the benefit of the common country, to the prejudice of the Treasury, so to speak, yet the general returns may be beneficial in the long run.

I read this for the purpose of showing that in our effort to secure the Government against loss we must not lose sight of the fact that foreign and domestic capital was invested in this enterprise on the pledge, both in the contract and in the speeches of the men who made it, on the part of the Government that the payment for these bonds should only be demanded from transportation and 5 per cent. of net earnings; and therefore that it becomes us to accept a bill which secures to the Government a definite and sufficient sum, when that bill is acceptable to the companies.

One or two more extracts. Mr. Latham, then democratic Senator from California, said:

The loan of the public credit at 6 per cent. for thirty years for $65,000,000, with absolute security by lien with stipulations by sinking fund from profits for the liquidation of the principal, official reports and other authoritative data show that the average annual cost, even in times of peace, in transportation of troops, with munitions of war, subsistence, and quartermaster supplies, may be set down at $7,300,000. The interest upon the credit loan of $65,000,000 will be, annually, $3,900,000, leaving a net excess of $3,400,000 over the present cost, appealing with great force to the economy of the measure, and showing, beyond cavil or controversy, that the Government will not have a dime to pay on account of its credit nor risk a dollar by authorizing the construction of this work.

Further on in the same debate Mr. Clark, of New Hampshire, used the following language:

Whether I am right or not, I do not build the road because I think it is to be a paying road. I build it as a political necessity, to bind the country together and hold it together, and I do not care whether it is to pay or not. Here is the money of the Government to build it with. I want to hold a portion of the money until we get it through, and then let them have it all.

There are many other quotations I might make; but I will not take up the time of the Senate to read them now.

But we are told as a reason for the extraordinary provisions of the Judiciary Committee bill that these companies have made vast sums of money. About that I know nothing; but suppose they have, is that a reason for violating a contract with them? Whatever may be the truth about that, the contract binds the faith of this Government and no considerations of dollars and cents can free us from its obligations. I understand, however, that the reports of these roads show that they have paid about three annual dividends in eight or ten years. I doubt if there is a Senator on this floor who would invest his capital in a similar enterprise to-day. The object of Congress in making this contract was neither to prevent these companies from making money nor to make money itself. The object was to secure the roads. The entire debates in Congress, the declarations of the members at the time, the platforms of both political parties for years previous, all show that the purpose of the bill was to respond to the public demand for a great highway to the Pacific Ocean through which it was urged we would develop our mines, populate our wild lands, organize Territories from which mighty States should be speedily born to the Republic, open new avenues of trade to the great populous States of Asia in the East, and bring together in closer relations the widely separated people of this great country.

Mr. DAVIS. And it was necessary as a military measure for the transportation of troops, &c.

Mr. GORDON. And as my friend from West Virginia says, it was, in the estimation of those who passed this bill, a matter of immeasurable consequence to have the means of transporting to the Pacific States military stores, supplies, and troops with facility and economy.

In this connection I beg to refer Senators to the report of Hon. Jefferson Davis, the then Secretary of War, in which he shows that the cost of transportation of military stores at that time reached a figure far beyond the annual interest upon these bonds. I will not detain the Senate to read the report, but it will be found that the cost of transportation of stores and of troops prior to the war amounted to over $7,000,000 per annum, and would now, without these roads, amount to three times that sum. The Government, therefore, has saved much in these respects, and under the bill introduced by myself is absolutely protected against the possibility of loss.

But, sir, I must close, for my strength is exhausted. If I believed that the contract with these railroad companies justified the legislation proposed by the Judiciary Committee; if I believed that we were authorized under that contract to take 25 per cent. of the net earnings and define what net earnings should be, instead of 5 per cent. as contemplated in the original bill; if I believed the Supreme Court would reverse its decision as to the time this interest was due; if I believed these roads would accept the proposition and could pay this sum and still go forward protecting themselves from the clutches of these first-mortgage bondholders; if I believed that the Judiciary Committee bill did not endanger the entire sum advanced by the Government; if I could shut my eyes to the debates, to the contract itself; if, in a word, I could believe that both the credit and honor of the Government could be secured by such a bill, I should vote for it most cordially.

But, sir, not so believing, I cannot so vote. I cannot vote for that bill, because it will not be accepted by the railroad companies; because it leads to long, doubtful, expensive litigation, and jeopardizes unnecessarily every dollar of bonds advanced to these companies. Finally, I cannot vote for it because, in my judgment, it violates the pledges of the Government made to its citizens, and so long as I have the honor to hold a seat upon this floor I trust never to give a vote permitting this Government to do an act which if done by you or myself would dishonor us before our fellow-men.

Sir, we are taught that a good name is to be preferred to great riches, and the proudest character in Holy Writ, the noblest of mankind, is "he that sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not;" a man whose honor is so sensitive that he will not break a contract though observing its stipulations would bring pecuniary ruin; a man who in the observance of plighted faith cannot be purchased, is unbent by self-interest, unswerved by temptation, and unstained by dishonor. Sir, the honor of this Government ought to be as dear to us as our own; her plighted faith as the apple of our eye; not her interest first, and her good name afterward, but her interest and her honor one and inseparable.

Sir, believing that the bill introduced by myself, and reported by the Railroad Committee, saves both the money and the plighted faith of the Government, I now move it as a substitute for the bill introduced by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Electoral Count.

SPEECH OF HON. J. B. CLARK, JR.,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1877,

On the decisions of the electoral commission.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I was one of those who believed that the ballot was the sovereign power in our country. I supposed it to be the only constitutional mode of giving expression to the will of the American citizen in the election of public officers, from which there was no appeal, and to which all men, all parties, and all departments of the Government bowed a submissive obedience. We have had an election for the highest office known to our Constitution, and there can be no mistake in the fact that Mr. Tilden received a majority of all the votes cast at that election; but the republican party, through the power of its administration and corrupt and unprincipled returning boards in three Southern States, has sought to nullify that result. Distinguished republican partisans were invited to visit those States by the President for the avowed purpose of seeing a fair count, but really to see that it was fraudulently done. Troops marched and countermarched at his orders to strengthen the courage of the infamous returning boards, each one of whose names was suggestive of fraud, robbery, and corruption; and, finally, to consummate the fraud, the President, for the first time in the history of the Republic, commenced the concentration of troops and munitions of war at the capital, with the avowed purpose of inaugurating a President not elected by the people.

This was a direct assault upon that first right of the people from which all government derives its authority, and it is no wonder that the people, without respect to party, were aroused and indignant at the near prospect of so great a calamity. Civil war with its attendant horrors and the dreaded desolation that always follows in its path stared us in the face.

It was in view of this dread emergency that the electoral bill was framed and passed through both Houses by democratic votes. We trusted to the frail hope that one honest republican from one or the other Houses of Congress or the Supreme Bench would be selected who would rise above partisan hate and fairly consider our cause. In the words of Senator CONKLING, the duty of the hour was "to find the honest and true result, to declare it, bow to it, and stand by it."

We have suffered the bitter humiliation of defeat. All through the proceedings of this mock trial the octoroon commission, with the vote of eight to seven, have steadily refused to find the "honest and true result," and have in every instance reiterated the voice of these infamous returning boards as the will of the people. They have crossed and recrossed the track of their own decisions with shameless hardihood. So far as I can see, not one ray of judicial fairness shines through the diabolical partisanship of their decisions, and history will characterize them as little less infamous than the Louisiana returning board itself. No time can ameliorate their harshness, no silence can give them oblivion, and no antidote can avail to counteract the effect of their damnable partisanship.

As a distinguished democratic member of the commission expressed it, "the deed is done." The voice of the people, no longer sovereign, is hushed, and upon the dismantled ruins of a free and constitutional ballot, heretofore supposed to be the only power that could elevate a ruler over the political destinies of a free people, is erected a fabric of fraud and crime finding no parallel in the history of government.

But, Mr. Speaker, the most humiliating spectacle connected with this outrage is the supposition on the part of the republicans that the democracy, and especially the southern democracy, can be bought up by the paltry honors of office which a usurper may give. They would gladly accept justice; but can it be said that this people, who have been plundered of everything but honor, are now willing to offer this last and dearest possession to the men who have trampled all law in the dust. God forbid that we should be brought face to face with such degeneracy! The stench of corruption is even now rising from the battle we have just fought and lost. The vultures are assembling to feed in high carnival upon the carcass of a prostrate State. Let them swarm alone to feed themselves upon the spoils of this high-handed outrage on liberty; but in the name of the grand manhood of the South, which has stood out sublime amid the desolation and woe of misgovernment, the domination of ignorance and corruption, stripped of every right that should characterize free government, bound hand and foot and delivered to swell the partisan triumph, I protest that not one of these noble leaders will offer himself, a shameful and humiliating spectacle, to grace the rule of a Chief Magistrate who is imposed by fraud upon the American people. The praise that now finds ready utterance from fraud-practiced lips is to lead but to ruin and disgrace. It is the disintegration of the democratic party, the party of the Constitution and the law, the party through which we can only find deliverance from fraud and usurpation. Let it go forth now that we link our political destinies with no party that tramples upon the Constitution and the laws; and that we will grasp the hand of every honest, noble brother wherever he may be found who denounces fraud and usurpation, and we will yet teach the desperate men who have betrayed the trust reposed in their hands that no crime is so abhorrent to the liberty-loving citizens of this Republic as usurpation.

The Electoral Count.

SPEECH OF HON. A. M. BLISS,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1877,

On the decisions of the electoral commission.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Speaker, when I cast my vote for the bill creating the electoral commission I did so in good faith and perfect honesty, believing, with a great majority of my fellow-citizens, that justice would be rendered by such a commission selected from the highest grade of the people of this country. At the outset it was perfectly evident to every one that wrong and foul play had to be investigated in order to determine to what party the great prize of the Presidency belonged. But when a commission created for the sole purpose of investigating those foul wrongs refused, and refused by a partisan vote of 8 to 7 continuously, to look into the prima facie case of these wrongs, my faith in the fairness of such a tribunal became not only shaken, but in the great interest of the people I believe I am justified in denouncing their decisions.

I am well aware, sir, that my voice may be impotent to right this great wrong done to a whole nation, but the time will come, I will venture to say, when the country will sustain the good and honest motives that prompted the members who have honestly and faithfully helped create this commission, and will denounce those men who defeated the worthy object in view.

It is perfectly self-evident that trickery has been one of the elements used to accomplish this nefarious business, because if those persons who were originally on the committee which created the so-called compromise bill had faithfully believed that they could not investigate frauds and illegalities they should never have consented to bring in the bill creating the commission, and thus trick the men having honest intentions into the belief that such a measure would accomplish a fair and equitable solution of the dispute that the people so anxiously expected.

Sir, I think it the duty of a representative of the people to use all legitimate and parliamentary means at the command of this House to defeat the object of the great fraud that is now contemplated to cheat the majority of the people of this country out of their honest votes. Further, I think that the state of affairs which have been developed since the 7th day of November last, is now so well known that there is but one tribunal that ought to give the final verdict. That tribunal is the people, and by their verdict, and their verdict alone, will the country cheerfully abide.

Sir, one of England's greatest statesmen has said that you cannot bring an indictment against a whole people. This maxim has been accepted ever since it was first uttered, but you can bring an indictment against a clique who by fraud and trickery try, in violation of all law and right, to seize the reins of power against the will of the people.

In thus pronouncedly speaking my views, I simply speak the sentiments of one of the largest constituencies in the great Empire State, and I feel that I have never been more in unison with them than in this expression of their honest feelings. I am further pleased to know that, while they were as unanimous for the creation of the commission, to which I gave my cordial assent, they are now as bitterly opposed to the wrong done by that commission to them and to the whole country.

Representing, as I do in part, a portion of the commerce of this country, I feel great apprehensions for the future; as mistrust and want of confidence are sure to follow as fruits of an administration that wrongfully possesses itself with power. The instinct of the people is keen enough to perceive that one wrong is only the precursor of greater wrongs, and as the majority of the people of this country fully believe that the Presidency seized under such nefarious circumstances is only the precursor of still greater violence hereafter, they in their judgment are ready to have right and justice done.

Nor will present acquiescence give the country that stability and prosperity of trade for which it is yearning. While it might temporarily stave off some political agitation, the pernicious fruits of such action will only come back with increased violence to overwhelm the whole nation with greater calamities. It is therefore better, in my judgment, to see this great complication settled now, while the people fully understand the merits of the momentous question, than to acquiesce in an equivocal decision, which will be only acceptable to the great mass of office-holders and placemen with which the country abounds.

In conclusion, I am constrained to say that it is my honest belief that one of the great objects of keeping the administration of this country by violence in the hands of the present party is chiefly owing to the fear of revealing to the people the great mystery of a sixteen-years' continuous rule.

Electoral Vote of Louisiana.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN F. HOUSE,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 20, 1877.

On the decision of the electoral commission in the case of Louisiana.

Mr. HOUSE. Mr. Speaker, the Louisiana returning board is the most happily constructed and nicely adjusted political machine that partisan ingenuity has ever invented to control popular elections. No party in this country that hopes to win success can afford to be without one. In the hands of men possessed of sufficient skill to do justice to the genius of its inventors, it can be made to count in votes that were never given with a facility equalled only by its power to count out those that were actually cast by legal voters. It thus adds to the votes of one party while it subtracts from the strength of the other, a process which cannot fail to grind out victory for those in whose interest it is run. Its manipulations of a ballot-box eclipse in brilliant mystification any slight of hand performances with which the most expert and practiced juggler ever amazed and bewildered an audience. Blitz in witnessing it in full operation, would have hung his head in impotent shame; the dark séances of the Davenport brothers would pale their ineffectual fires before it, and the science of mathematics stand appalled at its power to count.

Many gentlemen who discussed the electoral bill when that measure was before the House, endeavored to define the meaning of the word "count" as used in the clause of the Constitution which provides for counting the electoral vote, but if they have any ambition to attack a problem that will make their heads swim, let them rise and undertake to explain what that word means in the vocabulary of the Louisiana returning board. The law which created it provides that—

In case of any vacancy, by death, resignation, or otherwise, by either of the board, then the vacancy shall be filled by the residue of returning officers.

The term of office is unlimited and the power to fill vacancies runs on and on to the end of time. It is not without beginning of days, for there was a time when it had no existence, but it may be without end of years, for when once set in motion it is endued with the power of self-propulsion ad infinitum. By its own inherent force, without the application of any outside agency whatever, it can run for a thousand years, and at the end of that period have no less days to continue its spontaneous revolutions than when it first began. When the world is trembling in the throes of dissolution, the legitimate successor of J. Madison Wells can stand out on the last crumbling fragment of time, and clasping the returning board to his heart, like Campbell's last man—

> The darkening universe defy
> To quench its immortality
> Or shake—its power to count.

Some men have spent their lives and fortunes and lost their minds in fruitless efforts to invent perpetual motion, but the scientific world now beholds the dream of centuries realized in the magnificent achievement which launched the returning board upon the sea of politics and set it afloat on the tide of human affairs.

Mr. Speaker, in matters of property and estates our law abhors a perpetuity, and pronounces absolutely null and void all testaments and conveyances that seek to create one. But here is a political perpetuity that holds the dearest rights of freemen in endless bondage, and laughs to scorn that clause in the Federal Constitution which provides that:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government.

He would be a bold man indeed who would risk his reputation by asserting that any State had a republican form of government, within whose limits such a returning board was permitted to exercise its irresponsible and omnipotent functions. There is not an element of popular liberty that does not rise to rebuke the foul intrusion, and not a man upon the American continent who values the principles of civil liberty whose arm is not lifted instinctively to strike it to the earth. It is a libel upon our people, a disgrace to the spirit of our Constitution, an insult to the memory of our fathers to intimate that such a monstrosity has anything in common with the genius of our institutions or the traditions of our history. It is the abomination of desolation standing in the holy places of the land.

The law which sought to incorporate this ally of despotism and instrument of tyrants in our system of popular government, provides expressly that the board shall be composed of five members, to be selected from all political parties. Usurpation is among the first fruits of irresponsible power. Hence, we find this board placed above and beyond the reach of the people, accountable to no earthly power, endowed with the attribute of perpetual succession, quite early in its career defying the law, which created it and from which it derives all its authority. The only compensation which the people can have for the extraordinary powers conferred upon it is to be found in that feature of the law, which imperatively requires that the members composing it shall not all be of the same political party. The object of the law in this provision was to insure as far as possible fairness in the action of the board, and impartiality and justice in its decisions. To suffer this provision to be disregarded by the board at its option, as if it were merely directory, would be to nullify the only check on corruption, the only safeguard against unscrupulous partisan bias to be found in the entire law. It would be to arm one political party with supreme and unlimited power over all others and enable it to perpetuate its ascendancy. A man who would hold this requirement of the Louisiana statute to be merely directory is prepared to hold the word "not" as directory in the commandment which says "Thou shalt not steal." The sacramental or mandatory character of this provision is so evident and obvious that no argument or illustration can add to the clearness or conclusiveness of the proposition. The shameless disregard of this all-important and imperative mandate of the law by the present members of the returning board, and their persistent refusal to fill the vacancy by the appointment of a democrat, stamp their acts in the recent pretended canvass of the vote of Louisiana as null and void. With a democratic representative upon the board to watch the proceedings, no fraud could have been committed that would not have been exposed. Common decency, common honesty, the plainest dictates of honor, of justice, and of law all demanded that the democratic party should have at least one representative to participate in a canvass which was to determine the title of Hayes or Tilden to the Presidency. With the entire machinery in the hands of four partisans of one of the candidates for the Presidency, the facility to commit fraud was wholly unimpeded.

Has Governor Hayes an honest friend in the United States who will claim that the democratic party were treated fairly in this matter? Has he a decent friend in all the land, who, connecting the action of the returning board at that time with what has since transpired, will not admit that the canvass of the vote of Louisiana is tainted with a suspicion of fraud that beclouds the title of Mr. Hayes to the Presidency. Who is responsible for causing the vote of Louisiana to be counted by a board consisting of only four members, all republicans, the president of the board, and confessedly its ruling spirit, being an imbittered partisan, holding a Federal office with a salary of about $4,000 per annum, with a claim against the Government of several hundred thousand dollars, and his son holding an office also with a salary of $2,500? Does any sane man believe that this whole wretched business of counting Louisiana for Hayes was the spontaneous action of Wells and company, unprompted and uninspired by leading men in the republican party who make pretensions to respectability, but who if justice were meted out to them, would to-day stand on a level in public estimation with the men behind whose acts their crimes are concealed. That celebrated board was not altogether unknown to fame, or rather to infamy, before they were called upon to count the vote between Hayes and Tilden. Distinguished members of the republican party, at a time when no glittering presidential prize warped their judgments or silenced the voice of conscience, had spoken of this board in terms not calculated to commend it to the favorable consideration of the American people.

A crisis had come in the fortunes of the republican party, when every man was expected to do his duty to save it from dissolution and the patronage of the Government from passing into other hands. That victorious party that had lorded it over this country as no party had ever dared to do before, that claimed that they had saved the country, and it, therefore, belonged to them by right of conquest; that had ignored nearly every provision of the Constitution, except the amendments incorporated therein by themselves; that had crushed States of the American Union as egg shells beneath the iron heel of military power; this great party at last felt the scepter slipping from its grasp and the control of the Government insecure in its possession. Before the great political tornado of 1874, their splendid two-thirds majority in Congress went down, and in the popular branch of the National Legislature an appalling democratic majority confronted them. The leaders of the party saw in the last presidential election that it would never do to risk its fate to the calm and unimpassioned judgment of the people upon its merits. The bloody shirt, at an early day, was unfurled as the only ensign under which they could hope to conquer. The skeletons of the war were all dug up, and placed on exhibition to inflame and frighten the northern masses. Itinerant defamers of the South strode the stage from East to West. Every appeal that could arouse the dying passions of the great struggle; every slander of the motives and purposes of the southern people that could catch a vote; every misrepresentation that would pay, all were brought into requisition to hide the record of the party and save it from defeat. The changes were rung on a solid South from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean. The rebel democracy were represented as about to get control of the Government and murder all the negroes, and an army of southern claimants was portrayed as preparing to march on the Capitol with claims against the Government amounting to so many millions that many an honest republican tax-payer of the North, unaware of the game which the press and speakers of his party were playing, lost long and weary hours in anxious thought which ought to have been given to refreshing sleep.

The distinguished gentleman from Maine having, contrary to the opinion of his physicians, recovered sufficiently from his severe sunstroke in Washington, to take the field, mounted every stump in his way, and made the welkin ring with the slogan of a solid South and southern claims. He spoke of the southern members upon this floor as a set of fellows or rascals—I do not remember which term he used—who walked into this Capitol and hung up their hats with as much impudence as if they had a right to be here. This was regarded by his loyal listners as a good hit, and was received by them with great laughter and applause. It was certainly a truthful illustration of the broad and patriotic spirit which animated the campaign on the republican side. One thought consoles me under the gentleman's sarcasm. No southern member has ever hung a hat up in this Capitol that was purchased with the proceeds of railroad bonds or money made from a speculation in Henry rifles while he was a member of Congress. When that distinguished gentleman shall demand of the Judiciary Committee of this House that the investigation, adjourned at the last session of Congress shall proceed, he will then be at liberty to turn up his celestial nose at other men, but not till then.

Even the distinguished candidate of the republican party for Vice-President, Mr. Wheeler, while addressing an uninformed audience away up in the mountains of Vermont, in his zeal to save himself and his party from defeat, so forgot what was due to simple justice, as to say that he had sat in his seat in this Chamber and heard Abraham Lincoln maligned by rebel Congressmen. I state here to-day what no man can deny, when I say, that Mr. Wheeler never heard the name of Abraham Lincoln pronounced by a southern member of this Congress, save in terms of the utmost respect. I allude to these incidents of the presidential campaign as illustrative of the determination of the republican party to leave no stone unturned, no appliance untried to win the election, and of their undying repugnance to relaxing their grasp upon the power and patronage of the Government. But, notwithstanding all, when the battle was over they found themselves vanquished in the open field, their candidate was fairly defeated, and Samuel J. Tilden was as truly elected President of the United States as any of the distinguished men who have ever occupied the position. By a popular majority of a quarter of a million the American people had pronounced against Hayes and Wheeler. There was weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth in the ranks of the party of great moral ideas when this result was known. To perpetuate their power they had conferred the right of suffrage upon the colored man, with perfect indifference to any ill effects it might have upon the prosperity and welfare of the South, or rather with a grim satisfaction that it was a punishment to rebels while it swelled the ranks of their party. But in making the negro a voter they added about twenty members of Congress from the Southern States. The late election disclosed the terrific fact that the colored men were beginning to leave their party and affiliate with the democrats. The thought that the South should get twenty members of Congress, and the colored vote, too, made the leaders frantic. I can very well see that this result was not calculated to make them happy. But the sun of heaven in all his rounds never looked down upon a more beautiful and righteous illustration of retributive justice. I know that many republicans indulge the blissful thought that it is as impossible for the Ethiopian to change his vote as his skin, but candor compels me to serve notice on all such that with the disappearance of carpet-bag rule in the South, which I am proud to say is growing small by degrees and beautifully less, the colored vote will be lost to the republican party and their heirs forever, and the solid South will bear the infliction of negro suffrage and twenty additional members of Congress with that inimitable grace and Christian resignation so characteristic of her people.

Abandoned and condemned by the people, their hated antagonist placed in control of the Government by an overwhelming popular majority, the leaders of that routed and ruined party looked from the field of defeat upon as gloomy a prospect as ever darkened the future of a discomfited host. Like Satan, when expelled from the court of heaven, those leaders called a council of war to see

> What re-enforcement could be gained from hope;
> If not, what courage from despair.

In their dire extremity the returning board of Louisiana was the loveliest port that offered a refuge from the storm, the brightest star that shed its welcome rays upon the horrible night of disaster that was settling down upon them. They took the President into their counsels and upon bended knees implored him to save the party. The President was altogether agreeable. He said to them, "The Army of the United States is at your service now, as it has been throughout the campaign. Wherever the exigencies of the party seemed to demand it I have sent troops, regardless of expense and in defiance of democratic howls over a violated Constitution. I caused the venerable legal luminary, that rises and sets in the Department of Justice to strain the timbers of the law until they cracked (and it is not the first time they have cracked under his strain) in order that an army of deputy United States marshals might assist the soldiers in seeing to it that the colored voters did their duty on the day of election. But some how or another the infernal democrats have dodged the bayonets of the soldiers, eluded the argus-eyes of the army of deputy marshals, and in spite of the whole power of the Government brought to bear to prevent it, they captured a good many colored voters." They told the President they knew what he said was true, every word of it, but the party was in a condition now even beyond the power of troops and deputy marshals to save it. In great anguish of spirit they cried out with one voice, "Votes, votes is what we want; we are perishing and going to our long homes for the want of votes."

To what other refuge could a party in such a predicament turn their dying eyes with more hope than to the returning board of Louisiana. They knew the board was equal to the emergency; they had witnessed its power to count, tested on other occasions, when it had entered the field against full ballot-boxes and come off triumphant over all the ballots that were arrayed against it. But this achievement was witnessed in the distant rebel province of Louisiana, and nobody cared particularly about what the board did in that heathen land, so far away from God's country. But still there was an impression on the northern mind, derived from the report of WHEELER and HOAR, made before the former became a candidate for the Vice-Presidency and the latter a member of the high joint commission, that the returning board was no better than it should be. Counting the loyal carpet-bagger in, and the rebel out, in that obscure corner of the Union had never destroyed the happiness of the great and powerful North, but counting a republican President in and a democratic President out was a proceeding that somebody else had an interest in besides the poor tax-ridden, down-trodden people of Louisiana, and these leaders were not fully satisfied as to how the country would bear it. The board must be fumigated, the offensive odors that floated around it dispelled, in order that the work it was about to be called upon to do on a national theater, might not stink in the nostrils of the people. If the returning board was not respectable itself, somebody that was, must be found to indorse it. It was a brave undertaking for a respectable man to stand up before the world and give that board a good character, for a statesman who had a future before him to lock arms with J. Madison Wells and consent to walk down the corridors of history in his company. But it was stated in the council and agreed to by all that the greater the sacrifice, the more those who made it would endear themselves to the party—the heavier the cross, the brighter the crown. As is usual in all desperate enterprises, volunteers were called for. Eleven bold men stepped out and said they were ready to be offered up; and immediately, amid the warm congratulations of the conclave, they were commissioned by the President as envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to the court of J. Madison Wells, to represent the republican party and witness an honest count.

To those distinguished embassadors I propose to pay my respects, and in justice to them to demand a fair count in that award of honors and responsibility which history is destined to make between the embassy and the board.

In the first place I assume that those gentlemen who went to New Orleans had some object in view—they expected to accomplish something. Their visit was not a mere pleasure trip, nor their mission aimless and purposeless. They say they went at the request of the President to witness a canvass of the votes by the returning board. Why should they wish or the President desire them to witness the count? Why did he not send them to Ohio, or Indiana, or Kentucky, or Tennessee, to oversee the officers of those States in counting the votes? Did the President suspect and those gentlemen believe that the returning board of Louisiana had a work to perform in counting that State for Hayes of a character that would require the influence of other names to make it go down with the people? Or was the general reputation of the board so notoriously bad that honest men of no party could be expected to give faith and credit to their official certificates? Distinguished men do not leave their homes and business and travel a thousand miles simply to put their fingers in their mouths and gaze in stupid silence upon four honest men count the vote of a State—a matter with which, as they say themselves, they had so little right to intermeddle that they declined to meet distinguished democrats, who were there from abroad, in a friendly conference to discuss a plan by which the vote could be counted in a manner that would commend the conclusions of the board to the confidence and respect of the whole country. The punctilious and chivalrous abstinence on the part of the embassadors from even the appearance of having anything in the world to do with the proceedings of the board is one of those secrets of diplomatic etiquette which the common mind is unable to grasp, and is, therefore, not expected to comprehend. That they went to New Orleans for the purpose of giving that returning board a certificate of good character, and thus preparing the minds of the honest masses of their party at the North to accept the foreordained and predestinated canvass of the vote of Louisiana for Hayes and Wheeler, is very nearly confessed in the following words of their report to the President:

> The great national importance of the duties to be performed by the board invested each member with much interest; and, as many reports had been circulated concerning them, we were led to make some inquiry as to their individual history.

What those "reports" were, whether good or bad is left to conjecture—whether the report of WHEELER and HOAR made to Congress, and the report of General Sheridan to President Grant in reference to Wells, are referred to, must remain a mystery. But, be this as it may, WHEELER, HOAR, and Sheridan to the contrary, notwithstanding, the embassadors, or the result of their inquiries into the individual characters of the members of the board, give each one a certificate, recommending him to the confidence of the American people. I have already adverted to the power of the board to perpetuate itself forever and to the fact that they are responsible to no earthly power for anything they may do. The extent to which this board is authorized by law to exercise supreme power may be seen in the language of the report:

> Not only is the action of this board independent of the State or national laws, other than those of Louisiana, but its determination of the votes cast is final and substantially conclusive, as appears from a decision of the supreme court of that State, reported in the twenty-fifth volume of the Louisiana Annual Reports.

According to this, no appeal lies from any decision the board may make, nor can any court revise or reverse any of its decisions. The powers of the board over elections is also spoken of in this report, and the board is represented as "having supreme authority to canvass the votes cast throughout the entire State, and authorized, if convinced that riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences had prevented voters from registering, or had materially interfered with the purity or freedom of election at any poll or voting-place, or had materially changed the result of the election, to exclude votes cast at such polls or voting-places from the final count." The fact that whole parishes have been disfranchised under this broad and sweeping power and that in its exercise the returning board has controlled the elections in Louisiana to keep the republican party in power is a fact too notorious to be denied and too nefarious to be defended by any man raised under a republican government and accustomed to breathe the air of a free country.

A tribunal thus endowed with the attribute of perpetual succession, placed above the reach of the popular will and beyond the jurisdiction of any court to annul its decrees, however erroneous or corrupt; clothed with supreme authority to canvass the votes of the people throughout the entire State and to disfranchise its citizens ad libitum, would seem to be absolute enough to disgust every friend of republican government and to satisfy the most zealous advocates of despotism. Very few prominent republicans hitherto have been found so recreant to the principles of civil liberty and the rights of man which pervade the institutions of our country as blood permeates the human body, so indifferent to the opinions of their countrymen, now and hereafter, as to defend the constitution and powers of the Louisiana returning board. It was reserved for the immortal eleven envoys extraordinary, who wear, without a rival, the conspicuous honor of having woven the first garland that adorns the brows of J. Madison Wells & Co., not only to approve most heartily and to defend most zealously the unprecedented powers conferred by the statute of Louisiana upon this board, but to lift their voices in lamentation over the fact that the law did not clothe this despotic tribunal with a still more extended jurisdiction. That it may be seen that I do these chosen vessels of the President and heroic champions of the returning board no injustice, I beg leave to again quote some extracts from their report. They say:

> It will be seen when the statute organizing this board and defining its duties is examined, how inadequate are its provisions to afford full relief against the wrongs it was designed to prevent. Thus, the powers of the board are limited to the rejection of votes polled, for the causes stated, while it cannot in any case add to the returns votes which would have been polled but for the intimidation, violence, &c., mentioned.

And in speaking of the power of the board to disfranchise the people, they further say:

> Nothing can be more simple, nothing more just, than these provisions. They are for the reason before stated inadequate to secure the administration of a complete remedy, for it may be fairly said that if by reason of violence and intimidation committed in the interest of one political party, the adherents of another are restrained from voting, an equitable remedy, if practicable, for the outrage, would be to count in favor of the injured party every vote thus lost.

Here we not only have the power of an absolute and irresponsible tribunal to disfranchise whole communities of innocent men, without a trial characterized by these gentlemen as a thing so proper in itself that "nothing could be more just," but they openly announce that it should be clothed with the additional power of counting votes that were never cast; the only drawback to conferring such a power being, in their opinion, the difficulty that might attend an ascertainment of the facts. But the lamentations of these political Jeremiahs over the inadequate powers which the statute had conferred on the returning board must have received great solace from the action of the board in exercising the right to count unvoted ballots and thus supplying the defects of the law. Whether the suggestions of those gentlemen that the law ought to have given the board power to count votes that were never cast had any influence on the action of the board in this particular, I am unable to say. But when these special friends of the President and distinguished representatives of the republican party thought such a provision ought to be in the law, Wells could not regard it as anything more than a pious fraud to count as though such a provision was in the statute.

But this extraordinary report, which seems to have been thought a matter of such general interest and national importance as to warrant the President of the United States in transmitting it to Congress in a special message, is as remakable for what it omits to disclose as for what it proclaims; as reprehensible for what it suppresses as for what it suggests. Why the President should have thought it incumbent on him to send to Congress in a special message the biographies, the pedigree, and performances of J. Madison Wells, Thomas C. Anderson, Kenner, and Casanave, by JOHN SHERMAN, JAMES A. GARFIELD, and others, especially as the sketches are not accompanied with the photographs of the distinguished subjects; or why he should have supposed that Congress would have any doubt as to what SHERMAN, GARFIELD and company would think of the count in Louisiana, when that count gave the State to Hayes, must be classed among those presidential eccentricities that baffle conjecture and defy comprehension. But as he was kind enough to send us the message, let us be thankful and make the most of it.

I have already noticed that provision of the statute requiring the board to be composed of five members, to be selected from both political parties, and adverted to the fact that, although the law imperatively demanded that the four republican members of the board should fill the vacancy with a democrat they persistently refused to do so. Here was laid the foundation of that fraud whose immediate effect is to give the State of Louisiana to Hayes and Wheeler, but whose ultimate influence upon the fortunes of the republican party and the fate of the country, may be a source of lasting regret to those who now gladly and eagerly appropriate the fruits of that fraud, and may form a "sorrow's crown of sorrow" in the future to every patriot in the land. Why were the republican masses of the North not told by those gentlemen in their report, that when they got to New Orleans, they found a vacancy in the returning board which the law imperatively demanded the remaining members of the board to fill; that the board consisted of only four members, all the partisan friends of Governor Hayes; that the law required the board to consist of five members to be selected from all political parties; that the friends of Mr. Tilden demanded of the board that the vacancy should be filled with a democrat; that this demand, so strictly in accordance with the statute from which the board derived its powers, and so evidently required by justice and fair dealing, was persistently disregarded by the board; and the vote of Louisiana was canvassed by an incomplete board, on which Samuel J. Tilden was not allowed even one friend to guard his interest and participate in the canvass of the vote. Why were these damaging facts suppressed in this report, facts well calculated to create distrust of the fairness and honesty of that board in the mind of every honorable and disinterested republican in all the land. Concealing this outrage on law, on justice, fair dealing and decency by the returning board, those gentlemen return from New Orleans proclaiming in a loud voice the charming manner in which the vote was counted. They place the fairness and open honesty of that board, in their report, above all the tribunals of ancient and modern times, and the loyal masses of the North are given to understand that it is their religious duty to place implicit confidence in its action and decisions.

Mr. Speaker, the freedom from bias and the impartiality of any tribunal whose decisions invoke public confidence is a matter too important to be overlooked by intelligent men who had taken the trouble to travel a thousand miles that they might be able to bear witness to the fairness of its action. A democratic representative upon that board was too important an element in its credentials to public confidence for those gentlemen to have overlooked or been indifferent to it. They knew full well that the testimony of one democratic member upon that board to the fairness of the count would be worth all the biographies of Wells and Anderson, all the panegyrics upon their honesty which they could write in a thousand years. They could not, therefore, avoid feeling a profound interest in the question which was raised right before their eyes and right under their noses as to whether that vacancy should be filled by putting a democrat on the board. I therefore assume and charge that the persistent refusal of Wells and company to appoint a democrat on the board met with the approval or disapproval of those distinguished republican visitors. If they approved the conduct of the board in this particular they are particepes criminis with Wells and Anderson in every fraud committed by them, and deserve to take their places in public estimation along with them; if they disapproved it, then it was their duty as fair and honorable men, instead of writing fulsome eulogies upon the members of that board, to hold them up to the scorn of the world for the criminal indecency of violating the law in order that no democrat might be present to watch the count of the vote. They can select that horn of the dilemma on which they prefer to be impaled.

Suppose they had said to Wells and Anderson, "Gentlemen, we have come here at the request of President Grant to witness your proceedings, that we may testify to the country of your fairness and honesty in counting the vote of Louisiana. The President says truly that no man can afford to accept the exalted position of President of the United States whose title is tainted with the suspicion of fraud. The law under which you act is plain and unambiguous. It says that you shall fill a vacancy when one occurs, and that the other party shall be represented on the board. There is no chance for evasion or misunderstanding here. The democrats are here present urging you to fill that vacancy with one of their own number. If you refuse, how can we as honorable men, and without compromising ourselves before the country, certify to your fairness and honesty? It is not right, it is not fair, it is not proper that Mr. Tilden should have no friend of his upon the board. And if you, known to be partisan friends of Mr. Hayes, persist in taking this whole canvass into your own hands, how can his title to the Presidency escape the suspicion of fraud under such circumstances? And we beg of you to consider in what a predicament you place us. We are here on the ground. The whole country knows it. You are republicans; so are we. How can we hope to escape the suspicion, ay, the belief that will arise in the public mind that your refusal to fill that vacancy meets with our approval, if not inspired by us. You are expected to confer with us, and we with you, all of us being of the same party and jointly and equally interested in guarding the title of Rutherford B. Hayes from the suspicion of fraud. Any attempt to hold out to the public the idea that you and we treated each other as strangers, being deterred by a sublime sense of propriety from conferring freely with each other in this, the greatest crisis that our party has ever known, is so exceeding transparent that it will be an insult to any man's sagacity to ask him to believe it. We cannot possibly escape responsibility if you refuse to fill that vacancy."

Suppose they had said this, or anything like it to Wells, is there a sane man in the world who does not know that that vacancy would have been filled in an hour? Ay, sir, a mere hint or suggestion from those gentlemen to the members of the board would have resulted in the instant filling of that vacancy with a democrat. Failing to get the vacancy filled with one of their own number, the democrats then requested the board to give them one representative upon the clerical force of the board. This was likewise denied them; not even a democratic clerk was allowed to mar by his intrusive presence the beauty and harmony of that supremely honest process by which Louisiana was to be counted for Hayes. Here let me pause and point the American people to a scene which I trust some historical painter will some day transfer to the immortal canvass for the benefit of posterity. Upon one side sit the four members of the returning board, assembled for the purpose of commencing the count. Before them stand the representatives of the democratic party asking that the vacancy be filled, and that in this grave national matter Mr. Tilden may have one friend to watch his interest and see justice done him. Behind the board, during this scene, stand the eleven embassadors who went all the way to New Orleans to witness an honest count, and specially charged with the high duty of seeing that nothing is done or left undone that will taint the title of Rutherford B. Hayes with the suspicion of fraud. The request of the democrats is denied! The law cried "shame;" decency hid her face; honor left the hall, and common honesty plumed her wings for an everlasting flight! But there stood the eleven embassadors at the back of the board; not a little finger is lifted to prevent the outrage, and on their placid faces no blush of shame or frown of disapproval can be traced by the keenest vision. Thus auspiciously begins the count which is to conclude with giving Hayes a title untainted with fraud.

And after the work, thus conceived in fraud, is born in iniquity, the embassadors turn their beaming faces toward Washington, swinging high their censers from which curled the smoke of incense to the returning board, which was expected to perfume the Capitol and the country. Let them sing the praises of a board whose genius was equal to the task of causing 10,000 Tilden votes to melt away and of bringing Hayes out victorious in a State where he was defeated by between seven and eight thousand majority. But let it be proclaimed in the hearing of all honest men of all parties, from the lakes to the Gulf and from ocean to ocean, that no democratic eye was allowed to scan the proceedings in the secret sessions of the board when this astounding result was produced! When the assassin prepares for his bloody work he takes care that no one shall be present to witness the deed; when the thief prepares to steal, he seeks the cover of night that no eye may detect his crime; when the returning board of Louisiana determine to give that State to Hayes and Wheeler, no friend of Tilden is allowed to be present to witness the count or participate in the proceedings. Let the honest masses of this country never be allowed to forget that eleven chosen friends of Rutherford B. Hayes stood by without a protest and without a blush and saw the jugglers enter their den and bar the door to the entrance of a democrat.

I am fully aware of the fact that those distinguished visitors in their report parade the fact that the board threw open their doors sua sponte and invited five republicans and five democrats to witness their proceedings. This was intended to produce the impression upon the public mind that nothing was done in a corner, and that everything that was done by the board was witnessed by the five distinguished democrats who were invited to be present at the public sessions of the board. Every one acquainted with the facts knows this to be untrue. In their public sessions they merely opened the packages, read off the total vote from the consolidated statements, and but a hasty examination was made of the returns. In their secret sessions the returns were finally canvassed, or compiled, or passed upon by the board, and no democrat was allowed to be present then. The judgments then rendered, the conclusions then reached, and the reasons therefor, still remain an undeveloped mystery. It was never intended that what took place in those secret sessions should be made known.

The committee of this House that went to Louisiana to investigate the late election called the members of the returning board before them and asked for the production of the original record of these proceedings. The board refused to produce them even for a short time that the committee might inspect them, giving as a reason that they were engaged in making their report to the Legislature. They were reported to this House as being in contempt and were arrested and brought to Washington. They still refused to produce the papers, giving as a reason that after they finished their report to the Legislature they returned the papers to the proper custodian provided by law to keep them, and it was out of their power to produce them; in all which quibbling and evasion and contumacy they have received the countenance and sympathy of their republican friends at this Capitol, and to-day they are regarded by their party friends upon this floor as blessed martyrs, suffering for their devotion to the party. And when at last the case of Louisiana reached the high tribunal created by Congress to try these grave questions, the democrats there proposed to unmask the iniquity of the board and to show the violations of law and outrage upon justice by which the voice of Louisiana had been stifled and silenced by this board, and a majority of that tribunal held that although every step taken by that board might be stained with fraud; although they may have manufactured votes that were never cast and illegally refused to count those that were, and thus substituted their own voice for that of the people of Louisiana, their acts should not be investigated and their fraud should not be exposed.

Following this whole sickening affair from the time the infamy began in New Orleans in the presence of eleven chosen friends of Hayes to its culmination in the decision of eight of his political friends on the high tribunal, and the country will behold the title by which he proposes to occupy the highest office in the world. The four men who in utter defiance of the law refused to fill that vacancy are all republicans. The eleven men who stood by and witnessed the outrage without a protest and afterward eulogized the men who committed it are all republicans. Those who here stood by the board and defended them in their refusal to obey the orders of this House and disclose their acts in secret session are all republicans. The eight men who shielded that board by their decision are all republicans. The party that gathers the fruit of all this fraud is the republican party; and the two men who shall take their seats, the one as President and the other as Vice-President, on this title are both republicans.

Mr. Speaker, as much as I desire the inauguration of Tilden and Hendricks, if to-day I had it in my power to pass them into office on such a title I would not do it; and I trust the day will never come in the history of the democratic party when its leaders and members shall be called on to hang their heads in shame over such a victory. The plan was deliberately laid at New Orleans to suppress the truth, that fraud might triumph. The members of the returning board have persistently refused to disclose their action in secret session, that the truth might not see the light. The ablest lawyers in the republican party have been summoned to Washington to exhaust all the ingenuity, eloquence, and learning that could be brought to bear to furnish the eight partisan friends of Mr. Hayes on the commission with a decent pretext, if possible, for smothering investigation and keeping the tricks and chicanery of dishonest men out of sight. Has the history of the world ever furnished an instance where men who had truth and justice on their side made such Herculean efforts to suppress the plain facts in the case, and where those who believed they were right were willing to pass through such a crucifixion of the soul to accomplish their ends? No, sir; the judgment of the country and the verdict of posterity may be summed up in the language of Holy Writ: "They preferred darkness to light, because their deeds were evil."

Hereafter let no thoughtless and unreasonable democrat twit the victorious party with their admiration of the returning board or their fondness for Wells. Whenever the republican party shall cease to stand by J. Madison Wells, its right hand ought to forget its cunning and its tongue cleave to the roof of its mouth. The achievements of the board over which he presided with such distinguished honor will live in history as shining illustrations of the beauties of reconstruction, and form the brightest page in the volume which shall record the glories of the republican party. Sir, it would take the arithmetical powers of the returning board itself to accurately compute the debt which the republican party owes to J. Madison Wells. Let them honor him while he lives, and put brass and marble under tribute when he dies to perpetuate his memory to the generations of the faithful that are to come after him. Ay, sir, the party whose defeat was changed to victory by his prowess ought to give him a niche in its great heart next to the sanctuary which enshrines the image of its patron saint, old John Brown. The position of the republican party before the country to-day, and its pretentions and attitude only a few brief months ago, must be a source of shame and humiliation to those who have been proud of its history and have been accustomed to boast of its achievements. It has been wont to claim all the virtue, all the intellect, all the culture, all the decency, all the morality, and all the patriotism in the land. To-day, with the brand of popular condemnation burning on its brow like the mark of Cain, it crouches and trembles and retreats for safety behind the coat-tails of J. Madison Wells and the petticoats of Eliza Pinkston. How are the mighty fallen, and the shield of the mighty vilely cast away! In a few days in all probability Rutherford B. Hayes will be inaugurated President of the United States. It will not look well in the eyes of foreign nations for the man who made him President to linger as a prisoner in this Capitol. Fling wide his prison doors and let the Warwick of the republican party rush to the arms that are eager to embrace him, and hasten to that soft place which awaits him in the bosom of an administration which he, and not the voice of the people, has given to the country.

A word or two, Mr. Speaker, in reference to the electoral bill before I close my remarks. I voted for that bill because it promised the only chance for the inauguration of Samuel J. Tilden and the triumph of the right. I knew, the whole country knew that he had been fairly and constitutionally elected. But in the opinion of every democrat, both North and South, in the Senate and the House, with the exception of one in the former and eighteen in the latter branch of Congress, he stood no chance to be inaugurated. I have a right to so assume, because no democrat would have voted for the bill if Mr. Tilden could have secured his constitutional rights without it; and if the one democrat in the Senate and the eighteen in the House who voted against the bill ever suggested any feasible method by which, in the face of existing facts and surrounding circumstances, Mr. Tilden could have been inaugurated, I never heard it.

So far as reaching the presidential chair was concerned, Mr. Tilden was dead and buried before this electoral bill was brought forward; it was the trumpet sounded above the grave in the hope of a resurrection. As to how he lost his chances, by what process one fairly elected by the votes of the people was sent to the rear and a usurper brought to the front, I have an opinion, but care not to express it here and now. I was fully aware when I voted for this bill how largely its popularity might depend on its success in seating Mr. Tilden; but conscientiously surveying the whole ground with the lights before me and believing it to be the best and, in fact, the only thing that could then be done to subserve the interest of my constituents and the country, I gave the measure my support, ignoring the unimportant consideration of its effect upon my political fortunes. I was neither deceived, betrayed, nor entrapped by anyone into voting for this bill. I understood its provisions, exercised my best judgment in the premises, and propose to dodge no responsibility which legitimately belongs to my action. If I erred, I erred with an overwhelming majority of the democratic Representatives, North and South, in both Houses of Congress; I erred with the democratic press of the country, which, with a unanimity akin to that which signalized its passage by Congress, sustained the measure.

In common with a large majority of the American people, I was disappointed and shocked at the course of the majority of the commission. How could any human being with faith even as large as a mustard-seed in the honor of his race suppose that men who wore the robes of supreme judges could get their own consent to go down to history with the damnation of such decisions as they made clinging like an endless curse to their names? When the partisan shout now sent up by men eager to gather the fruits of the fraud established by their rulings shall have died away; when the passions which now inflame the hearts and becloud the judgments of men shall have subsided, and the acts of those eight members of the high joint commission shall be read in the clear, unwavering light of history, the verdict of posterity upon their conduct will be far more terrible than even the withering curse which a betrayed and injured people now pronounce against them.

A harvest of scorn to-day; infamy in reversion.

The Electoral Vote.

SPEECH OF HON. JESSE J. FINLEY,

OF FLORIDA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1877,

On the decisions of the electoral commission.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, when the two Houses of Congress were convened in December last, the people demanded that they should devise some method and enact some law whereby the electoral vote might be counted and the result declared, so that the popular will, as expressed on the 7th of November, should be fairly ascertained, and the integrity of the ballot preserved. To this important task Congress addressed itself with anxious earnestness, and after much thought and labor the electoral bill was framed and matured into a law, with the support and sanction of a large majority in both Houses.

The clear and unquestioned intention of the makers of this law was to ascertain which of the two Presidential candidates had received an honest majority in any and all of the disputed States. This was what the people demanded, and what the electoral bill was intended to secure. The method created by the act was set in motion on the 1st day of February, since which time the disputed States of Florida, Louisiana, and Oregon have been acted on by the electoral commission, and by the decision of a majority thereof the electoral votes of said States have been counted for Rutherford B. Hayes for President, and William A. Wheeler for Vice-President of the United States. This decision has taken the country by surprise, and the people everywhere are demanding to know how the commission reached such a conclusion.

If by a fair investigation of the fact as to which of the two candidates for the Presidency was honestly elected, the people will be satisfied, and will acquiesce in the decision. But if on the contrary the investigation stopped short of that, they will not be satisfied, and will not and cannot acquiesce in the determination.

So far from deciding on the merits of the question as to who was chosen by the people to be their President, the majority of the commission solemnly resolved that they would not inquire into the facts at all; and the people, surprised, astounded, and appalled, are called upon to witness the melancholy spectacle of fraud and falsehood through the simulated forms of law triumphing over honesty and truth. Europe may and doubtless will secretly rejoice at our humiliation; and the conspirators may and doubtless do inwardly exult at their seeming success in destroying the purity of the ballot; but I tell them now that history has already laid its inexorable hand upon them, the men who have wrought this execrable wickedness, and will hold them up to the scorn and contempt of posterity for having remorselessly strangled the very life and spirit of popular government with a miserable technicality.

The majority of the commission so far from preserving have falsified the ballot. This is the crime which they have committed against republican government. This is the outrage they have ruthlessly perpetrated upon our sacred institutions. This is the daring deed which they have done, in the name of the law which they have violated, and which should and will draw down upon them the bitter anathemas of an injured and insulted people. They have violated the clear intent of the law, and this is made so manifest by their contradictory rulings that no explanation which can be given can ever let them down from the gibbet of public condemnation upon which they are already suspended.

It will be remembered by all who now hear me, that during the late war between the States occasions did arise when the exercise of extra-constitutional power by the Government was deemed necessary to preserve the "life of the nation," but here we find the majority of this commission refusing to execute the plain intention of a law expressly enacted to save the life of the Government. In our system the ballot is the fountain of all political power. If you pollute it with falsehood and fraud you poison every stream that flows from it. Will the people drink of these poisoned waters and die? What remains to them if the purity of the ballot be destroyed? Corrupt the ballot and your Government is a mockery and a lie!

In the present emergency the great questions of the hour are how can the consummation of this monstrous crime be prevented? and can it be prevented by legal and peaceful methods? I have thought long and anxiously upon this subject, and my conclusion is, that if a President in this country shall be inducted into office through falsehood and fraud it will demonstrate the utter failure of our experiment in government. We are now threatened with this great calamity, and every thoughtful man in the Republic is to-day asking himself what is best to be done to avert it. In my judgment, this House alone, in this moment of peril, has the power to prevent the fearful evil of a fraudulent succession to the Presidency, but we should carefully avoid hasty and inconsiderate action. It would be both unwise and unsafe to commit ourselves to any plan without first thoughtfully considering the consequences which are likely to result therefrom. If this House shall prevent the declaration of the result of the presidential election until the 4th of March, what will follow under the law as it now stands? For an answer to this question we must look to the act of Congress of March 1, 1792. That act provides (sec. 147, Revised Statutes of the United States) that—

> Whenever the offices of President and Vice-President both become vacant, the Secretary of State shall forthwith cause a notification thereof to be made to the Executive of every State, and shall also cause the same to be published in at least one of the newspapers printed in each State.

And by section 148, it is provided that—

> The notification shall specify that electors of a President and Vice-President of the United States shall be appointed or chosen in the several States as follows: First. If there shall be the space of two months yet to ensue between the date of such notification and the first Wednesday in December then next ensuing, such notification shall specify that the electors shall be appointed or chosen within thirty-four days preceding such first Wednesday in December.

Now, if before the expiration of the official term of the present incumbent of the presidential office, it shall not be legally declared who is elected as his successor, then after the 4th of March the offices of President and Vice-President would both become vacant in the meaning of the act of 1792, and it would become the duty of the Secretary of State to cause the notification thereof to be made to the executive of every State, in order that an election may be had as provided in the act.

A vacancy thus occurring in both the presidential and vice-presidential offices, the question arises as to who will be authorized to exercise the offices and functions of President of the United States until a new election is had and a new President is inaugurated? The Constitution does not provide for this contingency; nor does any act of Congress provide for it. The act of March 1, 1792, (section 146 Revised Statutes of the United States,) only provides that in the event of a vacancy in both these offices by removal, death, resignation, or inability, the President of the Senate, or if there is none, then the Speaker of the House of Representatives for the time being shall act as President. Now as no vacancy in the present case is likely to occur either by removal, death, resignation, or inability, it follows that a vacancy occasioned by the expiration of the term of the present incumbent is not provided for, and an interregnum must ensue unless the two Houses of Congress, with the approval of the President, shall before the 4th of March enact a law which shall provide for the contingency named. If this House should pass such a bill, would the Senate concur, and would the President approve? No one can tell with certainty what the action of either would be in such an emergency. I can only say that in that case the responsibility of saving the Government from disorder and confusion would be devolved upon them; and it is to be confidently hoped that they would have too much patriotism to shrink from the performance of their duty to the people.

But it may be asked if this House will be justified in bringing about this contingency? I answer that it is the duty of every branch of the Government and of every individual member of the same to come to the rescue of our institutions in their present peril. This House in preventing the consummation of the daring fraud which is attempted, a fraud which if accomplished will sap the very foundation of our Government, will but perform a plain and imperative duty to the country, the omission of which can admit of no excuse, and for which posterity will hold them responsible.

The people no longer sleep; the people are awake. They behold with indignation the attempt which is being made to forestall the popular will. They know that the vote of Florida was against the man for whom the commission has counted it. They know that a democratic majority of 10,000 in Louisiana was changed by falsehood and fraud into a republican majority of 3,000. They know that in Oregon 3 votes were counted for Hayes when only two electors had been constitutionally appointed in that State. They know that all this is the result of a deliberate conspiracy that was formed before the vote in the three disputed Southern States had been declared. I repeat, the people know all this. They are not deaf; they hear. They are not blind; they see. They are not dead, but live. And hearing and seeing and living, they will hold all conspirators against the integrity of the ballot to a strict and fearful accountability.

The day of reckoning will as surely come as there is truth in heaven and justice in Providence. In that day the people, with one voice and irrespective of party, will cry out against all falsification of the ballot. They will say it in their hearts; they will speak it with their tongues; they will write it in their constitutions and in their laws, that the man who is guilty of willful fraud in the ballot is worse than a murderer; that it is the most henious of crimes, and that he shall suffer the extremest penalty of the law without benefit of clergy. For a man who slays another may deprive a family of its natural protector, and, it may be, the country of a valuable citizen; and there the matter ends. But that man who commits a deliberate fraud on the ballot-box aims a fatal stab at the very heart of popular government and inflicts an injury upon every man, woman, and child in the Republic.

The Constitution never contemplated the elevation of a man to the Presidency through frand; and no technical construction of a law can sanctify such an infamous act. The intention of the lawmakers is the paramount rule of construction; and the clear intention of the electoral act was to ascertain who had been honestly and fairly elected by the people. The democrats and most of the republicans in both Houses who voted for the bill so understood it. The people so understood it, and so understanding it accepted it with almost universal approval. They accepted it because they believed it would prevent fraud in the present and guard against it in the future. And now to their surprise and amazement they find that the majority of the commission have so construed it as to murder the intention of its framers, and ingeniously to convert it into a mask to hide and conceal the ugly and hateful visage of political intrigue and corruption. Has the majority of the returning board in Florida steeped itself in fraud? The national returning board indorses the act. Is the returning board of Louisiana reeking with falsehood and perjury? The national returning board says it is pure and immaculate. Has the Constitution declared that no one can be appointed a presidential elector who holds an office of profit or trust under the United States? The majority of the national returning board have the presumption to say that the sages who framed the Constitution did not understand the meaning of the words they employed when they said such a one should not even be appointed to the office of elector.

Unless Providence blunders, these things cannot stand. Unless the people give themselves up to an endless torpor, these things cannot last. Unless manhood, honesty, and patriotism in the people have become extinct, these monstrous perversions of the ballot cannot endure. The ballot in its integrity is the foundation of our political system. Remove it, and the entire fabric will tumble into ruin. Destroy it, and a whole century of grand progress and of glorious achievement will be thrown away. In the present emergency a new election, in my judgment, is the only thing that can give perfect satisfaction to the people. Under the present circumstances, it is all that the democrats of the country may hope for, and which the republican party cannot refuse without an utter surrender of all claim to the confidence and respect of the American people. The people will not be trifled with. They will correct these evils. They will rebuke and punish fraud, and these things they will accomplish by peaceful methods. They will have no war—no disturbance of the public tranquillity; but, by the omnipotent force of a purified ballot in a new election, they will prevent a festering taint from fastening itself upon a succession to the Presidency. They will yet show to the nations of the earth that the honest ballot can "execute the freeman's will, as the lightning executes the will of God." They will restore the purity of elections, and thereby start the Government on the second century of its existence with a new lease of national life.

If at this momentous juncture the House shall pass the bill providing for a new election, the voice of the people coming up from the East and the West, from the North and the South, will demand the concurrence of the Senate. A patriotic President will approve it, and, by saving the Government from the confusion of an interregnum, will, in almost his last official act, crown his Administration with immortal honor and renown.

In this trying hour the House has a solemn duty to perform. Let us perform it without passion and with firmness, and commit the issue to the good God and to a patriotic people.

I cannot tell what other men on this floor may think or do, but for myself, after sleepless nights of anxious reflection, I have concluded that it is my duty as an humble member of this body to do all in my power to prevent the monstrous crime which is about to be perpetrated against the ballot. I am therefore prepared from the deepest convictions of duty to vote for a bill providing for a new election and designating some official to act as President in the mean time. Having done this, I shall without fear commit myself to my constituents and the country, with the confident hope that, should they condemn my action, they will award me the consoling merit of having acted with a sincere desire to save my country from the greatest of all calamities, the perversion of the ballot.

Chinese Immigration.

SPEECH OF HON. E. R. MEADE,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 28, 1877,

On the report of the joint select committee on the Chinese immigration question.

Mr. MEADE. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the joint select committee appointed at the last session of this Congress, I visited, with my associates of that committee, the Pacific Coast, for the purpose of investigating the subject of Chinese immigration, and the testimony taken by us has been reported to this House.

Circumstances have proved, thus far, and are likely to continue through this session, most unfavorable for such a deliberate and thorough consideration of the questions involved, as, in my judgment, their importance and their gravity demand; yet I shall have but imperfectly discharged my duties as one of that committee without placing upon record, while I have the power so to do, such conclusions as became impressed upon my mind in the examinations of witnesses and in intercourse with those who, for and against, were most likely to feel an interest in the objects of the investigation.

The interest felt by the people of the Pacific coast in the subject of Chinese immigration is not exaggerated by the various statements, official and semi-official, that have been presented for our consideration. It is the topic of chief concern, and at this distance we under rather than over estimate the extent of the feeling there respecting it. There is little excitement save in isolated cases, but it is ever apparent that a deep undercurrent of anxiety exists whose depth or power no one desires to estimate, lest it shall demonstrate the inability of the ordinary means of government to successfully withstand it.

For several years the people of the Pacific coast, and of California particularly, have endeavored, by State and municipal regulation, to discourage or to an extent interdict this Chinese influx. To this end laws were passed which, for the credit of the country, had better never been placed upon the statute-book of any State; but it is only just to say that their impropriety is now generally conceded and explanation offered for their enactment; that the country was new, legislation of any kind not always the wisest, the evil (for so they regarded Chinese immigration,) was a novel one, and they set to work by most expeditious and direct methods to attain the desired end. Happily for the jurisprudence of this country, all this species of class-discriminating and restrictive state legislation to which I allude has been declared invalid in the several cases recently decided in the Supreme Court of the United States. See Chy Lung vs. Freeman et. al., U. S. Supreme Court Reports, vol. 92, page 275; Henderson vs. Mayor of the City of New York et. al.; and Commissioners of Immigration vs. North German Lloyd, U. S. Supreme Court Reports, vol. 92, page 259. These decisions have caused the people of the Pacific coast to seek Federal interference for relief from the ills which they feel they suffer by reason of this Chinese immigration.

THE FALLACY OF AN UNRESTRICTED IMMIGRATION.

A nation with the latch-string always out, and a door-mat with the word "welcome" as an inscription, has come to be the popular idea of the relation we bear to the rest of the world. Our brethren of the Pacific coast discredit this unlimited hospitality, and claim that in two instances at least, exceptions should be recognized to the general rule of invitation: first, as to Coolie laborers and, second, as to Chinese women imported for purposes of prostitution. The statement of objections is more general and would seem to include the entire Chinese nation; but observation induces the belief that little, or no opposition in fact, is entertained toward any other class or classes of Chinese than those mentioned; indeed it may be said that comparatively few of any other class immigrate to this country, but it is that few that may be justly encouraged, and by whose introduction and residence here we would be largely benefited.

Appropriately enough the personal habits of our visitors formed an important feature of the investigation, and that the Chinese, at least a large proportion of those that come to this country, are neither virtuous nor cleanly, was abundantly proven; in fact, less evidence on that head would have been quite as conclusive, and even more agreeable to the committee. I shall not go into the details of their mode of living. Accept as a fact, what will never be disputed, that the coolie is anything but a desirable neighbor, and still it goes but little ways to prove that he is unfit for a residence among us, while in San Francisco and other considerable towns of the Pacific slope, his condition and treatment go a long way to prove defects in those municipal governments and regulations; indeed the disclosures were not favorable to the city government of San Francisco. No complaint can be justly found with its officials; but the laws which are provided at Sacramento are inadequate and suggest the necessity for a thorough revision. For illustration, the entire police force for patrol and harbor duty, being one hundred and twenty in number and defective in discipline, in a town of nearly three hundred thousand population, made up of elements from all parts of the world, would seem to offer no serious impediment to a conflict of races, and the testimony rather justifies the charge that this police contributes to, rather than prevents, the corrosive feeling which is fast being, if not already, permanently engendered between them.

Respecting the importation of women for immoral purposes, the facts disclose that, while the practice is discountenanced by the better portion of the Chinese residents in California, yet it exists, and is encouraged in its most revolting phases, which credible testimony indicates, even falls short of a full exposure of the degradation of morals at home among the lower orders of Chinese. In China, girls are bought in large numbers, at the age of three and four years, and reared for purposes of prostitution. Women generally are bought and sold, except among the higher classes, and very few of these last are brought to this country. It has been questioned whether any virtuous women arrive here as immigrants; but the testimony is, that such has been the case in a few instances, and many more would doubtless come, but for the unfriendly feeling now existing here toward the Chinese in general. It is moreover claimed that the present unsettled condition of the Chinese here, is not favorable to the introduction of their women of honor, who at home are kept in the greatest seclusion, and necessarily require permanent homes. But, as already shown, the habits and moral character of the Chinese in their relation to society prove, chiefly a want of proper police surveillance and discipline.

It might be difficult to at once carry necessary regulations into effect, with our imperfect knowledge of Chinese character, differing as it does so much from our own, that treatment intended for punishment would in instances prove a pastime; but, if personal habits and morals were the only considerations involved in this subject of Chinese immigration, we might safely remit it to where they properly belong, the local authorities of the Pacific coast; who would find it difficult to determine that the Chinaman or his indentured prostitute was worse than the same class of offenders against law and morals whose skin is whiter, but whose opportunities for knowledge of a better life, have been as superior, as the religious teachings of Christ are elevated above the moral precepts of Confucius.

AS A LABOR QUESTION.

The aspect of this subject which is most considered by the public is its relations to labor; and it is not improbable, that something of the proverbial hostility between labor and capital, has served here to magnify its importance. The amomalous conditions which our Pacific coast has presented for more than a quarter of a century, have undoubtedly largely contributed to present results. The peremptory, and almost unlimited demand for labor, which followed the discovery of gold in California, was responded to by an unparalleled immigration from all parts of the world. First, the development of mineral wealth, and, second, of the agricultural resources of that region, have been without precedent, and to these have been added manufacturing interests of large production. Up to this time, labor has there been rewarded even to repletion, but indications exist that the equilibrium of demand and supply has been reached, and that in the near future the latter may exceed the former.

The testimony did not show a surplus of labor, but it is safe to conclude, that the present liberal wages of the Pacific coast cannot be maintained with any considerable increase of the labor element. It is but the usual experience under such circumstances, that the capitalist and the white laborer differ in the disposition to be made of the coolie who has all along contributed so largely to the material wealth of the Pacific coast. The arrival of the Chinaman there was hailed with unbounded demonstrations of popular favor. In the then dearth of labor, he promised to solve, and it is not too much to say that he has solved for that region, the most difficult problem hitherto presented; perhaps, it may be urged, only substituting one of far greater embarrassment in its place. Employed to a limited extent in mines, everywhere as a servant, and in all sorts of menial work, as farm hand, as worker in tule lands, in building railroads, at work in lighter branches of manufacturing, and a multitude of other occupations, he has readily adapted himself and given satisfaction while working for less wages than his white competitor.

In this instance the conditions which usually apply to regulate supply and demand are inoperative. The want of mobility in labor always renders it exceptional, but in the case of Chinese, or more properly, coolies, it is yet more notable. The expense of living on the Pacific coast, is to the white laborer, surrounded by his family, with tuition and all the necessaries and comforts to provide for, attended with large outlay; and his three or four dollars a day for skilled labor, and a less price for common labor, are soon exhausted, especially if he would provide against sickness, death, old age, or any of the many contingencies which arise to call for unusual outlay or to prevent accumulation. The coolie comes from a country long overstocked and crowded with labor, where wages are reduced to the minimum; being from four to ten cents a day. Taught by necessity, if not by choice, to live within this pitiable income, his advantages over our own countrymen are obvious, when a declining demand for labor would quite drive the latter to extremity and want. The coolie requires no schools or churches, and has generally no wants which the few cents he has been accustomed to receive in his native land will not cover. Beside, as mentioned, this immigration is quite inexhaustible, China possessing nearly one-third of the entire population of the earth, and separated from the Pacific States by an ocean ferry, which may be crossed at an expense of from twelve to fifty dollars, depending upon circumstances. To millions of this enormous population, slavery and want are ever present, impelling them forward to the "new gold hills," whose description reaches them like the gilded dreams of fairy-land.

Added to usual causes, China is liable to repeat the terrible civil strifes which have characterized its history, and thereby for those who would escape their terrible results, swell the volume of immigration to these shores. All this, and more which might be said if time would permit, is apparent, and the white laborer, naturally enough, now presents to his Government what he regards as a choice between the coolie and himself. It can hardly admit of doubt, with these established facts before us, that it is the duty of this country to first look to the interests, distinguished from advantages of the race from whom we derive our origin, of which we are a part, and who possess the characteristics essential to the proper development and perpetuity of our national institutions.

Labor simply as such, is entitled to no greater merit or consideration than any other commodity; and when an extraneous supply is clearly to the injury of the country at large without compensating qualities, then it is an obvious duty, to take such precautions as will discourage or restrict its further introduction. This is the position, as I understand, which is assumed by those best informed; who are familiar with coolie labor in our country, and who regard that the time has gone by when it was a necessity, and that now instead, it promises to become a serious burden, of such alien character as to present little claim for our support.

AS A QUESTION OF POLITICS.

Coolie immigration as a labor question in this country would alone impart to it a political complexion, and in this respect it has lost none of its importance by reason of the action of both political parties, that conspicuously have entered a race to demonstrate which shall go furthest and tarry longest in opposition to the Chinese immigrant; but the further phase of its political character is with what political rights and privileges this class is in the future to be invested.

At present the Chinaman is not entitled to the benefits of naturalization; but with our education in the school of the political equality of all men and the general repugnance which prevails in this country respecting the re-establishment of a race among us with less or subordinate rights and privileges, in the fluctuations and mutations of parties, the time may not be remote when the demand will arise for clothing this class with the prerogatives of suffrage. Of the Chinese population in this country nine-tenths at least is composed of males above the age of twenty-one years, and would if endowed with citizenship control the politics of the Pacific States, assuming, as I believe to be the case, that they would follow their natural instinct and national traits of clannishness and vote under the leadership of their head men or employers substantially in a body, and in a direction most conducive to their pecuniary interests. Such a result would be perilous indeed, and yet as times go, the necessities, if no better excuse presents, of some political party, will lead it to place the ballot in these hands. Mr. Seward while on his visit to China in 1871 thus describes its people:

Although China is far from being a barbarous state, yet every system and institution there is inferior to its corresponding one in the West. Whether it be the abstract sciences, such as philosophy and psychology, or whether it be the practical forms of natural science, astronomy, geology, geography, natural history, and chemistry, or the concrete ideas of government and laws, morals and manners, whether it be in the esthetic arts or mechanics, everything in China is effete. Chinese education rejects science, Chinese industry proscribes invention, Chinese morals appeal not to conscience but to convenience, Chinese architecture and navigation eschew all improvement, Chinese government maintains itself by extortion and terror, Chinese religion is materialistic, not even mystic, much less spiritual.

Mr. Seward writes of the Chinese generally, and it is fair to assume that his acquaintance was with the better or more educated classes, among whom the infusion of Tartar blood has imparted life and energy. It is, however, notorious that of the Chinese population of 475,000,000 we are receiving in this coolie influx what is in every respect the worst part. The immorality and depravity, the ignorance and vice of all sorts, and the filth and degradation of Asiatic life are concentrated into this class, which lives around the purlieus of Canton. It is this population, the effete, senile, and decayed sloughs of a dying civilization, that is ejected upon our shores, and which will sooner or later come knocking at the doors of Congress, for investiture with the rights and privileges of citizenship.

But whether endowed with citizenship or otherwise a large population of Chinese in our midst must be fraught with gravest concern to our future welfare. With the characteristics described, it not only invites the natural and irrepressible conflict of races, but threatens by the very weight and force of numbers to crowd out and overwhelm our own race. The generous wages, a liberal Government, and the presence here already of so many of his countrymen, combine to encourage the coolie to immigrate, and to establish himself among us with his peculiar ideas and customs; and should the white race maintain its relative supremacy in this country, yet the Mongolian must exist as an irritating cause; or be as described by Mr. D. A. Wells—

A stone in the stomach of the body-politic, which will neither digest nor assimilate.

That we have admitted the negro race on terms of political equality offers no precedent for like action in the case of the Mongolian. It is not too much to say that the future of the negro race is yet undetermined in this country, but in other aspects the cases are very different. The negro is by nature kind, tractable, and docile. He came here with the settlers of the country and has grown up with it during near three centuries, and the ideas which he possesses, respecting governments and modes of life, are such as he has obtained from his associations with the white race, while the supply of immigration of his kin and kind was long since cut off and is forever ended; but with those favoring circumstances our political experience with reference to negro equality offers no encouragement for a further extension of citizenship to other races. The characteristics and condition and extent of the Chinese certainly preclude the experiment of introducing that race into our political system, either on terms of equality or as an inferior or servile people which shall displace our own race, with its dignity of labor, education, religion, advancement, and institutions. The conflict of the two races has always been apparent whenever they have come in contact, the Mongolian in his home persecuting the Caucasian with all the vehemence and vindictiveness with which the hoodlum in San Francisco pelts, beats, and, if opportunity offers, kills his Mongol neighbor. No ethnological examination of the subject accounts for this antagonism. It is simply a fact not indeed to be legally recognized but always apparent, and I conceive it to be of but little use to inveigh against the inhumanity of such conduct or the impropriety of allowing it to control governmental action. It exists, and in my judgment will always exist, and will be aggravated and intensified by increased numbers until the conflict will require the interference of military force to repress or restrain it, and that too in the near future.

OUR TREATY OBLIGATIONS WITH CHINA.

But while it is obvious that measures should be adopted restricting this growing coolie immigration a wise policy suggests due consideration and regard for existing treaty obligations with China. Location of the two countries favors the energy and enterprise of our citizens to monopolize the large and growing commerce with China. England has hitherto been the great power with that nation, but it is well understood that we are fast gaining the ascendency, and that the Chinese Government feels a keener sympathy and higher consideration for this nation.

The appointment of Mr. Burlingame to distinguished honors was a signal indication of the kindly feeling which the Chinese entertain for us, as well as of the termination of the Chinese exclusive policy, which, for hundreds of years, has proved an insuperable barrier to western nations in establishing satisfactory relations with that empire.

The Burlingame treaty of June 18, 1858, contains the following provisions which at the date of their adoption received general approval:

ARTICLE V.

The United States of America and the emperor of China cordially recognize the inherent and inalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance, and also the mutual advantage of the free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects, respectively, from the one country to the other, for purposes of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residents. The high contracting parties therefore join in reprobating any other than an entirely voluntary emigration for these purposes. They consequently agree to pass laws making it a penal offence for a citizen of the United States or Chinese subjects to take Chinese subjects either to the United States or to any other foreign country, or for a Chinese subject or citizen of the United States to take citizens of the United States to China or to any other foreign country, without their free and voluntary consent respectively.

ARTICLE VI.

Citizens of the United States visiting or residing in China shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, or exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation. And, reciprocally, Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation. But nothing herein contained shall be held to confer naturalization upon citizens of the United States in China nor upon the subjects of China in the United States.

These provisions are the solemnly pledged faith of this nation and preclude us from entertaining the suggestion of the majority of the committee, that this Congress may pass laws prohibiting or restricting Chinese immigration or in other mode discriminating against its people without first obtaining the concurrence of the Chinese government itself; for while I believe that the government at Pekin would prefer that its population should not emigrate, yet in the face of these treaties, any unfriendly legislation on our part would be justly regarded as their infraction and as a breach of good faith, implying a disrespect for the Pekin government; which would naturally seek reprisals, to the interruption of commercial relations, and the material injury of the several thousands of our citizens whose residence and business interests are within the Chinese Empire. That the Chinese ministry is not unmindful of the importance of treaty obligations is shown in the correspondence transmitted by Minister George F. Seward, as published in the papers relating to foreign relations, presented to Congress on the 4th of December last, and to which I invite the attention of Representatives.

ENGLISH INFLUENCE IN CHINA.

A judicious policy admonishes this Government to avoid the appearance of error in our present relations with China when it is apparent that the British government seeks by every device known to its subtle policy and diplomacy to extend and perpetuate its power in that empire. That the English have for many years had in view to reduce China to another Indian possession is too manifest to admit of doubt, and that such a result would be most disastrous to American interest in Asia and the Pacific Islands is also unquestionable.

In an article recently published in Macmillan's Magazine, Sir Charles W. Dilkes epitomizes the adroit policy by which the English look to ultimate success. He says that—

Wise policy consists in the strengthening of the central government at Pekin. That government is the government of the Tartar dynasty, unpopular with the Chinese people it is true, but our plan is not to support it against insurrection but only against its delegated provincial government, also Tartar, and also unpopular with the people.

How easy with such a policy, at the right moment, to withdraw the props with which the Pekin government is sustained, and let it fall into English control. As at present situated, the main checks to English aggression in China are this country and Russia, and for the welfare of both these nations, as well as China, it is desirable that the counterbalance against England shall be maintained by frank, cordial, and intimate relationship with China, which no misunderstanding shall be allowed to impair. It may be said that I exaggerate the importance which would attach to the passage of a law by this Congress, prohibiting or restricting Chinese immigration; but we must bear in mind that our intercourse with China has scarcely assumed form, and that the Chinese government yet views its relations with the western powers with much doubt and hesitation, while its national pride and self-respect are fostered by a history of more than four thousand years, distinguished by a literature and discoveries in arts and sciences before present empires and republics had a place in the world's geography.

SUGGESTIONS FOR FUTURE POLICY.

In closing what in these limits must be an imperfect review of the subject, the following suggestions are prominent:

The immigration of merchants, men of education, students, and capitalists, should be encouraged, and every unfriendly obstacle in the way of their residence here removed. The French government has established a professorship of the Chinese language. We need to understand that people more thoroughly, and a liberal endowment for a similar purpose in this country would be of great benefit in developing our business and political relations with them. Entire justice is due the Chinese already on the Pacific coast according as guaranteed to them by existing treaties. A new convention should be held having for its object the strict regulation of coolie labor. The establishment by Congress of a bureau or department of immigration is requisite not only to a proper understanding and regulation of the subject with China, but also with European nations, and the proper reception and treatment of immigrants on their arrival in this country. With such a bureau properly organized, in accord with the State Department and its body of foreign officials, treaty stipulations respecting immigration may be made sufficiently flexible, to admit of congressional and executive control, and thus to subserve at all times the interests of our people, eliminate objectionable features, and remove the difficulties which now exist respecting the subject generally.

In the improbable contingency that the Chinese government will refuse to co-operate with us, in proper limitations respecting immigration, then will be the proper time to consider what independent action for ourselves is necessary. For the present, the entire business should remain with the treaty-making branch of this Government. A permanent Chinese embassy soon to be established here, and a Chinese consulship in San Francisco, will be timely, and greatly facilitate in arriving at an intelligent disposition of questions under consideration.

A just and equable national policy respecting immigration is a present need, and great wisdom and prudence should characterize it, especially in the infancy of relations which are to create so many bonds of common interest between the oldest and the newest nations of the globe.

Electoral Vote of Louisiana.

SPEECH OF HON. LEVI WARNER,

OF CONNECTICUT.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1877,

On the decision of the electoral commission in the case of Oregon.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, so much has been said about the powers and duties of Congress and of the electoral commission in counting the electoral votes, and of the manner in which that commission has discharged the duties imposed upon it by the electoral bill, that I cannot flatter myself that I shall be able to add anything of interest to the discussion, and I would have remained silent on this occasion but for the fact that some of the propositions advanced by my republican friends upon this floor, men who are jurists, and who claim to be honest, and to be acting from honorable motives, are so startling to me as a lawyer, and are in their moral characteristics so base, that I feel called upon to enter and record my protest against them.

Much that I shall say to-day I would have said when the action of the commission in the Florida and Louisiana cases were under consideration could I then have obtained the floor; but as the several acts of the commission are but parts of one grand scheme to count into the Presidency by means of the fraudulent action of corrupt returning boards a man who has never been legally or in fact chosen by the people, what I have to say may with propriety be as well said now as at any time. It is claimed that Congress has no power to go behind the certificate of the canvassing officers of the State to see if what they certify is true or false even where the claim and offer of proof is made that the certificate of such officers is false and fraudulent. Upon this claim the findings of the commission rest. To me this seems a most monstrous and indefensible proposition to be made by any jurist, or by any honest man whether he be a jurist or not. Take in connection with this claim the admitted fact that the votes of a State may and in fact have been so canvassed and the action of the electoral college so performed as to leave no time for legal proceedings by the State or any of its officers or citizens to test the correctness of the canvass or the right of the fraudulent electors to cast the electoral vote of the State, and we see how perfect is the machinery by which these frauds have been perpetrated, the magnitude and the full proportions of this conspiracy by which the votes of the States of Florida and Louisiana have been stolen and delivered to Rutherford B. Hayes and William A. Wheeler, and how low is the moral standard of those men who have lent their aid to the perpetration of this crime, and of those who will receive the rewards these foul hands will tender them.

Sir, I will not stop to discuss the questions presented to the commission, but I will say that if they are right in their conclusions then it is of no consequence what in fact may have been the action of any State in the election on the 7th of November, 1876, or who may in fact have been legally elected, or whether there was any election or pretense of an election; the only inquiry that can be made under the Constitution and laws is, not what was in fact done, but what the officers of the State certify to have been done; and if they have fraudulently certified to a falsehood, it is just as good and just as conclusive as if they had certified to the truth. They can disfranchise a State, they can pervert her voice, and there is no power in Congress, or in the State, or anywhere under heaven save in the people by revolution to prevent it. The votes they falsely and fraudulently certify to be the true votes of the State must be counted by Congress as the votes of that State, even though every man knows and confesses that they are not. They must be counted as the electoral votes of that State even if there was no election or pretense of an an election in the State. With a returning board and a governor to certify their action you have all the machinery you require to make good, valid, and constitutional votes for President and Vice-President. They have only to declare and certify that certain persons were duly elected presidential electors, and send their certificates to the President of the Senate of the United States. He must open these certificates, for he must, acting under the Constitution, open all the certificates. What then? Let the commission answer. They say:

It is not competent under the Constitution, and the law as it existed at the date of the passage of said act, to go into evidence aliunde the papers opened by the President of the Senate, in the presence of the two Houses, to prove that other persons than those regularly certified to, &c., had been appointed electors, or by counter-proof to show that they had not, or that the determination of the said returning officers was not in accordance with the truth and the fact.

The votes so certified, they tell us, must be counted as the votes of the State, though all men know and admit that they are as false and fraudulent as the most devilish ingenuity of man could make them. Examine for a moment the ground upon which this opinion of the commission rests. It will be observed that the question before the commission was as to the admissibility of certain evidence offered. The certificates of election of the so-called Hayes electors were before the commission. They were only evidence of a fact which the commission were bound by their oaths to investigate and determine.

Evidence was offered to prove that these certificates were false and fraudulent, and the evidence was objected to. The commissioners say "it appears upon such evidence as by the Constitution and the law named in said act of Congress is competent and pertinent to the consideration of the subject" that these persons "so certified," &c., "were duly elected." But what provision of the Constitution makes the certificate the only "competent and pertinent" evidence in these cases? Grant that the provision requiring a certificate to be sent to the President of the Senate makes such certificates evidence; it does not make them anything more than evidence, nor does it make them conclusive evidence of the truth of the allegations they contain. Do they refer to the clause of the Constitution which provides that "full faith and credit shall be given to the records, judgments," &c., of the State? There is no other rule of evidence in the Constitution; and every man, even if he is not a member of the Supreme Court of the United States, or of the United States Senate, or even of the House of Representatives, knows that any judgment or record can be impeached for fraud or want of jurisdiction by any court or tribunal before which it may be offered as evidence to prove the truth of the allegations it contains.

Sir, in my judgment, the decisions of this commission are a perversion of right, of law, and of justice. They have been made to serve the ends of a political party; and I trust the day is far distant when they will cease to be remembered with indignation and shame by the people of this country. They offer a premium to fraud and perjury, and if not condemned by honest men of all political parties, and made impossible in the future by a higher and healthier tone of public sentiment and official honor, our elections will most certainly become contests from which honest men will shrink and in which the most corrupt will clutch the highest rewards. We have seen during the past eight years of Grant's administration many things that have brought the blush of shame to the cheeks of the American citizen, and it was meet and proper that this, the crowning infamy, if it must come, should come from the hands of that same party of political Pharisees who have so long boasted that theirs was "the party of great moral ideas," that they possessed all the honesty, and virtue, and respectability, and loyalty of the country; it was eminently proper that it should be reserved to this party to discover this plan for securing office, and to apply it to count into the Presidency the so-called Christian statesman of Ohio.

Sir, when party passion shall have subsided and men come to see this scheme for making a President, as one day they will, in all its revolting features, there will settle down upon the parties to this infamous proceeding and upon all who seek to profit thereby a load of shame and contempt beneath which they will groan until the grave shall hide them. The scepter of power thus gained will be in their hands powerless for good. The coveted honors of office which crime-stained hands thus clutch will turn to ashes in their grasp. The man you will by these means place in the presidential chair will be for four years a usurper of the power he wields, while he will be socially an outlaw in the judgment of more than twenty millions of his countrymen. This must be so unless the American people have lost their love of honesty and their sense of justice, and have thus become unfit for self-government; for when the people of this country shall have condoned such an offense as this against the very spirit of self-government, they will have reached a depth of depravity where there will not be found enough of honesty to make self-government possible or, if possible, desirable.

In view of the fact that the action of the commission shuts out all inquiry into the truth and makes to pass, as the true voice of the State, the simulated voice of her corrupt officials, how futile seem the arguments by which men seek to justify this action. Let me refer to the principal argument which has been presented in various forms, over and over again, by republicans upon this floor. They tell us that "the State acts by its officers and by virtue of her State laws, and that Congress cannot go behind the action of these State officers without trampling upon the rights of the State."

But what, I ask, are the rights of the State? Has the State a right to perpetrate a wrong, a fraud? Has she the right to have a wrong or a fraud perpetrated upon her? But I need not stop to discuss these questions. The argument based upon States rights, fallacious as it is, is based upon a falsehood. It is not true, as the argument assumes, that the State acts in choosing presidential electors by her officers. She acts by and through her freemen at the ballot-boxes on the day of election. They choose, and the State officers have only the power to ascertain what their choice has been and to certify or make known officially that choice. And yet we are gravely told that, no matter what may, in fact, have been the choice or the action of the State, the action of the officers of the State who, by law, are required to certify to the fact is conclusive as to what that choice in fact was, whether they certify to the fact or to a falsehood, and that the rights of the State stand between the fraudulent act and an investigation into the fraud, so that you cannot prove the fraud to have been committed without violating the rights of the State. In a word the claim is that the State has the right to be cheated out of her rights! There may be something very brilliant in this claim of my republican friends, but the world will never discover it. What a mockery of truth and of reason it is to represent the States of Florida and Louisiana as standing here, and claiming that they, as sovereign States, have the right to prevent an investigation into the frauds of their officers by which they have been defrauded of their rights in the late election! Was dishonesty ever more impudent and brazen-faced than when it attempts to justify this wrong done to the people of a sovereign State upon the plea that to attempt to redress it would be to trample upon the rights of the State?

One word, before I close, upon the action of the commission in the case of the alleged ineligible elector Watts. It is apparent to all that in the determination of this case and like cases in other States the commission have been governed by no fixed rule. The necessities of their party in this issue have made the rule of their action, and changed that rule again and again, as the circumstances of the particular case required. Neither love of justice, respect for law, nor regard for the obligations of the most solemn oaths has been found sufficient to restrain these men. All these have been swept away before the demands of party, as flax before the flame. We are pained and grieved beyond expression when such men as composed that commission, men heretofore standing highest among the honored names of this land, bow themselves in the dust at the demands of their party and with seeming willingness tender their honor, their good name, their regard for law and justice, and the honor and fair fame of their country as the price of a four-years lease of power. Let the republican party take the prize for which they have paid so dearly. I will do nothing dishonorable to prevent it. If I could place the man of my choice, Samuel J. Tilden, in the presidential chair on the 4th of March next by any means other than the votes to which he is justly entitled, I would not do it. If he cannot go into that high place by honorable means, without taint of fraud, and with a title to it which is untarnished, I have no desire to see him there. Were he dearer to me than my right hand I would invoke and welcome the vengeance of God upon him before I would see him made the chief executive officer in a Government of forty millions of freemen by such means as have been used to make the title by which Rutherford B. Hayes will take and hold that office.

Sales of Public Lands for Educational Purposes.

SPEECH OF HON. SAMUEL F. MILLER,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 26, 1877,

On the bill (H. R. No. 748) to apply the proceeds of sales of public lands to the education of the people.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, however fortunate we may have been in settling the disputed claims to the Presidency, I trust it will not lead us into the presumption of tempting fortune further by allowing greater dangers to exist unchallenged until they threaten us with impending ruin.

To-day I wish to call the attention of the House and of the country to evils that fill all thoughtful and patriotic minds with anxiety, and would indeed fill them with alarm if it were not possible by prompt and wise legislation to mitigate and remove them. I ask attention to the lack of facilities for even a common-school education over a great portion of our country, to the alarming amount of illiteracy among our population, and especially do I ask you to consider the fact that nearly 20 per cent. of the voters in this boasted land of freedom and intelligence cannot read the names of the candidates on the ballots they cast.

Does this statement exaggerate the evil or overrate its extent? Let me appeal to the facts shown by the last census. The Commissioner of Education furnished in his report for 1872 a table compiled and computed from the census of 1870 showing for each State and Territory the percentage of illiterates to total population over ten years of age. The footings of the columns in this table show the result for the whole country. Listen to some of these figures. The percentage of illiterates to total population of the whole country is 20.04 per cent. In the State of Delaware the illiterates are 24.95 per cent. of the population; in Maryland, 23.55 per cent.; in the District of Columbia, 28.59 per cent.; in Virginia, 50.10 per cent.; in North Carolina, 51.67 per cent.; in South Carolina, 57.64 per cent.; in Georgia, 56.06 per cent.; in Mississippi, 53.91 per cent. Now, Mr. Speaker, can anything be more alarming than these figures, unless it be the fact that since this exhibit was made the General Government has done little or nothing to aid the States struggling with this great question?

We have been taught by the fathers that the success and stability of free institutions rest upon the intelligence of the people. Can we contemplate with indifference the fact that one-fifth of the entire population of the country cannot even read and write; that in several of the great States of this Union more than one-half of the people have not taken the first steps of a common-school education. I know that the General Government can have no control of the school systems of the several States. The whole management of these institutions must remain with the local authorities, where the responsibility rests; but the General Government can and should, as it has often done before, aid the States in this work, and especially those States that have by the new condition of affairs had thrown upon them greater duties and responsibilities in educational matters than they can meet by their own unaided, straitened resources. To my mind, Mr. Speaker, the necessity for immediate action is most urgent. I am not committed to any particular plan, so that it is just to all sections and meets the necessities of the situation.

I have carefully read the bill presented by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WALKER,] and it seems to me to meet these requirements, and I therefore give it my humble support and trust before the close of the session I may have the opportunity to give it my vote.

The bill reads as follows:

A bill to apply the proceeds of sales of public lands to the education of the people.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the net proceeds of the public lands are hereby forever consecrated and set apart for the education of the people: Provided, That this act shall not have any effect to repeal, impair, or suspend any law now authorizing the pre-emption of public lands, or the entry of public lands for homesteads, nor as limiting in any manner the power of Congress to alter or extend the right of homestead upon such lands: And provided further, That nothing contained in this section shall be held to limit or abridge the power of Congress over the public domain, or interfere with granting bounty lands.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause an account to be taken upon the close of each fiscal year, and ascertain the total receipts from the sales or other disposition of the public lands of the United States, including all fees received at the general and district land offices during such year, and the amount of expenditures during said year, incurred or occasioned by the survey, sale, location, entry, or other disposition of such lands, including appropriations for the expenses of the said officers for said year, and shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount of the net cash proceeds from the sale, entry, location, or other disposition of such lands as aforesaid, after deducting such expenses and expenditures.

SEC. 3. That upon the receipt of such certificate the Secretary of the Treasury shall, on or before the 31st day of July of each year, apportion to the several States and Territories and to the District of Columbia, upon the basis of population of the said States and Territories, between the ages of five and twenty-one years, the net proceeds of sales of public lands for the previous year: Provided, That after five years one-half of said net proceeds and after ten years the whole of the same shall be set apart as an educational fund, which said fund shall be invested in the bonds of the United States bearing a rate of interest not less than 4 per cent. per annum, both principal and interest payable in coin, the interest on such educational fund only to be appropriated as above provided: And provided further, That for the first ten years the distribution of said net proceeds and the interest on said fund to and among the several States, Territories, and District of Columbia shall be made according to the numbers of their respective population, of ten years old and upward, who cannot read and write, as shown from time to time by the last preceding published census of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the first appointment under this act shall be made on or before the 31st day of July, 1876; and each of said States and Territories shall be entitled to receive its distributive share of each apportionment, to be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to its treasurer or other officer authorized by its law to receive the same, whenever thereafter it shall file with the Secretary of the Treasury a certified copy of the law of such State or Territory accepting the provisions of this act and undertaking that the funds provided by the same, whenever paid over to it as above provided, shall be faithfully applied to the free education of all its children between the ages of six and sixteen years. The distributive share of the District of Columbia shall from time to time be paid over to the commission of said District created by act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," or other officer or officers provided by law, and shall be applied in the same manner as above provided for the States and Territories.

SEC. 5. That to entitle any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to the benefits of this act, it shall maintain for at least three months in each year a system of free public schools for all the children within its limits between the ages of six and sixteen, and shall, through the proper officer thereof, for the year ending the 30th day of June last preceding such appointment, make full report of the number of public free schools, the number of teachers employed, the number of school-houses owned and the number of school-houses hired, the total number of children taught during the year, the actual daily attendance, and the actual number of months of the year schools have been maintained in each of the several school districts or divisions of said State, Territory, or District, and the amounts appropriated by the Legislature or otherwise received for the purpose of maintaining a system of free public schools. And if any State or Territory shall misapply, or allow to be misapplied or in any manner appropriated or used other than for the purposes herein required, the funds, or any part thereof, received under the provisions of this act, or shall fail to comply with the conditions herein prescribed, or to report, as herein provided, through its proper officers, the disposition thereof, such State or Territory shall forfeit its right to any subsequent apportionment by virtue hereof, until the full amount so misapplied, lost, or misappropriated shall have been replaced by such State or Territory, and applied as herein required, and until such report shall have been made; and all apportionments so forfeited and withheld shall be added to and become part of the principal of the educational fund hereby created.

SEC. 6. That nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to affect in any manner the existing laws and regulations in regard to the adjustment and payment to States of the percentage of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands within their respective limits, as provided in section 3689 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, this is the bill, but let me concisely restate two or three of its main provisions.

It will be observed that the net proceeds of sales of public lands, after paying all expenses, are dedicated to the education of the people, but the rights of all pre-emptors under pre-emption laws and the rights of all settlers under present and future homestead laws are carefully guarded and reserved, as well as the power of Congress over the public domain and its right to grant bounty lands.

It is provided that after five years one-half of the net proceeds and after ten years the whole of the same shall be set apart as an educational fund to be invested in interest-bearing bonds of the United States, and the interest on these bonds is to be apportioned and distributed to the several States and Territories according to the population of each between the ages of five and twenty-one years as shown by the preceding census, on proof furnished by said State or Territory that it has maintained for at least three months in the preceding year a system of free public schools for all the children within its limits between the ages of six and sixteen years.

For the first ten years the net proceeds and the interest on this educational fund are to be distributed to the several States and Territories, respectively, according to the number of their population over ten years of age that cannot read and write, as shown by the last preceding census of the United States. These are some of the leading features of this bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in appropriating public lands or the proceeds of their sale for educational purposes, this bill but follows a long line of precedents commencing before our Constitution was framed and illustrating every decade of our history since its adoption. I, myself, have counted over thirty separate general laws appropriating public lands for the promotion of education, passed since 1800, and there have been during this period many special acts for the same purpose. So we have the authority and indorsement of our greatest and wisest statesmen to the constitutionality and wisdom of this bill, both as to the object to be attained and the property to be used.

There is one feature of this measure that may meet with some criticism and need some explanation. It may be objected that the plan of distribution for the first ten years is unequal and unfair, as it is to be made on the ratio of illiteracy, and not on the ratio of population. It is true that for the first ten years those States where ignorance is the most dense, where education is most needed, will receive the largest proportion of assistance.

To my mind this is no objection to the bill. The States and Territories form one country. One State cannot suffer unless all suffer. No danger can threaten one without menacing the welfare of all. The enlightenment and prosperity of the people of each State in a hundred ways promote the happiness and prosperity of the inhabitants of every other State. These are trite and general truths that every patriot admits and feels. But those States that have the greatest need of aid in educational work have especial claims that appeal to the generosity, nay, rather to the justice, of the whole nation. During the last fifteen years those States have undergone a complete revolution, not merely in their laws, but in their entire social organization.

Never, I believe, in all history did a State survive so great changes, made in so short a time, as those that have occurred in the Southern States of this Union. Slavery, while it existed, not only made the education of the colored race impossible, but it prevented the establishment of anything like a common-school system for the education of the children of the poor whites outside of the large towns. The children of the masters were educated by private teachers and in higher institutions. The war came and consumed and swept away the accumulated fortunes of a century. It broke up the family and higher schools. It abolished slavery and made the slave a freeman. Reconstruction came, and the freedman was clothed with full citizenship and invested with the responsibilities of the ballot. It was under such circumstances that those States were called upon to provide a common-school system for their people. Never was there greater need, and seldom if ever was there more discouragement. But in spite of all difficulties, and in spite of much opposition, the work has been honestly attempted in all the States, and with full as much success as could be expected under the circumstances, with their crippled resources. And now, sir, they lay before us this bill and ask our assistance. I am ready to meet it. I freely acknowledge my responsibility as a citizen and a voter in supporting those two great measures that now increase the importance and the burdens of education in those States.

We abolished slavery to save the Union. None now mourn its loss; "none so poor to do it reverence." We placed the ballot in the hands of the freedmen, not through malice toward our former enemies, but to save free institutions on this continent. I speak for the northern voter and private citizen, for I was one, and I believe I knew their sentiments. And perhaps it is well that southern Representatives should know the motives that actuated plain Northern voters in that crisis. There seemed to us to be but two ways of dealing with the great problems of reconstruction so as to secure the guarantees that safety demanded: first, to remand the conquered States to the territorial condition indefinitely, to be governed by the central government. But this would destroy free republican institutions in half of the States and endanger them in all. Besides, we did not want any dissatisfied Hungary or down-trodden Poland or subjugated Ireland to be a perpetual source of weakness to the nation. We preferred the other alternative. By removing the disabilities of one race and granting the full rights of citizenship to the other, with amnesty joined with suffrage, we thought to make it possible to rebuild on the basis of equal rights free and prosperous States. I repeat that I admit the responsibility of myself and my constituents for these measures. I still believe they will lead to happy results. I know that a great work remains to be done in the way of education for both races, more than the States unaided can accomplish. I recognize our obligation to aid in this work. I am ready to meet that obligation now by voting for this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I wish now to call the attention of the House to some circumstances that make this a most auspicious time for granting this assistance; more favorable, indeed, than any future time can possibly be. A common-school system has been organized in each of the reconstructed States. Its means are very limited in many, and inadequate in all. It should not be suffered to die of inanition. Its enemies should not have the opportunity to ridicule its feebleness or to belittle its importance. Again, sir, the newly invested citizens have shown a great desire for the education of their children, and the children an avidity for learning. This laudable ambition should not be allowed to change to indifference from want of opportunities, as quite frequently happens with ignorant people everywhere.

But further, Mr. Speaker, this is a most auspicious time to urge forward the cause of common-school education in these States, because their best men, without regard to party, now acknowledge its importance, and very many give it their encouragement and support. We see this in the reports of State superintendents, messages of governors, and proceedings of Legislatures.

I was very much gratified the other day in reading in the RECORD some philosophical and statesman-like remarks in the speech of the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WATTERSON.] Of course I do not refer to that part of the speech which was for a party, (for about that we should not agree,) but to that part that was for the country. I wish to quote a few sentences from that speech that illustrate the point to which I am now speaking. In describing the condition of the enfranchised colored citizens in his own State, under wise State management, he says:

> Thus by easy stages and by the consent of society the negro presently found himself vested with such legal rights as the States have exclusive power to give; he was established in the rights which the General Government had given him; he was made secure in his home, and he is to-day surpassed by no laboring-man in any part of the world in the advantages he enjoys for getting on in life. He is sought by all parties—a very popular person indeed with candidates for office. In the city where I live his churches and schools are numerous, well ordered, and well attended. He has no conflicts with the whites. In a word, he is a freeman, a citizen, and a voter.

I have made this quotation not because it is an indorsement of the fifteenth amendment, although it is very satisfactory in that respect, but I have made it to show that many of the leading men of the South not only look with approbation upon the prosperity and education of the colored race, but rejoice in that result. Doubtless this class of men are more numerous in the border States than in the States farther south. But I think this sentiment is advancing, and will soon extend over the entire country. I trust this bill will strengthen it, for only with the support of the best citizens of the States can the success of the common-school system be speedy and satisfactory. I would do nothing to lessen their supervision, or their responsibility, or their honor in this work, and I support this feature of the bill that the General Government may aid their people in carrying a necessary burden that they might feel was too heavy for them to bear in their straitened circumstances.

Mr. Speaker, there will probably be found, as there always has been, a few men in every community who will oppose any general system for the education of the people; a few aristocrats who prefer to hold their position by a kind of divine right, independent of the opinions and voices of the people who surround them. Then there may be a few indolent young men, joined with certain fellows of the baser sort, who do not want to be put to the trouble of further mental exertion, and dislike to see the gap closed up that separates them from those who started life with less advantages. These join in Hamlet's complaint, that "the toe of the peasant comes too near the heels of the courtier; he galls his kibe." Now, sir, the only answer to all this in a free democratic country is, move on or get out of the way. No man has the moral right to obstruct the path of progress to those below him to suit his indolence, his convenience, or his selfishness. In a free country progress is the law, and whoever cannot keep step in the march must fall out of the ranks and go to the rear. But such opposers of a general system of education may for a moment embarrass, but cannot prevent its success when once it secures the approval and support of the best citizens in the state and community.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the fruits of this bill will be good, and only good. The education of the laboring classes, whoever they may be, will not only increase the happiness of individuals and families, but will promote the material prosperity of the State. The education of the laborer doubles the value of his labor, both to himself and the country. I have heard a good deal said since I have been here about our duty to aid in developing the resources of the South—to restore and build up its waste places; but, sir, I know of no waste so broad as this waste of ignorance, and no place where a little assistance would do so great and permanent a good. Other plans and projects can wait until the nation is in a more prosperous condition, but this brooks no delay. Other interests, when in order, can be heard on their merits, but until a general common-school system is in successful operation in each of the States this must be the question of paramount importance, the question of the highest privilege, that must take precedence of all others.

Again, sir, the benefits of a common-school system will not be deferred to another generation, as many suppose. The education of the children will be a source of elevation and enlightenment to the parents. No father, however ignorant, can feel an interest and pride in the education of his children and take a part in the support of their school without being made a better man and a better citizen. The poorest cabin in the land will be made a better home by the presence of the humblest scholar and the most elementary book. Besides, in hundreds of cases the rule of nature will be reversed, and the child will become the teacher of the parents. And in all cases the desire for education, even for others—the discussion of educational questions, the effort to build the school-house and support the local school—all tend to improve the character of the humblest citizen, to give him more self-respect and respectability, and to develop in him some of the higher and better qualities of human nature.

I have been told by some of my southern friends that the freedmen are vicious, and that they are especially deficient in a correct appreciation of the rights of property. I have no doubt that in many cases this is true. Slavery was indeed a very poor school in which to learn the duties of freedom, and the very worst school in the world in which to get any true conception of the rights of property. But the remedy for this is not to remand them to slavery or to leave them in ignorance, but to give them education. It is always cheaper for the state to educate the child than to punish the criminal or support the pauper. And while it is true that education will not wholly prevent crime and pauperism, it has always been found true in all States that the percentage of illiteracy among the inmates of prisons and almshouses is ten times greater than in the population at large. Now, while it is the duty of the State to punish the violators of its laws, it may well be thought a duty to give its subjects opportunities for an education sufficient at least to enable them to read the laws they are compelled to obey. There was a curious old puritanic law of colonial Connecticut which relieved the child from the penalty of death for striking a parent if it appeared on the trial that the parent had totally neglected the education of the child. The lesson suggested may be as applicable to states as to parents.

Mr. Speaker, however much in our sore need we may have felt indebted to the Peabody fund and other private gifts, yet the education of a whole people is too great a work, both in its importance and in the resources required, to be met by the donations of private individuals, however generous. A system of elementary education requires a steady, uniform support, not dependent upon the caprice of fashion or the fluctuating prosperity of business, or any of those uncertainties that might make the donations of the benevolent fall off when most needed. Patriotic philanthropy has indeed a noble field for the use of wealth in the domain of education, but it is in supplementing the work of the state by founding higher schools and colleges and institutions for special training. Its work begins where that of the state ends. The state furnishes that education that is necessary for all in the common affairs of life, while wealthy philanthropy may be trusted to furnish that higher culture that is necessary for special duties. As the country increases in prosperity we may expect to see more and more of these acts of beneficence that dignify the pursuit of wealth for noble ends, and perpetuate through after years the good deeds as well as the name of the giver. This, indeed, is noble benevolence, that, like mercy, is twice blessed—"It blesseth him that gives and him that takes." This bill does not limit or trespass upon its domain, but it increases the number to appreciate and admire its deeds.

Mr. Speaker, no institution of our country has received greater credit and honor from statesmen and publicists of foreign lands than the free-school system of the several States. This bill will aid to make it still more an American institution by extending its blessings to every hamlet and settlement of the whole country. It will give our people another object of common interest and common pride. It will make our people more homogeneous—having a common education, a common culture, and a common literature. May we not expect that this aid will tend to bind States to the General Government, not by force but by gratitude, and make all sections and all races more devoted to the great Republic and to its free institutions, that are the source and guarantee of all our civil blessings. I hail and support this bill as a harbinger of peace and good will between states and between races. And with peace assured, with a hearty union of all for the good of all, there is no height of prosperity for our people or of glory for our country that we may not anticipate and attain. But, sir, in the supremest hour of our triumph there will be no institution to which we can look back with more pride and gratitude as a chief means of our success than to this which we will to-day foster and encourage by the passage of this bill. Glorious, thrice glorious country, when the rights of freemen are secured to all thy people and the opportunities for education to all thy children; for "wisdom and knowledge shall be the stability of thy times."

"An honest ballot is the safeguard of the Republic."

SPEECH OF HON. ROBERT SMALLS,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1877,

On the electoral vote of South Carolina.

Mr. SMALLS. Mr. Speaker, as a Representative of the State of South Carolina, I rise to submit my views regarding the investigation of the election by a committee of this House. The unfortunate division existing among the people of my State as to who is the lawfully elected governor of the State and who were the lawfully elected presidential electors has led to this investigation. I am happy to say the committee are unanimous in their conclusion that the Hayes electors received a majority of the votes cast and I regret to have to add that they are divided politically upon the governorship.

Under ordinary circumstances I would be content to allow the report of the committee to go upon the record with no further opposition than to record my vote against the majority report, believing, as I do, that the report of a partisan committee cannot and will not be accepted by the people of my State as an honest conclusion based upon the results of the investigation. The committee having divided upon the important question of who is the legally elected governor, the question remains an open one, to be accepted or denied according to party opinion.

I therefore propose at this time to submit to this House and the American people, in as concise shape as possible, the facts relating to the late political campaign and election in my State. The democratic party pursued a policy calculated to drive from the State every white man who affiliated with the republican party or who would refuse to join them in their attempts to deprive the negro of the rights guaranteed him by the Constitution of South Carolina and of the United States, the manifest intention being to reduce the negro to a condition of political dependence upon the former slaveholders; to place him in the power of the men who had degraded his manhood, who had reduced him to a condition of ignorance through centuries of enforced subjection. To such a policy the democratic party committed itself as one man, with these results, namely: A large number of murders have been committed, violence and outrage were resorted to, and thus entire counties terrorized; the political rights of 10,000 negroes were refused them, and by means of fraud a true expression of the ballot-box denied.

The white race of the South possess intelligence and courage. The existence of the institution of slavery cemented their personal interests and compelled them to act in concert in political matters. The relation of master to slave produced in the ruling class a domineering spirit, a disposition to ignore and trample down the rights of those they could not control. They became in a large degree cruel, refusing education to and ignoring the sanctity of the family relations of their slaves; they assumed the slave had no rights and denied the fact of his being a brother man and entitled to his personal liberty. They never learned to recognize such a principle and would tolerate no free expression of opinion. Such qualities provoked the late civil strife between the North and the South, and are to-day responsible for the unhappy condition of the South. The late slaveholding class will not submit peacefully to a government they cannot control, believing they are a superior race; and, not recognizing the rights of the colored man, they feel justified in resorting to any means or power to accomplish their end. To this purpose human life is taken with impunity, citizens are driven from their homes, and fraud perpetrated.

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the policy and character of the men who, having disgraced the name of South Carolina by their acts, now ask to be sustained in the result accomplished. On the other hand, the negro race, under ordinary circumstances, are gentle, patient, and affectionate; possessed of no cruel impulses, they are a harmless race, generous to a fault; their confidence is easily won. These qualities are the outgrowth of long years of suffering and have become ingrafted in their natures by the bitter lessons of experience. The granting of suffrage to them originated a new and controlling element in the Southern States. This, Mr. Speaker, has led to all the sorrows and the cruelties they have felt in the last ten years. The determination of the former slaveholding class to control them has prompted the many scenes of cruelty which make the history of the new South one of blood and form the subject for one of the darkest pages in American history. Mr. Speaker, the blood of the innocent freedman, shed by southern democrats, will in the future prove one of the dark spots upon the fair fame of the American Republic.

It is manifest that two political elements so widely different in their character would provoke much antagonism, but I do not think it ever entered the mind of the most apprehensive that the white race would resort to such inhuman brutality to recover power. If the negroes had been a race their equals in courage there might possibly be some palliation for so inhuman a policy, but when it was considered their cruelty was against a harmless race, it affords no defense, and their course becomes the blacker in comparison with their boasted chivalry, their claim of superior gentleness, and of those virtues which adorn the human race. The oppressed colored race can ask no greater punishment upon their persecutors than to call the attention of the civilized world to the history of the South for the last ten years, and to a comparison of the manner by which a rebellious people were treated by a generous Government, and in turn the treatment of the negro race by the pardoned class, and they challenge the annals of civilization to show a people who have maintained a more peaceful policy under such trying circumstances.

The late campaign and election in South Carolina have attracted the attention of the country. Great efforts have been made by the democratic party to win the ear of the American people. I now, in behalf of the colored race, to which I belong and who have under the sun of liberty suffered by the lash of slavery, who were objects of contention when a price was placed upon their head, as well as when vested with the right of suffrage, call attention to the following facts which I propose to prove: I charge upon the democratic party of South Carolina murder, violence, and intimidation, specifying that in the several counties of the State, more especially Aiken, Barnwell, Abbeville, Edgefield, and Laurens, murder was openly committed with the sanction of that party; violence was resorted to every day during the campaign; intimidation was practiced by the party in nearly every county; to sum up in a few words, the entire party went into the canvass resolved to win under any circumstances, and to do so resorted to means which ought to bring a blush of shame to the face of every honest citizen. I charge upon the democratic party the crime of creating a necessity for protection to peaceful citizens in a time of profound peace. I charge upon the democratic party the greater crime of turning the day of election into a carnival of bloodshed and violence. The day of all others when the public peace should be most sacredly maintained was by their efforts made a day for the infliction of every cruelty necessary to change the result desired by the honest majority of the voters of South Carolina. I charge upon the democratic party the crime of violating the purity of the ballot-box by unblushing fraud, sanctioned by the entire party, from candidate down to voter. I charge them with the crime of striking a second blow at the perpetuity of American institutions by inaugurating in the centennial year the practice of securing by fraud and murder what could not be obtained by honorable means.

In support of these charges I invite a careful examination of the facts given in the following pages, each and every one having been taken from the sworn testimony before the committee appointed for that purpose. It will be observed that comparisons have been made of the voting strength of the two parties, and of the votes cast by each race, between the elections of 1874 and 1876. To fully explain this I will say that the election officers of the various precincts make a registry of the color of the voter, white or colored, which is transmitted with the returns to the secretary of state.

To further obtain an intelligent estimate of the strength of the two parties and of the votes cast at previous elections the tables taken by the committee in evidence are given entire. The impression may arise in the minds of some persons that the increase of the democratic vote can be attributed to colored men supporting that party with their ballots. The registry taken on the day of election shows how many white and colored men voted, there being blanks for that purpose, with the poll-lists. An examination of these returns is given in the following pages for the various counties, and it will be observed that the increase of 30,000 votes for the democratic ticket were cast by white men almost entirely, showing conclusively that the frauds committed by white men were enormous, and caused the very large increase in the democratic vote.

In this connection it may help to enlighten the minds of some by calling attention to the fact that in the State of Georgia the difference between the October vote and the November vote cast by the democratic party amounted to 25,000.

The fact is proven of an immense number of Georgians being present and voting in South Carolina on the day of election, and the decrease in Georgia and increase in South Carolina, sister States, is accounted for.

The fact is to me satisfactorily established that the above charge is sufficiently founded from the following data, which will convince even the most skeptical person that I am right in asserting it, namely:

At the October election the democratic party of Georgia rolled up an astonishingly magnificent majority of 75,000 votes, while the result of the November election shows a majority of only 50,000. What became of the remaining 25,000 Georgia democrats on the 7th of November? There would be room for speculation as to the answer to this query were it not for the fact that we find them in the official election returns of their adjoining sister State of South Carolina, where they went to make up the 25,000 of which the South Carolina democracy knew it was short.

To support this assertion with statistical facts we need only to point at the election return of one of the border counties of South Carolina, the county of Edgefield, where the preponderance of the white vote over the census return of the same for 1875 is so wonderfully striking that the mere figures will point at once at the manner in which the South Carolina democracy obtained their majority in that county.

The white male population of Edgefield in 1875 was twenty-nine hundred and seventy-three, and the democratic election returns one year later pretend to show a vote of over 6,000 white males for that county alone.

The State of South Carolina is divided into thirty-two counties. In the year 1875 an official census of the population in the State was taken.

The number of whites and colored were carefully noted. The population was also classified in regard to age. The total number of inhabitants returned by this census was 925,145, of which number 574,391 were colored and 350,754 white. The number of white males over twenty-one years of age was 74,199; colored over twenty-one years of age, 110,744.

A general election is held in the State every two years, at which time the following officers are elected: Governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary of state, State treasurer, comptroller-general, attorney-general, adjutant and inspector-general, superintendent of education, solicitors for eight circuits, one half of the State Senate, and one hundred and twenty-four representatives. The following county officers are also elected: Ninety-six county commissioners, thirty-two sheriffs, thirty-two clerks of courts, thirty-two probate judges, and thirty-two school commissioners.

In order to arrive at some idea of the strength of the two political parties in the State (republican and democratic) the tables appended to my remarks are referred to, from which it will be seen that in the election of 1870 the republican candidate for governor received 33,534 majority; in the election of 1872 the republican candidate for governor received 33,285 majority; in the election of 1874 the republican candidate for governor received 11,585 majority, the contestants for the office being two republicans, the regular candidate receiving the majority. During the same years the republican candidates for lieutenant-governor were elected by the following majorities: In the year 1870, 32,655 majority; in the year 1872, 42,278 majority, (over a liberal republican;) in 1874, 15,985 majority, (over a bolting republican.)

In the year 1876, at the general election, the republican candidate for governor received 91,127 votes, and the regular democratic candidate 92,210 votes. The republican candidate received 6,056 more votes than had ever been polled by his party; the democratic candidate 40,310 more votes than had ever been polled by a candidate of his party since the war, namely, the election of 1870, when M. C. Butler, the democratic candidate for lieutenant-governor, received 51,537 votes. At the same election of 1876 the republican candidates for presidential electors received, according to the canvass of the State board, the following votes: Bowen, 91,786; Winsmith, 91,870; Johnston, 91,852; Hurley, 91,136; Nash, 91,804; Cook, 91,432; Myers, 91,830. The democratic candidates for electors received the following votes: Barker, 90,896; McGowan, 90,737; Harrington, 90,895; Ingram, 90,798; Wallace, 90,905; Erwin, 90,906; Aldrich, 90,806. The result of the investigations of the Congressional committee gave the republican electors the following votes, after additions and deductions by experts: Bowen, 88,021; Winsmith, 88,057; Johnston, 87,510; Hurley, 86,797; Nash, 87,517; Cook, 87,480; Myers, 87,807; and the democratic electors, Barker, 86,597; McGowan, 86,619; Harrington, 86,348; Ingram, 86,358; Wallace, 86,448; Erwin, 86,359; Aldrich, 86,244. Allowing to the several republican electors certain votes, of which they were deprived by the mistakes of the election officers, and which will be referred to hereafter, it will be found that Messrs. Hurley, Nash, and Cook were justly entitled to several hundred more votes. It is impossible to arrive at the fact that the democratic increase of vote was legitimate. The republican party polled more than its usual vote, and it is therefore reasonable to infer that extraordinary methods were resorted to in order to swell the democratic vote, and here attention is called to the fact that the republican vote of 1876 was 19,617 less than the colored voting population of the State, which is republican. There is also a white republican vote to be added, the number of which cannot be arrived at. These facts reveal that the republican party is as strong as ever in South Carolina, and that the vast increase of the democratic vote is based upon fraud, and sworn evidence will be adduced when the vote in the several counties is considered to prove this statement.

For the purpose of giving some idea of the manner in which the State government has been administered the following facts are furnished: The tax for the last year was eleven mills, three mills for the purpose of paying the public debt, two mills for the interest fund, one and a quarter to pay unpaid salaries, a portion of a mill to support penal and charitable institutions, penitentiary, deaf and dumb asylum, the lunatic asylum, and the orphan home, &c. This tax is the smallest that has been imposed since reconstruction, and it is due Governor Chamberlain to say that the taxes have been reduced fully one-fourth under his administration. The State debt is $7,000,000 and the assessed value of real estate $140,000,000, and the assessment is very fair.

The administration of Governor Chamberlain has been one of marked reform, of a character to command the admiration of every citizen. Reductions have been made in the expenditures and salaries have been reduced. The abuse of the pardoning power has been corrected, men of better character have been appointed to office, faith has been kept with the public creditor, a saving of $400,000 to the State effected, the tax laws have been amended to secure unanimity of assessment and taxation, a saving of $101,200 in the contingent fund of the executive has been effected, the legislative expenses have been reduced $350,810, the contingent expenses of the government $355,000, the expense of public printing reduced $512,418, and taxes reduced from thirteen and one-half mills to eleven mills. The deficiencies in his administration were $291,024 less than those of 1872 and 1873, and $233,315 less than those of 1873 and 1874, making a grand total of savings under the administration of Governor Chamberlain of $1,719,488; and let it be added that this is the testimony offered by the organ of the democratic party in the State. The Charleston News and Courier published in its columns the following testimony to the reform character of Governor Chamberlain's administration, (see testimony, pages 353 and 354.)

We have scrutinized, one by one, the most important pledges and recommendations contained in the addresses and messages since his election, and we now briefly sum up the result of the investigation we have made.

* * * * * * *

The abuse of the pardoning power has been corrected.

The character of the officers of the government appointed by the executive has been improved, and the sureties upon the bonds of public officers have been required to make affidavits of their ability to meet the liability they assume.

The settlement of the public debt has been maintained unchanged, and faith with the public creditor, so far as dependent on executive and legislative action, has been fully kept.

The effort to place the whole of the public funds in two banks of small capital was frustrated, and the State so saved from the danger of far greater loss than was sustained by the failure of the Solomon bank.

The floating indebtedness of the State has been provided for in such a way that the rejecting of fraudulent claims is assured; the recognized and valid claims are scaled one-half the amount, and their payment is distributed over a term of four years, resulting in a saving to the State of at least $400,000.

The tax laws have been amended so as to secure substantial unanimity and equality in the assessment of property for taxation.

The contingent funds of the executive department have been so reduced in amount that the saving in two years, upon the basis of the average of six previous years, is $101,200.

Legislative expenses, in like manner, and upon a similar basis, have been so reduced as to save the people in two years $350,810.

Legislative contingent expenses in the same way have been so reduced as to save the State $355,000.

In the expenditure of contingent funds accountability and publicity have been secured.

The cost of public printing has been reduced from an annual average of $306,200 to $50,000, saving in two years $512,418. The salaries of public officers have been reduced $30,000 a year.

The tax levy for the current year for State purposes has been reduced from thirteen and a half mills to eleven mills, a saving to the people this year of $300,000.

The deficiencies (including the losses by the Solomon bank) are for the year 1874-'75, $308,872, which is $291,024 less than the deficiencies of 1872-'73, and $233,315 less than the deficiencies of 1873-'74.

Under the several heads the savings that have actually been made are:

In the bonanza bill	$400,000
In the executive contingent fund	101,260
In legislative expenses	350,810
In contingent expenses	355,000
In public printing	512,418
Total	1,719,488

To realize this amount would require a tax of nearly 1½ per cent. Had the appropriations of the past two years been as inordinate as the average of the appropriations and expenditures of the preceding years, the State taxes of the past two years would have been ¾ per cent. a year more than the outrageous rate actually levied.

This is the record of Governor Chamberlain, as shown by hard figures and unmistakable facts. We have strained or exaggerated nothing. The plain truth as we know it has been faithfully given. And we maintain that the record as it stands is one of which Governor Chamberlain has cause to be proud, that it justifies the support which has been given him, and is a complete answer to those of our friends who think that no act of Governor Chamberlain deserves public commendation but his refusal to issue the commissions to Whipper and Moses. That bold act, applauded everywhere in South Carolina, has not been mentioned in these articles. * * *

And the voice of the Charleston News and Courier was the voice of the majority of the democrats in the State. Evidence from the leading democrats who testified before the committee can be found all through the investigation bearing testimony to the excellent character of the administration of Governor Chamberlain. It was the pet project of these men to have him nominated as their candidate for governor, and they never wearied of sounding his praises; he was accredited with doing more to give South Carolina good government than any other citizen within her borders, and up to the time of the nomination of Wade Hampton it was an open question what party would bear in the campaign the name of Daniel H. Chamberlain with his prestige of reform; and let it be said here that with all their democratic abuse of carpet-bag government in the South, it is a part of the political history of that section that whenever a man rose superior to the corruption in his party, be he a native republican or otherwise, he became an object for abuse and vilification. The more he endeavored to accomplish for good government the worse the abuse he would receive, and often the crime of doing good for himself and his people merited the punishment of death. Governor Chamberlain still lives, and nothing but the protecting hand of Providence has saved his life. The abuse, the vilification, has been heaped upon him out of the mouths that a few months ago bore testimony to the great reforms he had accomplished. Threats of assassination have been uttered every day and night during the campaign and since its close. To-day his life is preserved for the reason alone because it would not be good policy at this time, when Hampton is seeking to win the confidence of northern people, to murder him. The reforms accomplished by Governor Chamberlain have been indorsed by his party, and it entered the campaign pledged to reform and good government. South Carolina, under the republican party, in the future will be governed wisely in the interests of her people.

The platform of this party was equal in wise measures to any adopted by a political party in the country. It pledged absolute reform, reduction of expenses and taxes, and, in general terms, advocated a policy which, when fully consummated, will give South Carolina one of the best governments under the sun.

The republican platform.—In preparing the platform of our party I was invited by the committee having the work in charge to meet the committee and to present my views. I accepted this invitation, and I here present those portions of the platform adopted by the convention to which my efforts were especially directed:

"4. That in presenting to the people of South Carolina our nominees for the high offices of the State for the coming two years we believe we should make plain and unmistakable the aims and principles to which we stand pledged, in the event of their election; not in glittering generalities of reform, but in specific and substantial articles.

"6. We pledge ourselves to thorough reform in all departments of the State government where abuses shall be found to exist, and, as an earnest of the same, declare our purpose of submitting to the qualified voters of the State the following specific reforms as amendments to the State constitution:

"'1. That the present adjustment of the bonded debt of the State shall be inviolable.

"'2. That the General Assembly shall meet only once in every two years, and that the length of no session thereof shall exceed seventy days.

"'3. That the number of sessions of courts of general sessions and common pleas shall be reduced to two annually in each county, with power reserved to the judges to call special sessions when necessary.

"'4. That the veto power of the governor shall be so modified as to allow of the disapproval of a part without effect upon the rest of an act.

"'5. That agricultural interests shall be relieved from burdensome taxation by a more equitable distribution of taxes, and by the inauguration of a system of licenses fixed upon fair principles.

"'6. That no public funds shall ever be used for the support of sectarian institutions.

"'7. That the enormous evil of local and special legislation shall be prohibited whenever private interests can be protected under general laws.

"'8. And inasmuch as the system of free schools was created in the State by the republican party, and should be especially fostered and protected by it, we pledge ourselves to the support of the amendment to the State constitution, now before the people, establishing a permanent tax for the support of free schools, and preventing the removal of school funds from the counties where raised.'

"7. We pledge ourselves and the nominees of the republican party of the State to the securing of the following purposes by legislative enactment:

"'1. The further and lowest reduction of salaries of all public servants, consistent with the necessities of government.

"'2. The reduction of fees and costs, especially of attorneys in civil cases, and the amendment of the laws governing the settlement of estates in such manner as to secure a more economical administration and settlement of small estates.

"'3. The immediate repeal of the agricultural lien law.

"'4. Public printing to be reduced at least one-third of the present appropriation.

"'5. Convict labor to be utilized under such laws as shall secure humane treatment.

"'6. The annual appropriations for public institutions to be economically made and properly expended.

"'7. The number of trial justices to be reduced throughout the State, and each justice to be assigned to specific territory, with moderate salaries to cover costs of criminal business, adjusted in proportion to populations.'

"8. Recognizing the enormous expense of fencing farms and the scarcity of timber in some sections of the State, we feel it to be necessary that practical relief be afforded to the people of the State, and we pledge ourselves to secure such legislation upon the subject as will give to the electors of each county the right to regulate this question for themselves."

The great cry used against the republicans was "carpet-baggers," and an assertion that the people of South Carolina wanted a "white-man's government." To show the claim that where the colored people are in a majority they ignore the whites is false, a reference is made to Colleton County, one of the strongest black counties in the State, having a population of 21,413 colored to 12,450 whites. The evidence before the committee, as shown below, demonstrates that the whites have a majority of the offices in the county, and the same state of facts exists elsewhere:

Question. Within the range of your observation, are not the great majority of the county office-holders of your county colored men?

Answer. No, sir; I could not make any such statement as that.

Q. Who are the county officers of your county?

A. The county officers in my county, sir, are pretty well divided.

Q. I ask you who they are.

A. George Holmes, a white man, county treasurer; H. G. Judd, a white man, clerk of court; S. D. Gilbert, a white man, school commissioner.

Q. Was he elected this year?

A. He was not elected this canvass; he is off at Massachusetts. I am giving you those who are holding office. You know there is a dispute yet concerning the right to hold. All these I am calling are republicans; probate judge, a white man; two out of the three county commissioners, white men; the sheriff, a white man; the deputy sheriff, a white man; three clerks in the auditor's office—during the months of October, November, and December, they generally have an additional force of three in the office to arrange the books of the assessment of property—white men. I will now give you the colored men: out of sixteen trial justices twelve are white—we have the strongest republican county in the State—and four colored trial justices; one county commissioner, colored; colored auditor. Now, sir, you can make the comparison and you will see.

Q. Who are your members of the Legislature?

A. Now the members of the Legislature, six out of the seven of the old house are colored and one white.

Q. Who is the senator?

A. The senator is a colored man; jury commissioner, and county officer, a white man; the treasurer's clerk is a white man.

Q. All the clerks are white men, are they not?

A. No, sir.

Q. How about the constables?

A. The constables are about equal. Twelve out of the sixteen trial justices are white; we have four colored trial justices.

Before going into the question of general intimidation in the State, a brief reference will be made to the unblushing attempt made to buy one of the republican presidential electors elect to cast his vote for Tilden for President. By reference to the very full testimony taken by the committee, it will be seen that the sum of $50,000 was offered to Mr. Nash, an elector, as a bribe to have him vote for Tilden. Further, it was attempted to bribe Mr. Nash to have him secure for the democrats four republican State senators by paying $10,000 for each one, $40,000 for all. It is needless to say this base attempt to accomplish by bribery what had failed through fraud and intimidation failed of its purpose; Mr. Nash, a colored man, declining the bribe. The four State senators, had they been purchased, would have given the democrats a majority in the State senate and enabled them to set up an administration in opposition to the regular State government. The purchase of the presidential elector would have placed Tilden's election beyond doubt.

The various methods of intimidation resorted to by the democrats were as follows: The killing of colored men; making threats of personal violence; sending threatening letters, coffins, bullets, &c.; by riding armed through the country, by day and by night; by firing into the houses of republicans; by breaking up republican mass-meetings; by forming armed bodies, dressed in red shirts, called rifle clubs; by discharging employés who refused to promise to vote the democratic ticket, &c. All of these various measures of intimidation were rigidly carried out in order to produce, by an organized system, a reign of terror among the republicans of the State. When the various counties are referred to it will be conclusively shown that men have been murdered, driven from home, discharged, beaten, &c. The republicans, with few exceptions, could hold no political meetings. When such would be called, armed rifle clubs, on horseback and on foot, would surround the republicans and demand control of the meeting. If this was not accorded the meeting was broken up. The "preference policy," or, in other words, discharging employés who voted the republican ticket, was openly advocated by the democratic press, who published their news in the following shape:

The Easterlin's Mill democratic club adopted resolutions carrying intimidation to its most extreme limit. Democratic vengeance was visited upon the innocent families of republicans; even little children were made to suffer by these chivalrous people because their fathers were republican. Think of a party—a party professing the name of "democracy" resolving against women and children; and remember at the same time these are the men who boast of their chivalry, of their manly courage, of their ancestry. I call the attention of the country to the resolutions given below, and add that the policy indicated was almost universally adopted by the speakers at political meetings:

The following resolutions, adopted by the Easterlin's Mill democratic club, are commended to the attention of the different clubs throughout the State. Similar resolutions have been adopted by the Willow Township, Graham's, and Bamberg clubs, and no doubt by many other clubs in Orangeburgh and Barnwell Counties. It is intended that the names of the obnoxious leaders in each township be sent to the different clubs throughout the county:

"1. Resolved, That we will not rent land to any radical leader, or any member of his family, or furnish a home, or give employment to any such leader or any member of his family.

"2. That we will not furnish any such leader, or any member of his family, any supplies, such as provisions, farm implements, stock, &c., except so far as contracts for the present year are concerned.

"3. That we will not purchase anything any radical leader or any member of his family may offer for sale, or sell any such leader or any member of his family anything whatever.

"4. That the names of such persons who may be considered leaders be furnished to this club at the earliest date, and that a list of the same be furnished each member of the club.

"5. That whenever any person or persons who shall be denominated radical leaders by a vote of this club shall cease as such, these resolutions shall become null and void so far as such leader or leaders, or any members of his or their families are concerned.

"6. That we will protect all persons in the right to vote for the candidates of their choice.

"7 That these resolutions be published, and that all the democratic clubs in the county and throughout the State are hereby requested to adopt them."

If any man supposes for a moment that my language is not justified by the facts, let him read the annexed testimony. An ex-governor of the State, a professed gentleman, calling upon his hearers to refuse social intercourse with a radical; and this gallant gentleman demands that the innocent family "be made to feel the brand of infamy, the moral pestilence surrounding them." I again call the attention of the people of the country to these sentiments, to their full extent. Here is an ex-governor of a State, a representative citizen, who in a public meeting asks that the innocent family of a man guilty of republicanism receive the same condemnation as a convicted felon. And this man is a representative of southern chivalry:

Many have joined that (the republican) party to their eternal disgrace, and they will never recover from it. No, sir; nor their children, nor their children's children. [Cheers.] The very fact of their deserting their friends and their race is the best proof of their dishonesty. Fidelity is the best proof of honesty of soul, and he who has it not to his State and to his people is altogether dishonest.

In a democratic speech made at Walhalla on the 4th of September, and reported in the Greenville Enterprise of September 16, Ex-Governor B. F. Perry used the following language:

And here I would appeal to my democratic friends all over the State to stop all social intercourse with any man who is base enough to be a radical. Let him feel by your conduct toward him that the brand of infamy is on him and his children. This is the only way you can reach his black heart. Let him see that there is a moral pestilence around him which prevents all social contact with honorable men, and leaves him for patronage and society to his own chosen rogues and plunderers.

The citizens of Lancaster Village adopted resolutions of similar tenor, and asked their little boys to refuse association with the children of republicans.

The Lancaster Ledger of August 30 gives a report of a democratic meeting at Lancaster Court House, at which the following resolution was "unanimously adopted:"

Whereas several white citizens of Lancaster Village and County have associated themselves with the negro radical party, and thereby turned against their own race, and rendered themselves unworthy of social recognition by the Anglo-Saxon race:

Be it resolved, That we, the democratic citizens of Lancaster Village, pledge ourselves not to countenance them except only in business transactions, and that we also request our young men and boys in the village and county to carry out this resolve.

I now call attention to the law upon the subject of intimidation of voters, and do so in order that it may be fully understood that Governor Chamberlain was only executing his sworn duty when he called upon the Federal Government for necessary support in enforcing the laws of South Carolina.

An examination of the extract from the revised statutes will show how completely and thoroughly the laws of South Carolina have been violated by the men who have announced to the country their purpose to be the redemption of the State.

No law upon the statute-books was respected by these men if in any way it interfered with the plans they had adopted to carry the State. They knew no law, human or divine, that interfered with their purposes.

If at any election, as in the eighteenth section of this chapter is mentioned, any person shall offer or propose to procure another, by the payment, delivery, or promise of money, or other articles of value, to vote for or against any particular candidate or measure, or shall offer, for the consideration of money or other articles of value paid, delivered or promised, to vote for or against any particular candidate or measure, such person so offering to procure or vote shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof, shall be fined and imprisoned at the discretion of the court. (Chapter 131, section 20, page 727.)

If any person shall, at any of the elections in any city, town, ward, or polling-precinct, threaten, maltreat, or abuse any voter, with a view to control or intimidate him in the free exercise of his right of suffrage, such offender shall suffer fine and imprisonment at the discretion of the court. (Chapter 131, section 24, page 728.)

Whoever shall assault or intimidate any citizen because of political opinions or the exercise of political rights and privileges, guaranteed to every citizen of the United States by the Constitution and laws thereof, or by the constitution and laws of this State, or for such reason discharge such citizen from employment or occupation, or eject such citizen from rented house or land or other property, such person shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor." * * * (Chapter 131, section 26, page 728.)

The democrats in their different meetings would adopt resolutions to the effect that republicans could receive no work from them. These threats had great significance when it is considered that the democrats or former slaveholders own nearly all the land. It literally meant starvation to the laboring republicans. The testimony of General M. C. Butler shows that the democrats were determined upon such a policy, and it further shows that it was the practice of the democrats to carry arms.

The democrats proceeded so far in their intimidation policy that on the 7th day of October, 1876, the governor was forced to issue a proclamation disbanding the rifle clubs, in order that the peace of the State and the authority of its laws should be maintained. At and before this time the laws of the State were powerless to protect its citizens in their rights, and the sheriff of Aiken County telegraphed September 19, 1876, to the governor that he was unable to disperse the white democrats who were under arms in that county. It had been reported that the colored people had armed and commenced a riot.

AIKEN, SOUTH CAROLINA, September 19.

To Governor D. H. CHAMBERLAIN:

I have just returned from the reported riot. I have not seen or heard of any fighting; saw no colored men under arms, nor could I hear of any. They had dispersed, and none could be found up to a late hour last night. The whites are all under arms and re-enforcements were arriving. I was powerless to disband them. The country is under a great deal of excitement. This was the condition of affairs when I left that night. The United States troops left Aiken for the scene at eleven p. m. I see much excitement here. If there is further trouble I will report.

H. JORDAN,
Sheriff Aiken County.

I now desire to show, in as concise a statement as the numberless political and personal outrages committed in the State of South Carolina by the democracy will permit, how their doings worked in the various counties, and particularly in those which I have the honor to represent:

AIKEN COUNTY.

This county in 1875 had a voting population of 2,494 whites, and 3,473 colored. In 1870 Aiken was not a county. In 1872 the republican majority was 1,960; in 1874, 68 over the bolting republicans. At the last election the highest republican elector received 2,218 votes, and the highest democratic elector 2,904; the republican vote decreased 170, the democratic vote increased 584. In this county there was a large amount of fraudulent voting. In the precincts of Graniteville, Fountain Academy, Miles's Mill, and of Windsor gross frauds were perpetrated, as will be seen from the evidence:

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA,
County of Aiken:

Personally appeared before me D. W. Johnson, who, being duly sworn, says: That he is one of the managers of election of the Fountain Academy precinct, Aiken County; that deponent held the election at the precinct aforesaid on the 7th November, 1876; that at six o'clock in the afternoon of the said day deponent, with George Brodie, another manager, started to close the polls, as the law required them to do, but a crowd of some fifteen white men came up and demanded that the polls be kept open until they could vote, and although deponent and the other manager knew that the law required the polls to be closed at six o'clock in the afternoon of the day of election, yet they were afraid to refuse compliance to the demands of the crowd of white men, and the managers of said precinct were compelled to keep the polls open at said precinct for some time after six o'clock p. m., and that during said time after six o'clock they were compelled to allow about fifteen persons to vote.

Deponent has been informed and believes that a great number of votes cast at the said precinct on the day of election were illegal, as a number of the persons voting are residents of the State of Georgia, and a number of other persons voting at said precinct had voted on same day at other precincts in the county and State aforesaid. Deponent believes that had he or the other managers refused to allow the said illegal votes to be cast, that he and they would have been killed.

D. W. JOHNSON.

Sworn to before me this 9th day of November, 1876,

GEORGE C. CLYDE,
Notary Public South Carolina.

Deponent further says that if he had been present at the canvassing of the returns he should have objected to the admission of those from Graniteville, Fountain Academy, Miles's Mill, and Windsor precincts on account of the gross frauds which were committed at those precincts, of which deponent has information partly from his own personal knowledge and partly from affidavits of the managers, supervisors, and deputy marshals at those polls, which affidavits are in his possession and their existance known to the board of county canvassers.

Deponent does therefore most solemnly enter his protest against the action taken by a portion of said board on Monday, November 13, 1876, for the reasons herein stated.

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

Sworn to before me this 16th November, 1876.

H. H. D. BYRON,
Notary Public.

This county was also the scene of much violence. The United States district attorney went there in September, and upon a casual examination found that many murders had been committed, republicans being killed on account of their political opinions. Intimidation was largely resorted to; for the political crimes committed during this campaign some five hundred warrants were issued. The number of republicans actually murdered is said to be twenty-three or twenty-four.

DAVID T. CORBIN sworn and examined.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Question. Where do you reside?

Answer. Charleston, South Carolina.

Q. What office do you hold?

A. United States district attorney for this district.

Q. How long have you been district attorney?

A. Since April, 1867.

Q. What steps did you take to ascertain whether there had been any violation of the laws of the United States at the last election in Aiken County, in this State?

A. About the middle of September I went to Aiken County, taking a United States commissioner with me, to investigate the troubles that had been reported to me in a general way. Upon a very casual examination, I found that a large number of murders had been committed.

Mr. ABBOTT. I object. Anything that the witness knows of his own personal knowledge of course he may state.

The WITNESS. It was alleged that large numbers of murders of colored people had been committed on account of their political sentiments and on account of their race and color. I proceeded to investigate those charges, and called before me and before the commissioner some two or three hundred witnesses, and took their testimony in writing, at great length. I had a stenographer with me to assist in the investigation. The witnesses were all sworn. Upon the affidavits thus made before me, I caused about five hundred warrants to be issued for the arrest of parties charged with those crimes in Aiken County.

Q. Crimes committed during this current year?

A. Yes, sir; during August, September, and October.

Q. What amount of testimony did you take in the form of affidavits?

A. I took about one thousand pages of legal-cap paper and examined about two hundred or two hundred and twenty witnesses.
Q. You have that testimony now?
A. I have, at my office.
Q. You are ready to produce it to the committee, if they desire?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Have you prepared a tabulated statement of the names of persons charged with crimes in that county, with the names of the witnesses in part on whose affidavits they were arrested, and the number of persons who were alleged to have been killed or injured in that county during the year?
A. I have.
Q. Can you produce it?
A. This is the statement, [producing a paper.]
Q. This signature is yours?
A. Yes, sir; I have certified to that as from the records of my office.
Mr. LAWRENCE offered the statement in evidence.
Mr. ABBOTT objected to its reception.
Q. What number of persons are alleged to have been killed in that county during this year?
A. Twenty-three or twenty-four, I think, in that county during this season.
Q. All colored men?
A. All colored.
Q. State whether any investigations were made in regard to other counties?
A. Very slight investigations were made in Edgefield and Laurens and Barnwell Counties by the United States commissioners, but they were not lawyers, nor did they have the advice of lawyers, and they made very little progress.
Q. Have the investigations been completed in the counties which you have just named?
A. No, sir; they are right in their incipiency.
Q. So far as those investigations have gone, can you state the number of alleged violations of the laws of the United States by acts against colored men in any one of those counties?
A. No, sir; I don't think I have sufficient evidence to indicate, except in a very general way, the number of violations of law. From information which has come to me in my official capacity, I have reason to believe that they are very numerous.

BARNWELL COUNTY.

This county by the census of 1875 had a voting population of 2,583 white and 4,734 colored voters. In the year 1870 the republican majority was 1,683; in 1872, 1,942; in 1874, 1,477; in the last election the highest republican elector received 2,837 votes, the highest democratic elector received 3,895 votes. The republican vote decreased 960, the democratic vote increased 1,575. In this county the republicans lost a large number of votes by murder, violence, and fraud.

District Attorney Corbin testified as follows:

Question. What is the character of the crimes alleged before you upon sworn testimony which you have now in your possession?
Answer. Eight or ten murders of colored men in Laurens, and in Barnwell County some ten or fifteen murders of colored men; but, as I said before, I have had no opportunity to personally investigate them. I have the names of the colored men alleged to have been killed and the witnesses who have made the affidavits, and I can furnish those to the committee.
Q. You have the sworn testimony of the witnesses?
A. Simply affidavits furnished me by the commissioner.
Q. What other crimes have you sworn testimony of having been committed against colored persons during this year?
A. Whipping on account of their political sentiments or because they were going to vote the republican ticket, and quite a large number of them have been wounded, have been shot at, and have escaped with slight wounds. The crimes range from murder down to flogging and intimidation in lesser degrees; threats to turn them off the land; threats to turn them into the road; threats to kill them, &c.
* * * * * * *
Q. By white men; democrats?
A. Yes, sir; they claimed to be. The morning I left my residence I was coming down town to the village, (I live in the suburbs of the village;) that was the first I knew of the Ellenton riot. I was coming down the morning after the Robinson Bridge affair, and I saw about fifty mounted men in their shirt-sleeves, with double-barreled shot-guns and rifles, in front of the store. I walked into the store to protect myself; I thought the crowd looked somewhat angry. Several of them came into the store and remarked that they were going to clean out the damned negroes that morning. I got around behind the counter for fear some of them might pitch into me; and I heard some one in the crowd remark, (I don't know who he was,) "There is that damned son of a bitch, Osborne; best commence on him first."
Q. State if you know anything of threats made by democrats owning lands against tenants on their lands in case they should vote the republican ticket.
A. O, that has been a common remark all through the county. I have heard it time and again in my presence, that if the colored men did not vote with them this time——

Political meetings were broken up, and such as could be held were at the risk of life.

Mr. Carpenter testified as follows:

I was sitting in the hotel after the meeting with Senator Smith, when Mr. Burke the proprietor of the hotel, came in and wanted to introduce a man named Dr. Carroll, a very prominent planter and doctor in that neighborhood. We sat down and talked perhaps ten or fifteen minutes in a quiet, gentlemanly way. The doctor rose to go, and held out his hand and said: "Now, Mr. Carpenter, this meeting has been a failure, so far as we are concerned." Said I, "Doctor, what do you mean by that? You have certainly had more men than we have had, and you have all the abuse on your side." "Well," said he, "it has been a failure in this, that they didn't kill eight or ten men to-day." Said I, "Doctor, you don't mean that you wanted any men killed to-day?" Says he, "I mean exactly what I say; we can't do anything with these niggers till we kill off eight or ten of their leaders." I asked Senator Smith, "Is that a sane man or a lunatic?" He said, "Well, he means just exactly what he says; he is a prominent man and a planter, and he means exactly what he says."

At a meeting in Midway where Governor Chamberlain, and Judge Hoge, at present a member upon this floor, spoke, the republicans were surrounded by armed riflemen and prohibited from speaking:

We arrived there about two o'clock in the morning, and knew nothing about a joint meeting until about eleven o'clock in the day, when it was intimated by several persons who came to call upon the governor that they expected to have a joint meeting, and when we got on the stand we saw large numbers of these rifle-club men coming along two by two; they had no red shirts on at that time; that was before they introduced the red-shirt business.
We found that they demanded half the time. The democrats formed on the left of the stand, and the republicans on the right, the parties being separated by ropes, drawn out from the stand. Governor Chamberlain was introduced, and spoke for perhaps half an hour before any intimation of a joint discussion was given. Then somebody in the audience mounted the box and pointed to the governor and said, "How long is he going to speak?" Mr. Osborne, the county chairman, said, "This is a republican meeting and his time is not limited." This man turns to the crowd and says, "He can speak an hour, can't he?" They replied, "Yes, yes." The governor turned to me and said, "Shall we agree to a joint discussion?" I replied, "This is your meeting, governor; not mine." I had made up my mind not to agree, but he thought we had better agree to it. The governor spoke his hour, and they put up a man named Simms to follow him. After he got through I was introduced, and I spoke nearly an hour, including the interruptions, when Mr. George D. Tilghman was introduced. For the first ten or fifteen minutes of his speech he was quite moderate. While he was speaking I was sitting behind him on the stand, and he turned to his people on the left and said, "Why don't you hang these men; hang 'em here, and hang 'em now; shoot them down like the dogs they are."

At Robbins precinct, to be referred to hereafter, the polls were destroyed and the officers dispersed. Subsequently the poll was again opened and a majority of 1,317 votes polled for the republican ticket. Through the fear of one of the county commissioners, who failed to receive this box, it was never included in the general canvass. Had it been counted, there would have been no dispute about the election of the republican ticket in South Carolina to-day. It would have given the republicans an absolute majority for governor and a majority in the Legislature. A great many Georgians voted in this county and repeated at various polls.

At Allendale precinct the polls were blocked almost the entire day by democrats, and republicans were deprived of the privilege of voting; armed men interfered and drove republicans from the poll; threats were made to voters that if they supported the republican ticket they would have to go away from their homes. The presence of the United States troops was at one time necessary to clear the polls.

Ben Hughes testified as follows:

Question. State what you know, if anything, respecting voters being driven away from the polls or denied the right to vote.
Answer. On the morning of the election I got to the polls between five and six o'clock to act as United States deputy marshal, for which I was commissioned. The democrats had the polls in possession when I got there, captured—between two and three hundred of them. Between nine and ten o'clock, or may be later, I asked them would they not give the republicans a chance to vote on that day. The answer was 'turned to me, "Damn the republicans, and you too!" I waited until twelve or one o'clock. I then goes to Captain McLaghlan. He comes to the poll with me. After he came, the whites would come to the door that we went in at and locked the door that we went out, and they then would bring in the democrats; bring in men at the side door, and obstruct the way of the colored people voting. I then came out. I found between two and three hundred men going off that had not voted. I said to them, "Men, this will not do! See! come back and vote." Says they, "They will be here until night and we can't get to vote, and we may be killed on the wayside as we go home." I then goes to Captain McLaghlan again. Captain McLaghlan said to me, says he, "If you call for the Federal troops to come out, I will have to turn them out, but (says he) if there is any way to stop the Federal troops from going out, let us do it." He came down himself about that time. The white people then entirely backed off from the polls while he was present. As soon as he left they taken possession again.
Q. How soon did he leave?
A. I suppose in about twenty-five or thirty minutes. They then said, "Our object is that none of you vote here unless you vote for Wade Hampton." About that time two or three dozen of them got at me with their pistols pointed on me, some of the parties.
* * * * * * *
Q. What do you know, if anything, of republicans going away from the polls and not voting?
A. There was between two and three hundred, to the best of my knowledge, didn't vote at all.
* * * * * * *
Q. What, if anything, was said by any parties about not renting land to republicans in case they voted the republican ticket?
A. That was the neighborhood chat among them. That has been told to me myself very often; in other words, I know parties who were discharged from off the places on that account.
Q. State if any of the democrats told you that they would discharge republicans from their lands if they did vote the republican ticket?
A. They did, sir.
Q. Did you hear anything of the sort?
A. I did.
Q. What time in the afternoon or evening did those republicans go away from the polls without voting?
A. They began to leave the polls from twelve until late in the afternoon.

Robbins precinct polled 1,317 republican majority, giving for each republican candidate the highest vote polled. The reason for this extraordinarily large vote is found in the fact that the republican voters from the surrounding precincts were forced to leave their various polls, and congregate at Robbins precinct. This poll opened at the usual hour, and voting proceeded until the hour of twelve m., or thereabouts. Up to that time the republicans were largely in a majority, and the prospects seemed favorable for an election with only the usual threats, &c. About twelve m., on that day the polls were suddenly fired upon, and the officers and others forced to leave. The box was also destroyed, and has not been seen since. After the firing the republican officers returned, and at a small distance from the original poll, opened another poll. This they could legally do, the republican officers being in a majority. At this poll there were polled some 1,317 votes, as will be seen by the testimony of William I. Allen, one of the managers:

Question. Who were the managers of the last election at Robbins precinct?
Answer. Myself, William Bush, and Mr. Wallace Bailey. The supervisor was B. K. Motte.
Q. Who were the marshals?
A. Only one, L. W. Mimms.
Q. Do you remember who the other supervisor was?
A. No, sir.
Q. Was Mr. Motte the democrat or the republican?

A. Republican.
Q. What time did you get to the precinct the day of the election?
A. About six o'clock, I suppose. I didn't have a time-piece.
Q. How many people had assembled when you reached there?
A. I suppose there was between three and four hundred.
Q. How long before the voting commenced?
A. About a quarter of an hour after I got there.
Q. Was there any disturbance during that day in the voting?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What time?
A. Between eleven and twelve o'clock; near noon.
Q. Up to that time had the voting continued without interruption?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How many had voted?
A. I disremember exactly how many, but I think there was about two hundred and eighty that had voted. That is according to my recollection. The papers got destroyed.
Q. Can you judge how many democrats and how many republicans had voted?
A. Well, there was about forty whites who had voted, and we considered them democrats.
Q. And were the balance republican tickets?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What was the disturbance?
A. Firing into the depot where we was managing.
Q. Firing into the building?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you see where the balls went through the boards?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Whereabout was this firing; how many shots?
A. There was three right after one another just as fast as they could come, and then it continued again about three more, and again until there was about ten, according to my recollection.
Q. What was then done?
A. The people all ran away then. The colored and whites all left the house where they were holding the election.
Q. Did they go out of the building?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. You went out?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How was it with the people outside?
A. Part of the democrats, they, I suppose, had arms in another house there.
Mr. PHILIPS. Do not state what you suppose; only what you know.
The WITNESS. They did have arms there.
Mr. PHILIPS. State what you saw.
A. Well, I saw that. I heard them, "Close up, democrats, and all you republicans stand back."
Q. What did you hear them say?
A. I heard them say out there, "Democrats, close up." I don't know who said it, because I was in the house.
Q. Did you see white people have arms there after that?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. You say you all left the building; now what further occurred?
A. We went off, the managers and others, and consulted what to do, and we considered that we would hold the election at another place a little distance from the place where we were shot at in.
Q. Who held that consultation?
A. Myself, William Bush, and Mr. Motte.
Q. What did the white people do?
A. I don't know; they went off, and I don't know where they went.
Q. Do you mean that they left the locality?
A. They left the locality altogether.
Q. Did they go away together?
A. Yes, sir; they went off in a crowd.
Q. What did you do?
A. We held another box and persons came and voted.
Q. Where did you open that box?
A. Between a quarter and a half a mile from the house where we had the election.
Q. Was it at or near any building?
A. Yes, sir; an old school-house that had been taught.
Q. What became of the ballot-box that you used that forenoon?
A. We don't know what became of it. We left it in the depot.
Q. You left it there when you fled?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Have you ever seen it since?
A. I have not.
Q. You don't know what became of it?
A. No, sir.
Q. How long did the voting continue at that point?
A. It continued until about six o'clock.
Q. From what points in the county did people come there and vote?
A. Do you mean from what precincts?
Q. Any way you choose to answer it.
A. Well, there were other men that I knew was from other precincts.
Q. What precincts?
A. Some from Millett's and some from Red Oak, which I knew by sight.
Q. How many votes were cast there that afternoon?
A. There was 1,317 votes.
Q. Did any persons vote there more than once?
A. No, sir; not to my recollection.
Q. There was no repeating?
A. No, sir; not at all.
Q. Were the votes taken in the usual way, as you had been taking them in the forenoon up to the time of the interruption?
A. Do you mean did we swear them in the same way?
Q. Yes.
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Each elector was sworn?
A. Yes, sir; they were sworn.
Q. What was done at the close of the voting by yourself and the other managers?
A. We taken the box on home. The votes were counted, and then we taken the box.
Q. Was any return made there anything more than counting them?
A. Yes, sir. The returns were made out and signed.
Q. Signed by whom?
A. By Supervisor B. K. Motte.
Q. Did you assist in the canvass?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. State whether you signed the return.
A. Yes, sir; I signed it also.
Q. Who was the other manager?
A. William Bush.
Q. Did he sign?
A. Yes, sir; he signed.

This fact is corroborated by B. K. Motte, the United States supervisor.

B. K. MOTTE sworn and examined.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Question. What is your age and your residence?
Answer. I am twenty-three years of age and reside in Barnwell. That is where I call my home now, but my real home is in Charleston.
Q. What office did you hold, if any, at the last presidential election?
A. United States supervisor.
Q. At what place?
A. Robbins precinct.
Q. State what occurred as to the election.
A. The polls were opened, I think, between six and half past six at Robbins, and the voting continued until between eleven and twelve o'clock, as near as I can recollect, and then the building in which we were voting was fired upon.
Q. By whom?
A. I could not say, sir.
Q. Where did the firing come from?
A. That depends upon the direction I was sitting in. I was sitting at the table—the window was on that end of the house—as if I was sitting with my face toward that window.
Q. Did it come from the east, west, north, or south?
A. That depends upon the direction that I was sitting. It came from the east. It came from across the railroad.
Q. State whether any shots were fired into the building.
A. Yes, sir; the first shot that was fired came directly, or three shots came directly over my head. The ball passed through three wallings. It came from that side and through a little room we was in, and out on the other side of the depot.
Q. Were the three shots in succession or all at once?
A. Just one after another; it seemed from the succession in which it was fired as if it was fired from some gun that can be loaded very quick. It just came, bang! and then, in a second of time, another bang—just in that succession.
Q. Did the voting continue there?
A. Yes, sir; it was continued; not directly there in that place.
Q. What became of the ballot-box that was being used there?
A. We left it there.
Q. Where did you go?
A. We went, I reckon, about between a quarter and a half mile, and the voting began there again.
Q. At what place?
A. It was at a school-house. They told me it was a school-house. I know there had been teaching there before.
Q. You commenced the election there again?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. You did not take the same ballot-box with you?
A. No, sir; we had nothing to do with the box at all. We left it there.
Q. About how soon did you commence the voting at the school-house?
A. Well, I could not give any exact time that we commenced it; but as near as I can say, if it had been twelve o'clock, it could not have been much past twelve.
Q. How long did you continue there?
A. As near as I can recollect it was after the sun was down, at any rate when I left there.
Q. Do you know how many men voted there that afternoon?
A. Yes, sir; I think 1,317, as near as I can say.
Q. What place did you occupy when the voting was going on at the second voting?
A. I acted as a clerk.
Q. What did you do?
A. I registered the names of the voters.
Q. State whether you know that that number of persons voted.
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Colored men or white men?
A. Colored.
Q. When the voting was over, who counted the votes?
A. I am the one that counted them.
Q. Who assisted you?
A. Mr. Allen.
Q. Was a return made of the votes?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Was the managers' return signed?
A. Yes, sir.

The fact as to the firing upon the poll and the establishing of a new poll is also corroborated by the testimony of the United States marshal:

L. W. MIMMS (colored) sworn and examined.

By Mr. LAPHAM:

Question. Where were you on the day of election?
Answer. I was United States deputy marshal at Robbins precinct.
Q. Where were you that day?
A. I was there at Robbins.
Q. What time did you go to Robbins that morning?
A. I arrived there about half after six o'clock. I suppose it was about that time of day.
Q. Where was the poll to be held?
A. In the railroad depot.
Q. When you reached there were there many people there?
A. Right smart of them was there when I got there.
* * * * * * *
Q. You found them there when you got there?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Where were they?
A. They was around the depot and about there in the place.
Q. What time did they commence voting?
A. They commenced voting about the same time that I got there, or a little after ward.
Q. Was there any time that the voting was interrupted?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. About what time in the forenoon was it?
A. About twelve o'clock in the day, to my judgment.
Q. How was it interrupted?
A. About that time of day there was some firing commenced in the woods. I was on the north side of the depot, and the firing commenced on the south side.
Q. Firing in what direction?
A. Right toward the depot.
Q. The building?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Had you seen any guns before you heard the firing?
A. No, sir; I never saw any at all. When the firing commenced I ran up on the railroad to see who it was. I heard balls striking the house, and I thought it was inside the depot, probably, and I ran up to command peace.

Q. You ran up where?
A. I saw one man dodging behind a stump. I did not know who he was, but it was so rapid at that time that I ran back.
Q. What was so rapid?
A. The firing.
Q. Was he a white or a colored man that you saw?
A. A white man.
Q. Go on and tell the story in your own way.
A. In a few minutes all the white men was armed. They ran off about twenty yards from the depot in a little store. I asked them to please be peaceable, and I deputed fifteen of them to assist me in making the arrests of those rowdies in the woods.
Q. The men who were there at the poll?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. When you made that order or request, what occurred?
A. All of them refused; none heard to me at all.
Q. What did they say?
A. One said, "God damn it, wheel to the rear; they will fire on us back here."
Q. How long were you gone from Robbins?
A. I suppose it was not probably over two hours and a half at the outside. I rode, and I loped all the way there.

* * * * * * *

Q. What time was it when you got back to Robbins?
A. I could not tell that; I had no time-piece with me.
Q. Did you find the white men there when you returned?
A. All the white men and colored men both had dispersed. The colored men had gone off between a quarter and a half mile, and was taking votes out there.

* * * * * * *

Q. Did you notice whether the colored people had the same ballot-box or another one?
A. Yes, sir; I particularly noticed that; they had another box.
Q. Do you know what became of the box they were using in the morning?
A. No, sir. They left it right there in the depot, I suppose.
Q. Did you see it?
A. No, sir; I only saw the managers, and they told me they left it there.
Q. Who left it there?
A. The managers.
Q. But what became of it; do you know?
A. No, sir; I do not.
Q. Have you ever seen it since that?
A. No, sir; I have not.
Q. Who were the managers? Give their names.
A. J. W. Allen and B. K. Motte were the managers when I got there, and William Bush.
Q. Do you remember who the tally-clerk was?
A. B. K. Motte was acting as clerk and supervisor both, I believe.
Q. Who were acting as managers where they were voting when you got back?
A. They were acting when I returned.

After the polls had closed, the votes were counted and the returns signed by the officers. On the following Friday the managers, with the box in their possession, on their way to the county seat, where the board of county canvassers held their sessions, were stopped by armed men and forced to go back. By taking another route they reached the town, and going to the building where the canvassers were in session called out the chairman, Mr. Knopf, and offered him the box with the election returns. The testimony of Mr. Allen is given:

Q. What day of the week was this?
A. That was on Friday, according to my recollection. It was three days after the election.
Q. The box and the returns remained at your house how long?
A. The box and the returns remained two days. The reason we did not get to Barnwell early enough for them to take the box was that we were stopped on the way.
Q. How were you stopped?
A. By an armed body of white men.
Q. Where was that?
A. That was between my house and Salt Ketcher.
Q. What occurred there?
A. The armed body of men asked where was we from.
Q. How many of them were there?
A. I suppose about fifteen.
Q. On horseback?
A. No, sir; walking.
Q. What arms had they?
A. Some had double-barreled guns, and some had rifles.
Q. Did you notice whether they had any side-arms—any pistols?
A. No, sir.
Q. Tell what occurred.
A. They asked us where we was from, and I told them that we was from Robbins and had the box and poll-list. They said to us, "You damned sons of bitches! If you don't turn back I will put a hole through you, and that damned quick!" and upon these remarks we turned back.
Q. You managers turned back?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Who was with you?
A. Bill Bush, one of the managers.
Q. Where did you go?
A. We went another road and went around and come up on the back of Barnwell Village, the county seat.
Q. And in that way you reached Barnwell at what time?
A. About nine o'clock.
Q. Whom did you see when you arrived?
A. When I arrived there I saw Mr. Knopf, one of the county officers.
Q. What is his first name?
A. A. Knopf, I think is his name. That was on Friday evening.
Q. Did you see any others of the county officers?
A. Not that night.
Q. What did you inform Mr. Knopf?
A. I told him that we had the box of Robbins Precinct and the returns.
Q. Where was he?
A. He came outside of the house where they were canvassing the votes. It was at the place where they were canvassing.
Q. What did he say, if anything, in reply?
A. He told us that he was afraid to take the box.

Mr. Knopf refused to receive the returns from fear. His testimony was:

Q. Who were they?
A. William Bush and W. J. Allen, I think. Allen I did not speak to; Bush is the one that I spoke to.
Q. What was said?
A. He called to me at the time while we were canvassing. I suppose there were twelve or fifteen in the room where we were sitting, and I heard my name called. I saw Bush, and he said, making a motion, "I have brought the return from Robbins." I said, "Have you got the box, too?" Said he, "Yes." At the moment I said, "I shall receive nothing from Robbins." This was at nine o'clock at night. He insisted for a while on my taking it. He said, "That is as soon as I could come." Said I, "You get away just as quick as you can." I would not touch it.
Q. What reason did you assign for that?
A. Well, I feared to receive it.
Q. Didn't you say so to Mr. Bush?
A. Yes, sir; I tried to cut it as short as I could to get him away.

The managers then left and went to Blockville and returned the next morning and again presented the box. They were too late; the board had done its work and adjourned. Going to Blackville, where two of the commissioners lived, they offered it again, and Mr. Generette agreed to take it and sign a supplemental county return.

Q. Who was present when it was presented on the road?
A. The other commissioner. Mr. Knopf and myself were riding in a buggy, coming from Barnwell. After we got to Blackville I received the returns in the presence of Mr. Knopf. Mr. Knopf refused to sign the return. He said that he didn't think it would be safe; that he knew that if he did sign it he could not live in the county. I told him that I would sign it, because I thought I had a right to do it.
Q. Then what was done with the returns?
A. That same evening I took the train and came up here to Columbia, and on Tuesday I presented it to the State board of canvassers.
Q. You gave it to the secretary of state?
A. Yes, sir, or his clerk.
Q. Were the board of officers in session when you delivered it?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you state to them the reason why it was not in the county returns?
A. Yes, sir; I put in a statement to that effect.
Q. Did you make an affidavit?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And filed it with the secretary of state?
A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Knopf still refused to receive the returns from fear of some democratic depredation. Under these circumstances the vote was lost, the law requiring the signature of two commissioners.

That Mr. Knopf was justified in his fears can be seen from the evidence of Mr. Generette, who testifies that armed men dressed in red shirts were in the building where the canvassing was done:

Question. You have said that Mr. Knopf spoke of the number of men who were there. What is the fact about it?
Answer. Well, they were there, about thirty-five or forty of them, dressed in red shirts, and they had their guns with them.
Q. What were they, democrats or republicans?
A. All democrats.
Q. Were there any republicans there who were armed?
A. Not a single one, save myself and Mr. Knopf.
Q. Did they stay there all night?
A. Not the whole crowd of them, but a good many of them staid the whole night, and some slept around the building.
Q. Did any returns come from Cainan's Fair Church?
A. No, sir; the box was presented to us by that manager, with a blank we gave them to make out the return, and a statement, and we, each one of us, looked at the writing on the other side.

The majority of the committee have endeavored to break the force of the above facts by attempting to prove that the republican officers left with the democrats, among them B. K. Mott, supervisor; the testimony of Mr. Mott refutes the fact:

Q. He went off at the same time with you?
A. No, sir; I don't think he did.
Q. Do not you know whether he did go away with you?
A. I can't safely say that he did go away with me.
Q. Cannot you safely say who went away with you?
A. I should say I went off from the depot with no man.
Q. And you will not swear that you did not go with Dr. Turner?
A. Yes; I will swear that I did not go with Dr. Turner.
Q. Do you mean to say that you did not go—you, and Bailey, and Bush, and Maxson—three or four miles from that voting-place? Do not you know that you four went off together?
A. No, sir; I would not swear it, nor I did not go three nor four miles with him.
Q. Well, did you not go off a couple of miles with him?
A. No, sir; I did not go off a couple of miles.
Q. Did not you go beyond that school-house with Dr. Turner?
A. No, sir.
Q. You did not "ride and tie" with Dr. Turner?
A. No, sir, I did not.
Q. I want you to be sure of this, because you know, of course, whether you went off with Turner, Bailey, Bush, and the other man.
A. I am positive on oath that I did not go off "riding and tie" with Dr. Turner.
Q. Did you go with Mr. William Bush and Mr. Daniel Mixson and Dr. Turner?
A. No, sir.
Q. Are you sure?
A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. COCHRANE:

Q. Or with any or ether of them, off beyond that school-house?
A. No, sir.
Q. And you never had any conversation afterward with Dr. Turner about this matter?
A. No, sir.

The only remaining person whose testimony is required in the chain of facts is that of Mr. William Bush, the other republican manager, who was compelled by illness to be absent, as the testimony of L. W. Mimms will show:

By Mr. LAPHAM:

Question. You know Bush who was manager the of election?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. When did you last see him?
A. I saw him last Saturday morning.

Q. Where was he?
A. He was in bed at his house, sick.
Q. What was the matter?
A. Chills and fever.

That a deliberate attempt was to be made to destroy the vote of this poll is evidenced by the fact that the democratic commissioner, without the knowledge of his colleagues, had waited upon a leading democratic lawyer asking his attendance, by joint request of the board. The action was voluntary and without authority from the board.

Question. How was it brought about that he acted as legal adviser for the board there?
Answer. I think Mr. Blanton, the democratic canvasser, got him there.
Q. Did you see him bring him there?
A. O, he was already living there.
Q. But did you see him bring him into the room?
A. No, sir; the reason I say that is, when we met a few days before Mr. Blanton says to me, "We ought to have counsel, and we ought to have a guard." I said we didn't want anything of the kind. I told him I didn't see what we wanted with either of them.

The democrats also sought to prove that Mr. Allen had not been designated as a manager for Robbins precinct. Upon this point Mr. Knopf, who appointed the precint managers, testifies as follows:

By Mr. LAPHAM:

Question. You have stated a conversation with your associate, Mr. Blanton, at a meeting before the election?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. How long before?
A. Five or six days.
Q. Where was it?
A. At Blackville.
Q. That was when you met to appoint managers?
A. Yes, sir. We had two meetings to appoint managers.
Q. Who were appointed managers for the Robbins precinct?
A. We revised the list right smart at the second meeting, and I don't remember. We agreed that each commissioner should give one.
Q. Do you remember whether you transferred one from Cainan's Fair?
A. I made transfers of several boxes, and so did Mr. Blanton—in the second meeting.
Q. In the revision, do you remember whether you transferred one manager from Cainan's to Robbins; if so, who was it?
A. The first meeting, I think it was, I had Bush, Nixon, and I don't remember the democratic manager; and the next meeting Mr. Blanton himself, I think, changed the democratic manager, and I made one change.
Q. What change?
A. I took Allen. We had a general changing, so that I don't remember the names unless I had a list. We made a general change.
Q. I am only inquiring about the Robbins precinct.
A. As well as I can remember, it was J. W. Allen, Mr. Bush, and Dr. Bell.

At the time these managers were appointed a proposition was made by Mr. Blanton that a guard would be needed when the county canvass was made. From the testimony of Mr. Gennerette it will be seen the guard was there:

Question. At which meeting was it that Mr. Blanton advised you that you had better have counsel and a guard?
Answer. The second meeting.
Q. On what occasion was it that he said to you, "We ought to have counsel and a guard;" there that day?
A. No; when we canvassed the votes.
Q. Did he state any reason why you had better have a guard?
A. No, sir; he did not. I said we had no need of anything of the kind.
Q. Was Mr. Gennerette present?
A. Yes, sir; I think he was.
Q. You were all three together?
A. Yes, sir; I think we were all three together.

At Red Oak precinct a democrat barred the door of the poll and frequently voters had to stoop to vote. The democrats here were armed with knives and pistols which they openly flourished.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, DISTRICT SOUTH CAROLINA,
County of Barnwell:

Personally comes before me Wesley S. Dickson, who, on oath, says that he was at Red Oak precinct on November 7, 1876, holding the position of supervisor of election. No republicans were allowed to come into the house where the box was without a great deal of trouble. A democrat, by name of Lee, stood with his arms across the door and kept them back. He was no officer and had no authority. Frequently a voter had to stoop down and pass under his arms. Persons were at the gate with pistols and knives in their hands. Deponent did not dare to challenge any one, although he knew that a great many were there from Georgia who voted once or twice or oftener.

WESLEY S. DICKSON.

Sworn to before me this 13th of November, 1876.

F. H. EATON,
United States Commissioner.

At Millet's precinct open violence was practiced the entire day. A large number of Georgians voted, and the condition of affairs was such that before the polls had closed the republican officers were forced to abandon their posts; the United States supervisor was obliged to flee to save his life:

BLACKVILLE, SOUTH CAROLINA, November 15, 1876.

SIR: Herewith inclosed find my report of intimidation. I endeavored to act in accordance with the instructions sent me. I discharged my duties faithfully as long as I was allowed to do so, which was up to three o'clock p. m., 7th instant. Then, to save my life, I were compelled to abandon my post, in consequence of which fact I am unable to make any report of the number of votes polled for electors and Congressman. Not only my life was threatened, but that of most every man that professed republicanism. There were men at my precinct that came from Georgia—thirty-three in number—which was the leading men in intimidating the colored voters; and notwithstanding I tried hard, I could not find out the name of but one of the number mentioned above, which you will find in my report.

Your obedient servant,

S. H. BLOCKER.

Mr. SAMUEL T. POINIER,
Chief Supervisor, Charleston, S. C.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF SUPERVISOR OF ELECTIONS,
DISTRICT OF SOUTH CAROLINA,
Columbia, December 19, 1876.

This is to certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the election return of Millett's precinct, made to me by S. H. Blocker—whose signature is attached thereto—the republican supervisor duly appointed for said precinct.

SAMUEL T. POINIER,
Chief Supervisor of Elections, District of South Carolina.

About twelve o'clock a crowd of white men, numbering from fifty to one hundred, surrounded the polls. The yelling was such that the managers' voice could not be heard. These men clasped hands and stood compactly, so that no republican could get near the box. This continued for half an hour or more, during which time none but democrats voted. About one o'clock my friends begged me to leave, as my life was in danger. I replied that we had better stay a little longer. About two o'clock about fifty or sixty mounted men, some of whom had pistols in their hands, came galloping up from the direction of Robbins. They came to the ballot-box on their horses and used all sorts of abusive language to deponent and the colored manager. They yelled and shouted at the top of their voices, saying that every damned nigger that voted the republican ticket should see hell before many days. Deponent leaned toward one of the managers, asking him what they should do for protection, when Seabrook Dunbar knocked him in the head, saying, "Damn you, no whispering here." About this time deponent went out to get something to eat, and saw in a store belonging to Mr. Dunn, on the same lot as the polling-place, fifty guns stacked. These guns were taken back to Georgia the day following.

Deponent heard from the cook that his life was in danger, and accordingly left about three o'clock. Rode thirty miles that night to save himself.

The following were the most prominent in acts of intimidation—proof can be furnished in every instance—namely: Stephen S. Furse, Seabrook Dunbar, H. D. Hankerson, L. H. Johnson, W. H. Esterling, J. R. James, Sandy Odom, besides others.

S. H. BLOCKER.

Sworn to before me this 13th day of November, 1876.

F. H. EATON,
United States Commissioner.

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, OFFICE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Columbia, December 11, 1876.

I certify that the foregoing are true copies of the affidavits of L. W. Mims, Benjamin G. Hughes, Thomas H. Moses, Wesley S. Dickson, and Sumter H. Blocker, now on file in this office.

[SEAL.]

H. E. HAYNE,
Secretary of State.

From this poll (Millett's) a large number of voters went to Robbins precinct:

Question. What do you know, if anything, of colored republican voters leaving Millett's precinct polling-place to go to any other place to vote?
Answer. I saw the leader apparently of about a dozen or more men, and heard him say to these men, "Come, let's go to Robbins; I can't vote here."
Q. How many men did you see start in the direction of Robbins?
A. I saw about two dozen start in that direction.
Q. Do you know of your own knowledge of others going?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. On the day of the election?
A. Yes, sir; some came to me and they took my advice: men who were around the box came to me and asked my advice. I told them I was there as supervisor, and I could give no advice. He told me, the man that was speaking to me, "We are going to Robbins." He appeared to be the leader of about thirty men.
Q. He was a colored man?
A. Yes, sir; all republican voters.
Q. State the reason colored men went there; was it because of any obstruction or difficulty thrown in the way of their voting by white men?
A. Yes, sir. If any of these men would start toward the box a dozen or more white men would run right up to him and carry him to the box, and say: "What ticket are you going to vote?" and he would say the republican ticket——

An extract from the testimony of J. Hagood is furnished to prove the fact of the presence of Georgians on election-day:

Question. There may have been armed men there whom you did not see?
Answer. Of course, sir; it was a dark night; but not in the house. If they had been in the house I should certainly have seen them. There is one little matter in respect to which I, perhaps, was not strictly accurate in my first examination. I was asked if I had heard of persons intending to come from Georgia to vote. I replied to that that I had vaguely, and I mentioned one person I had heard it from, a railroad conductor. Then I was asked whether after the election I had heard that any had come. I replied, "No," without any qualification. But, upon reflection, I remember that one person told me that there were some Georgians, as well as I can remember he said about fifteen or twenty, at the Robbins box. I asked him what became of them after the Robbins box was abandoned, and he said they went, or that he supposed they went, and voted at the other box.

At Blackville precinct, in Barnwell County, the managers' returns showed no votes for Timothy Hurley, one of the republican candidates for elector. The testimony of several witnesses who voted at that poll for Mr. Hurley, together with the testimony of the officers of the precinct, clearly proves the fact that the omission of Mr. Hurley's name from the original return to the county canvassers was a clerical error on the part of the democratic clerk, and the majority of the committee so expressed themselves. The return to the United States supervisor of elections for South Carolina is given:

Return of the election held at Blackville precinct, Barnwell County, November 7, 1876.

The whole number of votes given for electors was 1,164, of which—

Theo. G. Barker received	467
Samuel McGowan received	467
John W. Harrington received	466
John Isaac Ingram received	466
William Wallace received	466
John B. Erwin received	466
Robert Aldrich received	464
Christopher C. Bowen received	695
John Winsmith received	695
Thomas B. Johnson received	695
Timothy Hurley received	695
William B. Nash received	696

Wilson Cook received 697
William F. Myers received 696
The whole number of votes given for member of Congress was 1,164:
Of which G. D. Tillman received 467
Of which Robert Smalls received 691

We, the undersigned supervisors, certify that the above is a correct return of the votes cast at the election held at Blackville precinct, of Barnwell County, on the 7th day of November, 1876.

JOHN R. BELLINGER,
J. H. JOHNSON,
Supervisors.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF SUPERVISOR OF ELECTIONS,
DISTRICT OF SOUTH CAROLINA,
Columbia, December 19, 1876.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the election return of Blackville precinct, Barnwell County; that John R. Bellinger and J. H. Johnson, whose names are affixed thereto, were the democratic and republican supervisors, duly appointed, for said precinct.

SAMUEL T. POINIER,
Chief Supervisor of Elections, District of South Carolina.

BEAUFORT COUNTY.

In the year 1875 Beaufort County had a voting population divided as follows: Colored, 8,241; white, 1,760. In the election of 1870 the republican majority was 5,143; in 1872, 3,550; in 1874, 2,702 over the bolting republican. In the last election the highest republican elector received 7,574 votes and the highest democratic elector 2,251 votes. The republican vote was increased over the vote for governor in 1874 2,796 and the democratic vote increased 175.

In this strongly republican county much intimidation was practiced in the breaking up and disturbing of republican meetings. Wherever the republicans would peacefully assemble for the purposes of discussion they would be interrupted and surrounded by armed men. At Bronson, Lawtonville, and other places no meeting could be peacefully held; the right of free discussion was denied. At Bronson the democrats by armed force secured a joint discussion.

Question. Was it a republican meeting?
Answer. It was a republican meeting.
Q. And was called as such?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. If there was any interruption at that time, state briefly what it was.
A. Well, at the first meeting there was a disturbance. We went up there and we had a joint discussion. The democrats requested that they should be allowed to speak, and they were allowed three speakers. There were three on each side. During the discussion there was one of our speakers arose to speak. One of the democrats objected, saying that he had been previously convicted, I think; and he went on and spoke, and when he got through he referred to the objection, and this democrat, Mr. Tillinghurst, said that he was a liar. No, it was the other way; he accused Langley with something, and said he was a liar, and Tillinghurst struck Langley, and then a general mêlée ensued. We did all we could to stop it, and after awhile every thing was quieted down. The democrats went up the town, and some came with bars of iron and guns, but everything was quieted down after a while.
Q. Was that meeting appointed for a joint discussion?
A. No, sir; that was called as a republican meeting.
Q. How came it to be a joint discussion?
A. They asked that they be allowed to be represented.
Q. How many democrats were there?
A. I guess there must have been about two hundred democrats.
Q. Were they armed in any way?
A. They were armed with pistols.
Q. Were they in uniform?
A. No, sir; not at that meeting.
Q. Were they on foot or on horseback?
A. At that meeting they were on foot, most of them.
Q. Coming to the second meeting——
A. The second meeting was called for the purpose of ratifying the nomination of Hayes and Wheeler. When we were at Early Branch we received a special messenger from Bronson, who was sent around by the road on horseback, to tell us not to come up. They expected us, but they told us not to come.
Q. How did the message come?
A. It was sent around by a man.
Q. Did you go on then?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Tell what you found when you got there.
A. When we got there we found the town crowded with men.
Q. How many men did you find there?
A. There must have been three hundred and fifty. There might have been more. Some had come from Barnwell. They came on horseback.
Q. They were mounted men?
A. Yes, sir; they were mounted men.
Q. What uniform, if any, had they?
A. They had no uniform. They were not uniformed at that meeting.

At Lawtonville the same scenes were enacted:

Q. Did you go to Lawtonville?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What state of things did you find when you reached there?
A. When we reached Lawtonville we found quite a number more of the republicans than there were at Bronson, and they were all excited. After we reached there we found the Lawtonville rifle club company there; and after a while several of the other rifle clubs—one from Bronson and one from Beach Branch—rode up.
Q. Were there any there from Barnwell?
A. No, sir; I do not think so.
Q. How many men were there at Lawtonville?
A. At Lawtonville there were, I suppose, about in the neighborhood of two hundred and fifty.
Q. White men?
A. White men.
Q. How were they organized?
A. They were organized into clubs. They marched up.
Q. What arms did they have?
A. Each of them had three revolvers, or two of them.
Q. Had they any guns?
A. No, sir; not that I saw.
Q. Were they mounted or on foot?
A. They were mounted.

In fact, evidence is furnished to show it was the general practice of the democratic party to resort to measures of this kind for the purpose of intimidation:

Q. How were they armed?
A. They all had their carbines, but they were in the house at the time. They were all armed with pistols; each had two pistols strapped to his side.
Q. Had they guns also?
A. Yes, sir; they had guns.
Q. Where did they leave their guns?
A. In one of the stores there.
Q. What occurred when you got to the ground where the speaking was to be?
A. When we got to the grounds they came up; they sent a committee, and the committee informed us they wanted to have a joint discussion. Of course, the circumstances were such that we could not refuse if we wanted, and so we consented, and when we arrived there were very few republicans in town, and when we went down to the meeting there was not more than about one hundred, I suppose, of our men. The democrats came down in clubs.
Q. How many came there at the first meeting?
A. Three hundred and fifty or four hundred men, I suppose. They filed around in companies, and the different men were issuing threats. One man, for example, nearly mashed my toes, and said, I suppose for my benefit, that he didn't want any damn lies told there, and if any of us attempted to tell any of our damn lies that we would be pulled down from the stand. Several made use of such language. After we had arranged, they elected a chairman for each of the parties, and when it was suggested by one of the republicans that certain men be elected to keep order the captains of the different companies rose and said, "We will keep order so long as you tell the truth and don't tell any damn lies," and pistols were freely displayed. The men sat in their saddles and threw their pistols up, and caught them generally, which seemed in a threatening manner. And it was then agreed that each speaker should have thirty minutes, and the speaking was opened by one of our speakers, Mr. Myers, and he was interrupted considerably in the beginning, but after awhile they quieted down, and of course he had to be very cautious in what he said. The chairman of the county committee, Mr. Moore, was there, and he requested us to be very quiet. He said he could control the Beaufort men, but the Barnwell men he didn't know so well, and, to use his language, we were in a tinder-box, and they were liable to go off at any time and asked us not to allude to the recent riots. These men came from Barnwell, where these riots had occurred, in that neighborhood, and of course in our speeches we had to be prudent.

To carry out their system thoroughly rifle clubs were organized armed with rifles:

By Mr. LAPHAM:

Q. Do you know how many rifle clubs there were in your county among the democrats?
A. There were five, to my knowledge; there might have been more.
Q. How were they armed?
A. I have never seen them parading with their guns; I have seen rifles directed to them.
Q. Have you not seen them when they were in the possession of their rifles?
A. No, sir.
Q. At no place?
A. No, sir. I was at Yemassee one day, and I saw on the platform three or four boxes of rifles and ammunition directed to Hoover.
Q. Who is Hoover?
A. Captain of the club at Hoover's Station.
Q. Captain of the rifle club?
A. Yes, sir.

A perfect system of threats was adopted, which was not so thoroughly successful as in other counties, owing to the fact of the necessity of labor to harvest the crops. However, the evidence shows that wherever it could be done threats of discharge were made against republicans, together with a threat to turn them out of their homes. Again, threatening letters were sent for the purpose of intimidating candidates for office upon the republican ticket. Fraudulent tickets were issued by the democrats, for the purpose of deceiving the republicans, and thus securing by fraud what they failed to obtain by honorable means.

I have myself received several threatening letters telling me that my life would be taken if I dared to attend republican meetings in my own district, and had it not been for the presence of United States troops I feel assured that I would not be here now to tell it.

At this Mitchellville poll a sailor named Lightburn, who had not been in the United States Navy for some six months, endeavored to vote. His attempt caused some little trouble.

Q. Where did you vote on election day?
A. At Mitchellville.
Q. What time did you get there?
A. Between ten and eleven o'clock, I should think; very nearly eleven o'clock.
Q. How long did you stay?
A. I was there until the managers made their return—canvassed the votes.
Q. State in your own way what you observed in reference to the conduct of that poll there during the day.
A. When I arrived at the polls there was some commotion between some colored men and Mr. H. C. Politzer. There was quite a crowd gathered. I went in on horseback, and I rode into the crowd to Mr. Politzer. Just as I rode up I heard Mr. Politzer make this remark: "I'll be damned if he shan't vote." Some colored man—I do not know his name now—said he should not vote. I requested them all to keep quiet, and inquired what the controversy was about. Mr. Politzer stated that the man that was with him, Mr. Lightburn, wanted to vote, and that these men wouldn't allow him. I told Mr. Politzer that the man had no right to a vote, that he was not a citizen of the State. Mr. Politzer said he only wanted him to vote the electoral ticket. He claimed that he had a right to vote the electoral ticket. I told him he had no right whatever; that if he had a right to vote the electoral ticket he had a right to vote the whole ticket. The language that Mr. Politzer used excited the colored people some, but as soon as I got there they all quieted down, and there was no disturbance after that.
Q. You said that it made no difference; that if he voted the electoral ticket he could vote the whole ticket?
A. I advised him to go to the managers of the election, and if he would run the risk of taking the oath, or if they would take his ballot, I requested all the people not to cause any disturbance, but let him take the consequences.

This was all that occurred that day. The election proceeded quietly until its close. No person was prevented from voting; there was no intimidation or coercion of voters, and no other violence occurred.

At Paris Island precinct the election passed off very peaceably, and the returns were concurred in by the democratic manager without protest. No persons were denied the right to vote.

Q. How came you to go there?
A. I went there in the interest of the democratic party.
Q. At whose request?
A. By no particular person's request—voluntarily. The United States supervisor of election asked me to go over, but I was going without his invitation.
Q. Did you stay until the canvass was completed?
A. You mean the canvass at that precinct?
Q. Yes.
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did the managers all sign it?
A. All signed it, sir.
Q. Any protest made with it?
A. None that I know of, sir.

At Gray's Hill precinct there was some violence. Mr. Porteous, the United States supervisor on the part of the democrats, was discovered distributing spurious tickets to republicans, representing them as genuine republican tickets. This when discovered enraged the republican voters, who forced Mr. Porteous to retreat to the poll-room. Mr. Porteous, upon examination, admitted that, in the face of his duties as a supervisor, he had peddled tickets to democrats and spurious ones to republicans.

Question. What time did you go to Gray's Hill precinct?
Answer. I arrived at Gray's Hill about half past six o'clock.
Q. How long did you stay there?
A. I staid there till the afternoon, about between two and three o'clock, and went back to Beaufort. During my stay everything passed off quiet.
Q. Who was United States supervisor there for the democrats?
A. I am not certain as to the other; I know one, John F. Porteous, in the interest of the democratic party.
Q. Was he there when you reached there?
A. He was there; he was outside when I reached there.
Q. What was he doing outside?
A. He was outside with two large batches of tickets.
Q. Where did he have the tickets; in his hands?
A. Yes, sir; turned head and tails.
Q. What was he doing with them?
A. Asking people to vote the republican ticket—saying to them, these are the republican tickets.
Q. Did you ascertain what tickets they were in fact?
A. I came out, sir, and started for the crowd that surrounded Mr. Porteous. I inquired, when I got near the tail feet of the mob, and they said one man had received a ticket from Porteous, and he handed the ticket to me and asked me if it was a good ticket, and I looked at it and see it headed "Union Republican Ticket," with "Victory," and the first name appeared was Tilden, and Hampton for governor, and I found it was a democrat ticket—all the names.
Q. Look at these tickets, [handing witness two ballots already in evidence,] and state whether they were tickets like these?
A. Precisely the same, sir.
Q. How many had Porteous in his hands?
A. He had two large batches.
Q. How was he holding them?
A. He was holding them in this way, two together.
Q. That is reversed?
A. Yes, sir; reversed, and gave them out this way.
Q. State what you saw him do.
A. I saw him give out a ticket to a man, and pull it from underneath.
Q. Had the man asked for what?
A. He asked the union republican ticket, and it was a democrat ticket, and he pulled it from under the republican ticket. Mr. Porteous gave it.
Q. And what occurred when you learned that?
A. The voting ceased for fully five minutes or more, and everybody was talking and running about and looking after the tickets in each other's hands until they was satisfied that the correction was made before they would commence again.
Q. What was said or done?
A. Some spoke very loudly to Mr. Porteous, very disrespectable, for giving them the republican ticket which was not the republican ticket. They said to him, "You cheat us; you tell us this was a republican ticket, and it was not;" and after some talk the crowd dispersed. Mr. Porteous went in the house then, and took his seat again beside the ballot-box, remaining in his position as supervisor.
Q. Did he come out again?
A. Yes, sir; he came out again.
Q. How long after?
A. Well, he staid in there about half an hour or more, and when he came out he had the real democratic tickets—white—different ink.
Q. He came out with tickets printed in black ink?
A. Yes, sir. He resumed canvassing as before, asking the people to vote for these. The people would not vote it and drawed a large crowd around him, talking again. One man sang out in the crowd, "You ought to pay me for the wood I have been chopping for you." Mr. Porteous got insulted then, and they talked pretty loud to each other.
Q. There was words about it?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How long did he remain out that time?
A. Well, he remained out, I will say, one hour or more, trying to get all the votes he can; begging them and asking them.
Q. Was there anything said about the ballots he was circulating?
A. Yes, sir; he called to me and asked me to go and electioneer for the Hampton ticket.
Q. Mr. Porteous requested you?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What did you tell him?
A. I told him I could not do it.
Q. What further did he say?
A. About the time that I and him commenced talking, we was talking to ourselves privately, and then all the boys begin to come around him and asked him to pay them what he owe them for chopping wood for him; and I told him then—he used to be my old boss, and I didn't want to get into no fuss—I told him his business was in the house, and he had better go back in the house, and he went as far as the door; and he called me again and hand me a bunch of tickets, and asked me to go around and electioneer again, and I told him I couldn't. He told me if I would electioneer the Hampton ticket that I would be a man if Hampton get in power.

Another democrat named Robert Hamilton was also discovered distributing spurious tickets and was driven away. He was guilty of the same offense as Porteous.

After these scenes had transpired, the election proceeded to a peaceful close. And Mr. Porteous himself bore testimony to his personal satisfaction with the manner in which the election had been conducted through the day. Mr. Van Ness, one of the managers, testified to signing the returns without protest. The returns were not made out in the regular form, and Mr. Wilder, one of the county commissioners, called upon Van Ness and asked him to sign a corrected return. This Van Ness refused to do, and in his testimony before the committee referred to the fact to create the impression of tampering with the returns. The testimony of Dr. Wilder, one of the commissioners who canvassed the votes, is given upon this point:

Question. Do you know Mr. Van Ness?
Answer. I do.
Q. What is his first name?
A. I do not remember his initials.
Q. Mr. Van Ness, of Beaufort, I mean, who was one of the managers at Gray's Hill?
A. Yes, sir; he was one of the managers at Gray's Hill.
Q. Did you call on Mr. Van Ness about two weeks ago with a view of getting his signature to any paper?
A. Yes, sir; it was an affidavit with reference to their returns made by the managers at Gray's Hill precinct. It was a little irregularity.
Q. What was the irregularity?
A. I am not positive. There were three precincts where the managers made clerical errors in their returns. I think, at this poll, they only included in their returns three of the electors on each side; three republicans and three democrats. I won't be positive that that was the poll.
Q. You are right about it. It was an omission of a portion of the electors on each ticket. And you had an affidavit to correct that mistake?
A. Yes, sir; I have an affidavit to correct that error.
Q. Is that all you asked him to do?
A. That was all.
Q. And that was the object?
A. That was the object.

COLLETON COUNTY.

This county had a voting white population of 2,478, and a colored voting population of 4,217, according to the State census of 1875. In 1870 the republican majority was 2,289; in 1872, 3,229; in 1874, 1,433 over the bolting republican candidate.

At the last election the highest republican elector received 4,234 and the highest democratic elector 2,924 votes. The excess of colored votes over the census was 511 and the decrease of white votes was 38. The republican vote increased over the vote of 1874, 695; the opposition or democratic vote increased 818.

The precinct returns from Preacher's Mill, Blue House, Ashepoo, and Iron's School-house omitted the names of the presidential electors. The county canvassers investigated the matter and ascertained that the votes were cast entire. At Bennett's Point precinct no election was held. There were three managers appointed for this precinct, two republicans and one democrat. One of the republicans failed to qualify and could not serve; the remaining two could have held the election, but did not, the democratic manager advising otherwise, and successfully. This was a very strong republican precinct. The precinct return from Bell's Cross-Roads was mislaid and afterward discovered.

Question. What office did you hold at the last election?
Answer. I was one of the commissioners of election.
Q. State who was the messenger to bring the return from that county to the secretary of state.
A. I was appointed by the board.
Q. Was there any election at Bennett's Point?
A. None.
Q. What was the vote for the republican electors at Ashepoo precinct?
A. Four hundred and thirty-seven for the republicans; 96 for the democrats.
Q. At Iron School-house?
A. One hundred and eighty republican and 444 democratic.
Q. State whether managers' returns were before the canvassers from all the precincts.
A. No, not from all of them. From Preacher's Mill all the return we had was the supervisor's return.
Q. Is that included in the canvass for the county by the county canvassers?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you remember what the vote was?
A. No, I do not.
Q. It was a democratic majority?
A. I think it was.
Q. Then in the canvassers' return you include the vote at all the precincts in the county except Bennett's Point, where there was no election?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. State what returns you brought to the secretary of state.
A. I brought the returns from all the precincts except Bennett's Point, where there were none, and Bell's Cross-Roads, that was left out by mistake; it was not returned at the time I brought the others. I discovered it afterward.
Q. You say there was one of the managers' returns, Bell's Cross-roads, which you did not bring up to the secretary of state?
A. Yes, sir; it was left out by mistake.
Q. Was it subsequently sent up?
A. Yes, sir. I will tell you how it was. I am county treasurer, and in my table is a drawer where I keep nulla bona tax-lists. When these votes were canvassed Mr. Fox and the other commissioners opened the papers, and I called out the figures to the clerk, who put them down. We first made the tabular statement, and the vote was corrected from that. After we finished the different returns the other managers folded them up in a roll with a string tied around them, and marked with the names of the different precincts, and they were laid in this drawer. We worked all that night until about five o'clock the next morning, and when we concluded they appointed me as messenger, and I went to my house to prepare to bring the return to Columbia. I returned as quick as I could, in an hour or an hour and a half, so as to be in time for the morning train. I left one side of my valise for those papers. Mr. Fox and I and the clerk went into the office together, and they opened the drawer and took out these papers and laid them in the valise. I verified them, to see that they had the right number, eighteen, (there are nineteen precincts, but there was none from Bennett's Point,) and they had eighteen; so that the number was correct, though one was left.

Q. Did you examine the votes from Preacher's Mill?

A. No, sir; we did not count the votes. We took the supervisor's return, as it tallied with the vote given for all the other officers. I think there was a return for the State officers made from that precinct, and where they all tallied we thought it was unnecessary to count the votes. There was no objection made by the board at all.

Q. You were going on to say how you left this out?

A. I brought them to Columbia and untied each package as I turned them over to Mr. Hayne. I opened them and took out the returns for governor and lieutenant-governor, and when I came to open one I found that it was nothing but one of my nulla bona tax-lists, which they had tied up.

Q. You discovered that there was one return absent?

A. No, sir; I did not.

Q. You discovered a nulla bona tax-list?

A. Yes, sir; but I did not discover that the return was missing, because I did not check them. I went home without discovering it. Afterward they informed me that Bell's Cross-Roads had not been turned over. I went to my office; the first place I searched was in that drawer, and sure enough, in the back part of the drawer, with some nulla bona tax-papers, I found this list.

EDGEFIELD COUNTY.

This county had in 1875, from the figures of the official census, a voting population of 4,400 colored and 2,722 white. In the election of 1870 the republican majority was 843; in 1872, 3,659; in 1874, 498.

At the last election the highest republican elector received 3,124 votes, and the highest democratic elector 6,257 votes. The republican vote decreased 274 and the democratic vote increased 3,357. The excess of white votes over the official census was 2,252, the decrease of colored votes was 1,293.

The vote by precincts is given below. Attention is called to the stupendous frauds perpetrated in this county. By the returns the total vote cast was 9,614. The total population of the county is 35,039. The proportion of votes cast was 1 to every 3 and a fraction of the population. The white vote of the county suddenly increased 2,252, representing an increase in the white population, according to the ordinary ratio of voters to population—1 to 5—of 12,260. In addition to this the sworn testimony before the committee establishes the fact that some 1,200 colored voters were driven away from the polls or by other means of intimidation deprived of the right to vote. Adding these to the number of votes actually cast would give 10,814 as the number of legal voters in the county, representing, upon the ratio given above of 1 to 5, a total population of 54,470; an excess of 19,441 over the population of the county as given in the official census of 1875. No testimony was offered the committee by the democrats to prove any such increase of population. On the contrary, throughout the entire investigation, although confronted with the facts, Edgefield County was entirely neglected except in an attempt to prove a peaceful election.

The vast increase of votes was not from an increase of population, but owing to frauds that would have disgraced the palmiest days of Tammany Hall. Edgefield County on the day of election was given up to fraud; honor and manhood were prostituted to the foul work. The election was a libel upon the honest citizens of the county, upon the honor of the State, and the civilization of the age. Fraud walked through the county unchecked, violence asserted itself in the presence of the troops of the United States, and the day was marked by scenes of repeaters rushing from poll to poll voting two and three tickets at the same time. Citizens of Georgia came over, saying they were going to give the South Carolina boys a lift, and voted all over the county. One merchant from the city of Augusta and his four clerks voted fifteen times each. At one election poll, Ridge Spring precinct, there was found 113 more votes in the box than names upon the poll-list, and the excess of votes was owing to the fact that a large number of the democratic tickets had a duplicate ticket folded within them. When the attention of the officers was called to the fact, the democratic managers refused to have the duplicate tickets thrown out, but stirred them all together with the other tickets and then drew the excess of 113 from the box. In other precincts minors voted, and repeating was practiced without regard to the fact that the attention of the officers was directed to it.

At Edgefield Court House precinct, at the close of the poll, some eight hundred republicans had not voted, and the testimony of Army officers and others living in the place shows that the polls were surrounded by armed riflemen who would allow no approach to the poll.

The universal testimony of the United States marshals and supervisors, managers of precincts, and other election officers proves this Edgefield County election to have been a farce in the highest sense of the word—to have been an outrage upon free speech, personal liberty, and the sanctity of the ballot-box.

Intimidation in this county witnessed its most extreme limit, and free speech was denied the republican citizen. In the early part of the campaign the governor of the State, who had received from friend and foe universal approbation for his manly efforts to reform the politics of the State and purify the system of government, visited this county. He went as the executive of the State and not as the candidate of a party, he having been nominated some time afterward. Testimony is quoted to show the manner of his reception when he arose to address his fellow-citizens, as well as the fact that republicans could hold no meetings in the county:

Q. Were you at any republican meetings during the campaign?

A. We had only two republican meetings in the campaign. We had one and attempted to have one.

Q. Was the first one advertised as a republican meeting alone, or for joint discussion?

A. As a republican meeting; we had not learned anything about the joint excursion; that was the only experience that we had on that day.

Q. What occurred?

A. When the meeting was called the republicans went over to the place where we had our meeting at the academy. When we got over there—you know men looks more than they really is on horseback—well, I will say there was about three hundred on horseback, headed by General Butler and Gary and Sheperd; they was in front. They went on over to the stand. After seeing the republicans started, they went over and got there first, because they were on horseback. Cain was the republican chairman of the meeting. He got on the stand, and Governor Chamberlain and SMALLS and Simpkins and my brother and myself. General Butler says: "Hush; you don't need him; I am the chairman of this meeting to-day." Some one attempted to put the motion, and he said: "It is of no use to put it, because he can't act. I am the chairman of this meeting to-day, and we are going to have part of this time or you don't have any meeting." It went on that way. He introduced General Gary, and he got up and spoke, and went on and abused the governor a good deal.

Q. Did they agree upon a joint discussion?

A. No, sir; we did not agree upon it. They agreed to it themselves. General Butler said that if Chamberlain wanted to speak, we will give him half an hour, but unless my men speak, you don't have any meeting here to-day.

Q. Was there a joint discussion?

A. Well, Chamberlain got up and attempted to speak, but they bothered him so that he could not speak.

Q. Who did speak?

A. General Butler, General Gary, and Sheperd.

Q. Butler and Gary were democrats?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you hold any smaller meetings around through the county?

A. Well, we could not hold any.

Q. Why not?

A. We knew it would be dangerous for any of us to leave the town. General Gary told me that himself. He says, "If any of you fellows leave this town, God, you won't come back here to hold your meetings, unless you let us go in with you."

The threats to republicans were publicly made, and a threat of discharge or removal from land was often accompanied with a threat of death, should the person remain true to his convictions, as will be seen from the following testimony:

I am a resident of Edgefield County; have lived there all my life. I have represented that county twice in the Legislature of this State; was a candidate for reelection at the last general election which was held on the 7th day of November. I was at the polls on election day for the purpose of voting the republican ticket but did not have the privilege of doing so. The polls at Edgefield Court House, where I was, No. 1 and 2, were blocked and otherwise crowded by armed democrats, who were uniformed in red shirts, and from one to two pistols buckled on the outside, and some with sixteen-shooters strapped to their sides, the major part of them being mounted on horses, and using threats of a violent nature toward republicans who would present themselves for the purpose of voting the republican ticket. After witnessing for several hours the violent and formidable demonstration of the democrats to overawe and deter republican voters, and knowing as I did that my life had been previously threatened by the democrats for political reasons, I came to the conclusion that if I voted the republican ticket I would be murdered. I know the fact that at least six or eight hundred republicans at Edgefield Court House, who were at the polls for the purpose of voting the republican ticket, were prevented from doing so. I am quite sure if they had wanted to vote the democratic ticket, they could have done so with perfect safety. I know I could have voted the democratic ticket with perfect ease if I had so desired it. I saw a large number of republicans make several efforts to vote during the day at box No. 1, but as they would get near the polls the democrats would immediately rush around the place of entrance and keep the republicans back. The democrats had all voted, but notwithstanding this they stood there armed and equipped as so many sentinels placed there for the specific object of preventing republicans from voting. During the day the democrats, who were mounted, would gallop from box to box, sometimes yelling and brandishing their pistols. At about three o'clock in the afternoon the democrats organized a democratic meeting on the court-house steps, the place of entrance to the polling-precinct No. 1, at which several candidates on the democratic ticket made speeches. This was kept up until the polls were closed; during all this time republicans made repeated efforts to vote, but were not allowed to go up the steps. I would state further, in order to show to what extent the republican leaders were intimidated by the threats and violent demonstrations of the democrats, because of their political sentiments and party fealty, that it was utterly impossible to canvass the county in the interest of the Hayes and Wheeler electors, Congressmen, or State officers. On the day of election I saw several republicans who had been violently assaulted and beaten over the head with pistols, and severe wounds inflicted on them, because they had endeavored to vote the republican ticket. The vote of the county is largely in excess of that of any previous election. There were about 3,000 votes polled over and above what we were legally entitled to by the census which was recently taken. The majority of the census-takers of Edgefield County were democrats; that census gives the colored men a majority over the white men of 1,678. Republicans were publicly threatened with being discharged from employment and the probability of being killed if they persisted in giving their support to the candidates on the republican ticket.

Attention is called to the manner in which the election was conducted at the various precincts.

At Edgefield Court House there were two polling-precincts, Nos. 1 and 2. These polls were the scenes of the wildest disorder and flagrant violation of law. A large body of armed men on horseback surrounded the poll, and a republican voter who dared to exercise the elective franchise did so at the risk of life. Men were beaten in the very presence of the officers of the Army; but few opportunities were given to vote, and when the polls closed between seven and eight hundred republicans had failed to cast their votes. The testimony of Major Kellogg, United States Army, is quoted here:

Question. State what occurred within your knowledge on the day of the election at Edgefield.

Answer. About half past nine o'clock in the morning I was directed by Major and Brevet Major-General Brannon, commanding that post, to take my company and go to box No. 2, which was in the outskirts of the village. He said that the deputy United States marshal, Beattie, would be there, and I would receive instructions from him as to what he wished me to do. I went with my company, with First Lieutenant Hoyt. I got to the church, or school-house—I think it was a school-house, next to the church—where this box was, and I halted my company about fifty yards from the school-house. There was a very large crowd around the building, in front and on the two sides of it; not so many in the rear.

Q. White or colored men?

A. Right around the building, next to it, they were all white men, and mounted.

There were very few that were dismounted, and all who were dismounted appeared to have their horses near. Just around the house they were all mounted; there were several hundred of them.

Q. Do you know whether they had pistols?

A. I only saw during the whole day some five or six men that I could not swear were armed. All were armed except those, and I presume those were, but I did not know it. Each man had from one to two or three revolvers on his person, generally carried so that they could be readily seen. The negroes at that time were in front of the school-house, between the whites and the fence, and running back in the road each way, more toward town than on the other side. There were a large number of them. Mr. Beattie came to me as soon as I got there and reported that the whites had obstructed the way to the box, which was inside of the building, so that no one could reach it.

Q. You mean so that the colored men could not reach it?

A. Well, no one, without the permission of those in the front; and he said that no one was going in at that time. I immediately detailed Lieutenant Hoyt and four men to go down. Beattie asked me to send a detachment to assist in opening a passage so that any one who wished to go in to vote could do so, and in compliance with that request I detailed Lieutenant Hoyt with four men to affect the opening to the box. I then gave some instructions to my company, and very soon afterward I went down myself to see the actual condition of affairs immediately around the building. When I got there Lieutenant Hoyt had succeeded in opening a passage from the door leading across the road directly in front of the building. The passage was about four or five feet wide—very narrow, but wide enough for any one to go through. I had a good deal of difficulty in getting through the crowd to reach Lieutenant Hoyt. The horses were jammed in so thickly that I could only get there by requesting men to turn their horses one side, and by squeezing my way through. A large number of the men had pistols drawn at that time, and a number of them next to this line that had been opened by Lieutenant Hoyt had their pistols in their hands, with their thumbs on the cocks and their fingers on the triggers, and many were shouting; in fact, nearly all of them were more or less shouting or swearing, and using such expressions as "Shoot! God damn it, shoot!" and others of that character.

Q. If a colored man attempted to pass through that line to vote, how near would he be to the muzzles of the drawn pistols?

A. If he went in the center he would be within three or four feet of the pistols on one side or the other.

Q. Did you see any colored men armed?

A. I did not; I could not swear that a single black man had a pistol. I have no doubt that some of them had pistols, but I did not see anything of the sort.

Q. Did you see any hostile demonstrations by any colored men?

A. I did not.

Q. Go on and state what occurred during the day within your knowledge.

A. I saw that this force of four men was hardly sufficient to keep the crowd in check, and I sent down four more men to assist Lieutenant Hoyt, and with those he managed to make a little wider passage. Just after I sent Lieutenant Hoyt to the building there seemed to be a commotion in the crowd of white men in front, and a number of negroes shouted out, "It's commenced! it's commenced!" and started to run toward town. In fact, nearly the whole crowd that were some distance back from the school-house started to run. Those right near the school-house I don't think did; I called to them to keep quiet and come back, and they did so. * * * During the day I frequently heard from white men such remarks as this: "These damn niggers ought not to be allowed to vote." I did not hear any remarks of that kind made directly to any particular person; but it was very disorderly there nearly all the time. These men were riding back and forth, but there was a large body of them that staid around the door until toward night.

Q. How many mounted men remained around the door in that way?

A. Until just before the closing of the poll there must have been at least sixty there all the time, and generally, I think, there were more than that right around the house. Then, a few rods off, there were a good many more.

Q. In all, how many mounted and armed white men were there that day, as near as you could judge?

A. I think when I first went there there must have been altogether at least three hundred.

Q. How long did you remain at the voting-place?

A. I remained until about half past six o'clock, after the closing of the poll.

Q. Did you observe any colored men going away without voting?

A. I believe that a large number went away without voting. When the polls closed there was a large number of men standing right there who had been there ostensibly for the purpose of voting, and had to go away without voting.

The testimony of one of the commissioners of election is also given. He testifies to the violence committed at the polls, and the number of republicans who could not vote:

Question. State what you know about any violence or intimidation against any republicans during the recent campaign or during the election?

Answer. I was commissioner of elections. There was box No. 1 and box No. 2 at Edgefield Court House. On the morning of 7th of November I arose at six o'clock, and went to box No. 1 to vote. I was there until ten o'clock. I suppose at least two thousand colored men waited there until nine or ten in the day before a single man of them voted. The polls were surrounded by about four or five hundred white men, with red shirts, and on horses, a great many of them round the door and preventing colored men from getting up the steps. Then, there was a great many dismounted round the box, and they said that no Chamberlain men should vote there. * * * We staid there until near ten o'clock, and not a single colored man voted there. We went up to the school-house to box No. 2. There had not been any troops sent there at all until about ten or eleven o'clock, and the white men were there with large hickory clubs, ax-helves, and pistols, and Remington rifles. They had a whole wagon-load of arms standing off about twenty yards from the grounds. They all stood around the box, and no colored man was permitted to vote. Some tried to go in to vote, but they were beaten with sticks and the blood knocked out of their heads. That was about eleven o'clock. We sent up to see if we could not get troops, and Major Kellogg went up to the box, and no colored man was permitted to vote until he got there. At that box we had about 500 majority—the only box in the county. We have always had in Edgefield, at these two boxes, about fifteen hundred at least.

Q. What, if anything, do you know of colored men going away from the polls without getting an opportunity to vote?

A. I know, I think, at least eight hundred that left the polls. They staid there until nearly six o'clock and found it was impossible to vote, and then they left. I didn't vote, and I tried from six o'clock in the morning until six o'clock in the afternoon.

Q. What, if anything, do you know of threats being made against the republicans on the day of the election, or before it, by democrats owning land, that the republicans should not stay on their land if they voted the republican ticket?

A. Those threats were universal throughout the whole county.

Mr. ABBOTT. State only what you heard yourself.

A. Yes, sir; I heard it myself. It was universal. It was a matter of public speeches on the stump by democrats.

Testimony of Lieutenant Hoyt, United States Army, is quoted to prove violence:

Question. Were you present at any time during the voting in Edgefield?

Answer. I was at what was called box No. 2.

Q. State whether you saw any violence inflicted by white men upon colored men?

A. I saw only one case. I saw one colored man struck over the head with a club in the hands of a white man.

Q. What was the occasion of that?

A. The colored man was trying to get up on the platform to go into the building to vote.

Q. To what extent was he injured?

A. I don't know, sir; I don't know that he was injured at all. I saw him hit on the head, and he sort of fell back off the platform. I was there from about the time when the polls opened until six o'clock. Part of the time I was right down near the door, and part of the time back about fifty yards distant with the company.

Q. You did not see all the occurrences of the day when the voting was going on?

A. No, sir; I was not there all the time.

Q. State whether you saw any colored men going away from the polls without being able to vote—men who had been seeking an opportunity to vote.

A. At the time the polls closed, in my opinion, there were four or five hundred colored men who I think had not voted, and who I think had to go away.

Also the testimony of one of the United States marshals:

Question. Did you see any violence?

Answer. Yes, sir; I saw them knock several men over the head.

Q. Who knocked them over the head?

A. Joe Wise was one. He struck a fellow named Joe Butler, and cut a gash in his head, with the lock of his pistol, about an inch and a half long.

Q. What did he strike him for?

A. Because he tried to get in to vote.

The chief marshal for the county testifies as follows in reference to the violence committed that day at Edgefield Court House:

Question. What do you know of any violence against republicans on the day of election?

Answer. Well, there was a number of mounted horsemen there with pistols, clubs, bludgeons, and everything of that kind, yelling and screaming and beating niggers over the head.

Q. Was any violence inflicted upon any colored men?

A. Yes, sir, upon several; I cannot exactly name the number, but I know about three; I cannot recollect their names, though, at this moment.

By Mr. ABBOTT:

Q. Do you mean that you saw the violence inflicted on them?

A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. With what weapons was the violence inflicted?

A. They were struck in the head with pistols and clubs, and pistols were drawn on them, many of them cocked at the time. There was the appearance of a general row or fuss.

At Ridge Spring precinct violence and fraud controlled the election. A complete system of fraudulent voting was practiced. The clerk of the board was a democrat and democrats coming up to vote would hold up two fingers and others three fingers. It was discovered that this was a signal agreed upon to indicate to the clerk whether two or three ballots were folded in one, and thus inform him as to the number of names to be added to the poll-list.

Qnestoin. What, if anything, do you know of the democrats voting two tickets at a time there?

Answer. The voting went on quietly until about eight o'clock. I detected nothing of double voting until about nine o'clock. I then went into the house were the voting was going on, and stood and looked directly on the faces of the voters as they came up, and observed very closely their hands as they deposited their ballots. One man's ballots slipped. He had folded them separately, and then put them together, and he would raise up his right hand and I would notice. The first one that I detected had up two fingers, and I saw that the ballots slipped apart, but he pushed them back again and crammed them into the box. Then I called one of the republican managers to me, and said to him: "I see that these democrats are voting two or three tickets, and if you don't watch that clerk (he is a democrat) he will put down names to correspond. I noticed that gentleman who voted awhile ago held up two fingers. I do not know what it meant unless it was to give the clerk a signal how many tickets he had voted." I staid there and watched, and for about twenty-five or thirty voters every single one of them voted a double ticket.

But the fraud failed of a complete fulfillment, and as stated heretofore, when the poll closed there was found an excess of 113 votes over the names on the poll-list, and the democratic tickets were found folded together. Upon this point the affidavit of the manager is quoted. From his evidence it will be seen that democrats did not deem it necessary to give their names to the manager, but simply informed the democratic clerk, "You know my name," and thus they voted. They were a part of the Georgians who repeated from poll to poll.

RIDGE SPRING PRECINCT.

SOUTH CAROLINA,
Edgefield County:

Personally came before me Moses D. Lott, manager of the election at Ridge Spring precinct, who, being duly sworn, made oath as follows:

That on 7th November, 1876, he was at the said precinct on said date, as manager, and did act as such on said day. That he is now twenty-three years of age. That he has lived twenty of these years in said precinct next before the election. That white men voted at said precinct that he never saw nor heard of before that day, and in many cases these unknown white men would not give their names, but would say to the clerk, who was a democrat, "You know my name," which was not satisfactory to the republican managers, and against which they protested. That seeing a strict enforcement of the law would have endangered his life, he, with his colleague, waived many of their rights and legal duties. That when in counting the votes the number of votes or tickets in the box exceeded the names on the poll-list by one hundred and thirteen, which was drawn out, and I know all these were democratic except seven, because they were into each other; and the democratic United States supervisor refused to allow them to be thrown out as found in each other, but had them stirred up together and drawn such out, which was contrary to law. That for the above reason I know that said ballot-box was stuffed, and there was not a fair election at said voting-precinct, and I protest against the counting of any votes found in said ballot-box.

M. D. LOTT.

Sworn to before me November 13, 1876.

JESSE JONES, C. C. C. P.

Against the fairness of the election at this poll the United States supervisor entered his protest. From this poll some one hundred and fifty republicans were driven away by threats and violence.

Question. What do you know of colored men, republicans, being interrupted and prevented from voting?

Answer. About eight o'clock there was a crowd of colored men, republicans, that came up to the polls, marching solidly in ranks, and there was one man ahead of them who was hurrahing for Hayes and Wheeler and Chamberlain, and when he would turn around and wave his hat all the others would halloo, too. There was one hundred and ninety-five in the crowd, so they told me. They asked for that number of tickets, and I know the crowd was about that in my judgment. When that crowd came up, Mr. John Gaston, Mr. Carwile, and Mr. Robert Watson walked right up in front of them. They seemed to be pertectly infuriated. They were just as mad as men could possibly be, judging from appearances. They shook their fists in the faces of the men, saying: "This is a white man's country, and we be damned if you haven't got to stop; we will not stand it. This is our country, and we propose to take care of it from this time on." Mr. Robert Watson came up, and he was hallooing, "What ticket are you going to vote? You ain't going to vote for Chamberlain here to-day; if you do you will have to leave." These men came, most of them, from Cloud's Creek, a place known as Mr. Watson's lands. When Watson looked in the crowd and saw me he commenced saying, "Let 'em cheer; they'll holler to-day, and we'll holler to-morrow." Mr. John Gaston went on, saying, "You don't live in Edgefield County." The men answered, "Yes, I do. I don't want you to tell we where I live." Said he, "But the line is changed, and if you vote here to-day you vote illegally, and I will have you arrested, and Chamberlain's government isn't able to protect you." Mr. Carwile was coming up the line of colored men shaking his fist in their faces, and when he met me he stopped; but Mr. Watson kept on by me, but changed his line of expressions, and said, "Let them holler to-day and we will holler to-morrow." But they all stepped out right before that crowd of colored men, threatening them, and daring them to vote the Chamberlain ticket; that if they did vote they would vote illegally, and so on; and the result of it was that about forty of those men went off and didn't vote; they were afraid.

At Shaw's Mill precinct another election took place, which in every particular was a complete farce. The democratic manager at this poll took from the box the blank oath belonging to a republican manager and refused to deliver it up the entire day, and this manager regularly appointed could not perform the duties of his office. From the report of the United States supervisor it will be seen that guns were carried to the poll by the wagon-load, and further that the democratic manager carried the poll-box behind the house and when it suited his purpose returned it to the proper place; legal and qualified voters were denied the right to vote; repeating was done to an unlimited extent by Georgians, who when they voted gave no name but informed the clerk, a democrat, "You know my name."

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA,
Edgefield County:

Personally comes before me Dennis Sullivan, United States supervisor, who, on oath, says that he was United States supervisor at Shaw's Mill precinct, and was at said place November 7, 1876, to discharge his duty. That before six o'clock he saw a crowd of white democrats unloading a wagon which was loaded with guns. That the voting was commenced down-stairs, and the box was carried upstairs against the will of the republican manager; that when the box was brought down stairs it was carried some other way; he saw it brought from behind the house by Joseph Merriwether, the democratic manager. That there was only one republican manager to act. Joseph Merriwether took the blank oath out of the box which was for the other republican manager to take, and put it into his pocket and would not allow the republican manager to take it. That not a republican could get to vote for at least an hour when the poll was first opened. That the democrats would not allow some republican voters to vote who were legal and justified voters to his knowledge. That white men came there and voted who were not known by any of the election officers, and they refused to give their names, but would say to the clerk, who was a democrat. "You know my name." Deponent is satisfied that Georgians voted at Shaw's Mill on the 7th of November, 1876, in the State and county aforesaid. That he could not challenge any voter but colored men, as his life was threatened by Joseph Merriwether. That two strangers came up and voted without taking any oath. That no clerk was elected or sworn. That some one stood between the clerk and manager all the the while, and when the votes were counted there were twenty-seven tickets in the box more than names, and all of the twenty-seven votes overplus were not drawn out. That Joseph Merriwether took the box and did not seal it, and he did not know that it was locked.

D. S. SULLIVAN,
United States Supervisor.

Sworn to before me this 13th day of November, 1876.

JESSE JONES, C. C. C. P.

This band of repeaters can be traced all over the county by the words given to the various clerks, "You know my name." The testimony of the remaining republican manager proves the grossly unfair character of the election, and the further fact that when the democratic manager took the poll-box behind the house he had the key with him. A solemn protest is entered against the vote at this poll.

SOUTH CAROLINA,
Edgefield County:

Personally appeared before me the undersigned deponent, Seabron Merreweather, manager, who, being duly sworn, made oath as follows: That Joseph Merreweather, democratic manager, took the box from him, (Seabron Merreweather, republican manager,) and then Joseph Merreweather had both box and key, and then Joseph Merreweather carried said box off a short distance and took out the blank oath which was for the other republican manager to take, and thereby defeated his acting as such manager that day.

The voting was commenced down-stairs, and Joseph Merreweather took the box, carried it up stairs, and had it in his exclusive possession for about thirty minutes, while I and the United States marshal were protesting against carrying said box up stairs; and when the box was brought down it was carried behind the house, and the table and chair were brought down the same way it went up. Joseph Merreweather carried the box around the house.

Deponent was intimidated, and not allowed to challenge any voter, except a colored man who he thought was an illegal voter; that white voters came up and refused to give their names, and said to the clerk, who was a democrat, "You know my name."

When the poll was closed, Joseph Merreweather took the box off without sealing it and without locking it, so far as he knows, and he did not feel safe in questioning anything Joseph Merreweather did; that he pronounces the election at Shaw's precinct or polling-place unfair, and it should not be counted. Hence he enters his solemn protest against the same.

SEABRON MERREWEATHER.

Sworn to before me, November 13, 1876.

JESSE JONES, C. C. C. P.

At Mount Willing precinct, 59 republican votes were polled. The democratic clerk was placed in a position where he could not be seen by the republican managers, who could not perform their duty by reason of intimidation. The double-ticket system of voting was practiced here, and illegal voting done. The republican managers, born and raised in the precinct, testify that men voted who were never seen there before by them. Minors were voted by the democrats.

SOUTH CAROLINA,
Edgefield County:

Before me comes H. W. Thomas and Sampson Pope, who, being duly sworn, make oath that they are the managers appointed to attend at the Mount Willing precinct.

First. That there was not a fair election at said precinct, and that we were prevented from discharging our duties as we were sworn to do, to wit: we were intimidated by the democrats and prevented from ordering the clerk to sit in our presence. The clerk was a democrat, and he was made to sit out of our presence, and we were not allowed to object. The democratic party voted more than one ticket to a man, and we know not how many names the clerk wrote down to correspond with the double tickets. We were both born and raised in that settlement, and men voted there whom we never saw there before. We know that repeating was done, and that minors voted. Hence we enter this our most solemn protest against the election at said precinct.

At Cheatham's Store precinct, John Blackwell, Dr. James Storm, Thomas Holloway, and Wesley Oliphant, and other strangers voted. The republican manager, who has served five elections in succession, and has lived there for thirty years, testifies that he has knowledge of the repeating done by these men, and that he did not know the white strangers who voted there that day. Robert Cheatham, who voted at this precinct, is proven to have voted elsewhere.

At Torbett's Store precinct, 55 republican votes were cast. The managers enter their solemn protest against the election, for the following reasons: First, over two hundred white men voted there who were strangers, and one of the managers had lived there for thirty-four years and knew everybody for ten miles around; that one Robert Cheatham, with others, voted there, who was known to have voted elsewhere. Second, they were not allowed to hear the names of these strange men, who whispered them to the democratic clerk, and at other times said nothing but "you know my name." Third, men from Georgia voted here who were personally known to one of the managers to be residents of that State. Fourth, that the officers could not perform their duties, owing to threats and intimidation.

At Richardsonville precinct, the same state of affairs existed; men repeated. Jack Brooks, Wade Taylor, John Rambo, and others were known to have repeated without hinderance. If any proper inquiry was addressed to them by the republican officers, the reply was, "It's none of your damned business."

At Red Hill precinct, 9 republican votes were polled; repeating was done, and the polls surrounded by strangers, who voted and were unknown to the managers. Pierce Wirbush voted at this precinct and at Edgefield Court House, box No. 1, and elsewhere. Benjamin T. Morris voted here and elsewhere. Owing to these facts the managers protested against the counting of the poll.

At Johnston precinct but 54 republican votes were polled. The United States marshal was not allowed to vote and was driven from the poll. Many persons, strangers, among them minors, came up on the Augusta (Georgia) Railroad and voted. Much intimidation was practiced against the republican voters.

At Lanham's Store precinct, one of the republican managers was denied the right to serve by the democratic chairman of the board, and went off and did not again appear. Many strangers, unknown to old residents, voted at this precinct. One Marshall Mays voted there and elsewhere; republicans were notified, "We want no radicals here." Owing to the intimidation, many republicans were alarmed and dared not vote. When the votes were counted, they exceeded the number of names on the poll-list by eleven or twelve. The clerk was a democrat. But 2 republican votes were polled here.

At Coleman's Cross-Roads another farce took place called an election. Repeaters, among them Chambers Trotter and Samuel Webb, jr., appeared; minors voted here, as, Henry Goggins and James Delock. Unknown voters were also here, and old residents born there did not know who they were.

SOUTH CAROLINA,

Personally came Charles Lindsay, who, being duly sworn, made oath that he was one of the managers at the ballot-box for Coleman Cross-Road, in said State and county.

First. That to the best of his knowledge and belief there were repeating done by the democratic party at said ballot-box, namely, Samuel Webb, jr., Wade Taylor, Jack Brooks, and Chambers Trotter.

Second. That to the best of his knowledge and belief minors voted at the said ballot-box, namely, Henry Goggins and James Deloch.

Third. That unknown voters voted at said ballot-box, namely, G. W. Wadkins, N. G. Pompey, M. G. Purvis, T. G. Williams, and H. T. Bairts.

Fourth. That your deponent has lived in Edgefield County and in that settlement all his life, and knows every man who resides about there, and that many other unknown men voted at said ballot-box.

Fifth. That your deponent knows that there was not a fair election at the said ballot-box; and your deponent enters his solemn protest against the said election at said ballot-box.

JESSE JONES, C. C. C. P.

At Hattiwanger's Store precinct there was more than the ordinary amount of intimidation. The managers on their way to the polls were attacked and finally driven off. Many persons were compelled to leave the polls without voting. The United States marshal was also abused.

At Liberty Hill poll a democrat named John Cheatham cursed and struck republican voters who came up to the poll. In some instances he threatened to shoot. Many republicans dared not go near the poll. One G. J. Sheppard was seen to take tickets from the box, and upon being charged with it did not deny the same. Georgia voters were plenty here. One named —— Burton was known to the managers. One man named Marcus Larkware voted under an assumed name. This poll, which has always been republican, went democratic by a large majority.

At Trapp's Mill precinct 91 republican votes were polled. Strangers voted here unknown to old residents. Repeating was also done by Alfred Bell, Pierce Mathes, and Abner Clegg, who voted at other polls that day.

At the Meeting Street precinct the republican manager, who has lived there all his life, testify that a great many strangers presented themselves and voted who were unknown to him; that he was informed they had voted at the Richard's Mill precinct. J. C. Rambo voted here and at the latter precinct; Preston S. Brooks voted here and at Holliwanger's Store; Pierce S. Addison voted here and elsewhere. Repeating was largely done at this poll, and without any attempt to conceal the fact.

It will be observed that at every one of these precincts strangers in large numbers, who were unknown, appear as voters; the excess of 2,252 white votes over the census is thus accounted for. The citizens of Georgia and the repeating of the democrats living in the county created the increase.

The following affidavits are offered as additional evidence of the manner in which the election was conducted at Edgefield Court House, polls Nos. 1 and 2. It will be seen that William T. Gary, of Augusta, Georgia, gave notice that he had a gang of Georgians on hand whom nobody knew:

SOUTH CAROLINA,
Edgefield County:

Personally appeared before me Wiley J. Williams and Abraham Lanham, two of the managers of box No. 1, Edgefield Court House, and D. B. Cotton, clerk for said box, and made oath that, on the morning of the election, they appeared to the court-house as managers to conduct the election; that, according to the instructions given by the commissioners of election, they intending to hold the election under the arch of the court-house steps; that A. A. Glover, one of the managers, took the box contrary to the desire of these two managers and the directions of the commissioners of election, and carried it up into the court-house; that at the time the court-house was crowded with armed white men, and that there were some arms stacked away in the court-house; that the court-house was packed with white men, and been all night; that after these men voted they remained in the court-house and on the court-house steps, and so crowded the polling-place that colored men were not allowed to vote; that about nine o'clock this crowd had all voted, yet they remained in the court-house and on the court-house steps; that while the crowd was in the court-house and on the court-house steps, several hundred horsemen were crowded around the court-house steps in such a manner that colored men could not approach the court-house; that during the day many of these parties voted four or five times, and when we protested against such a proceeding we were told that it was none of our business; that William T. Gary, of Augusta, Georgia, told these managers that he had several boys here to-day from Georgia that no one knew; that when these deponents would protest against this repeating and would ask the repeaters where they lived, they were told by James M. Cobb and J. C. Sheppard that it was none of their business where they lived, and hence these repeaters would not answer the questions; that these deponents, finding that they could not carry on the election according to law, were anxious to abandon the poll, but were told that they would not be allowed to leave; that all of these white men around there were armed, and that these deponents were compelled to yield to anything they demanded; that in the evening about four o'clock the steps of the court-house were taken possession of by Butler Gary and J. C. Sheppard, who delivered speeches to the horsemen who were crowded around the court-house steps; that these managers wanted to write the names of colored men under the column fixed for colored men, and the names of white men under the column fixed for white men, but were not allowed to have it done; that not more than than thirty-five or forty colored men voted at this box during the entire day, and that most of these voted late in the evening when they were accompanied by the box of United States marshal; that when the poll was closed after six o'clock the box was taken possession of by William T. Gary, of Augusta, Georgia, J. M. Cobb, and J. C. Sheppard of Edgefield Court House, who assisted without authority in the counting of the votes; that when the votes were counted in several cases four or five democratic votes were folded together; that in the face of all these facts, knowing them to be true, these deponents declare that the whole affair was unfair and contrary to law, and enter their solemn protest against the counting of said votes for or against any of the candidates.

JESSE JONES,
Clerk Court Common Pleas.

The testimony interspersed throughout this address is taken from the report of the special committee of this House sent to South Carolina to investigate matters relating to the presidential electors.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the history of South Carolina during the late campaign and on the day of election. I turn it over to the judgment of the American people, to the great tribunal that has always been ready to lend a helping hand to the oppressed.

I trust that the future will do much to obliterate the stain upon the fair fame of South Carolina and the disgrace to American civilization, and that the American people will sustain the execution of the laws in order that the negro they have invested with the right of suffrage may be allowed to exercise this privilege unmolested.

Notwithstanding all the persecution against the republicans, I am proud to say they were sufficiently firm to carry the state for the national and State tickets.

The fruits of their victory are about to be secured, and I can say in this hour of triumph they will indulge in no unnecessary exultation, but actuated by a purpose to prove worthy of American citizenship will pursue their way peacefully, resolved to be patriotic citizens of a great country.

With such a purpose, it may be, the words of Abraham Lincoln, "The ballot in the hands of the black man may serve in some trying hour to come to preserve the jewel of liberty to the diadem of the Republic," may prove to be prophetic.

The Electoral Vote of Oregon.

SPEECH OF HON. DAVID REA,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1877,

On the decision of the electoral commission in the case of Oregon.

Mr. REA. Mr. Speaker, when the electoral bill passed a few weeks ago, I believed we had established a commission that would render decisions in the cases of the disputed States that would meet the approval of the people. I then thought that five judges of the Supreme Court could be trusted to decide according to the law and the right.

While that bill was under consideration in this House, in the course of a few remarks I made upon that occasion I said: "When this bill shall become a law, as I believe it will, I trust that fraud and corruption will find no protection under this bill. I shall hope to see the true and lawful votes for President and Vice-President counted, and the will of the people thereby respected."

But, Mr. Speaker, I have been deceived. The decisions of that tribunal have not been, in my judgment, what they ought to have been, and they will not meet the approbation of the people.

The rulings and decisions of the seven and the eight will become immortal and live in history through the long cycles of time—the first, to be approved by those who love republican government, right, and justice, and abhor perjury, forgery, fraud, and villainy; the second, to be condemned, loathed, and despised by all the good people of coming time who love self-government and despise fraud and corruption. The decisions of the eight offer a reward for forgery, perjury, and bribery—not a reward of gold and silver, but a reward of the Presidency of the United States, with all the patronage thereto belonging.

Those who believed there was no safe retreat for fraud, forgery, bribery, and perjury under our Constitution and laws have been told by the decision of the eight that they were mistaken; that all these offenses, although a stench in the nostrils of all honest men, may be committed by a villainous, partisan returning board under the thin gauze of color of law, without any of its substance or spirit, and thereby the voice of a State and nation stifled, the will of the people defeated, and a man not elected can be installed into the office of President of the United States, and that the people under our Constitution and the laws are helpless and without a remedy to prevent the commission of such a monstrosity.

That it may be seen that I am not overdrawing the picture, I call attention to some of the offers of proof in the Louisiana case and the rulings of the eight thereon. The counsel for the Tilden electors offered to prove, among other things:

First. That the Hayes electors received from five to ten thousand votes less than the Tilden electors.

Second. That the returning board willfully and fraudulently counted as many as thirteen hundred and sixty-four votes for some of the Hayes electors never cast at any voting-place in the State.

Third. That William P. Kellogg when he gave the certificate to the Hayes electors well knew the certificate was false and untrue and that the Hayes electors had not been elected, but, on the contrary, that the Tilden electors had been elected.

Fourth. That the affidavits of riot, tumult, and intimidation were falsely fabricated and forged under the direction and with the knowledge of the returning board.

Fifth. That votes given for Tilden and Hendricks were willfully and fraudulently counted for Hayes and Wheeler by the returning board.

Sixth. That the Hayes electors, the returning board, and divers other persons entered into an unlawful conspiracy with each other a short time before the election, to cause it to be certified and returned that the Hayes electors had received the majority of all the votes cast at the election, whether such should be the fact or not; and that in pursuance and execution of said conspiracy said returning board did, knowingly, willfully, and fraudulently certify and return the Hayes electors elected, well knowing at the time that the Tilden electors were elected.

These are some of the things offered to be proven, and the proof was rejected by the eight republicans on the commission, the seven democrats voting to hear the evidence. The eight answer, "All that's aliunde."

The effect of that decision is, that although all these things may be true, yet the electoral votes thus fraudulently and corruptly procured must be counted, and the candidate defeated at the polls declared elected.

Commissioner ABBOTT offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That testimony tending to show that the so-called returning board of Louisiana had no jurisdiction to canvass the votes for electors of President and Vice-President, is admissible.

This resolution was voted down by the immortal eight, thereby deciding that although the said returning board had no jurisdiction to canvass the votes for President and Vice-President under the law, yet if they did so without any jurisdiction, right, or power whatever, such canvass was binding upon the whole people, and a President could thereby be elected. Such a doctrine is at variance with every principle of law and common sense. The universal rule is that whenever a thing is done without jurisdiction over the subject-matter it is absolutely null and void. Where a court has jurisdiction its judgment, although onerous, is binding until reversed by proper lawful authority; but where a court renders a judgment without having jurisdiction over the subject-matter its judgment is void. If the returning board had no jurisdiction to canvass and count the votes for President, then its action was coram non judice, and could bind no one, and could be of no validity whatever; and yet the immortal eight refused to receive evidence tending to show that fact.

The immortal eight has not only made decisions contrary to law and precedent, and refused to hear evidence tending to prove forgery, perjury, bribery, and fraud, but they have made decisions directly contradictory, varying their decisions upon the same point, apparently to make them suit the particular case, in order to count in the Hayes electors. In the Florida case the question of eligibility of one of the Hayes electors was raised, and the commission made the following order:

Ordered, That in the case of Florida the commission will receive evidence relating to the eligibility of Frederick C. Humphreys, one of the persons named in certificate No. 1 as elector.

Under this order the commission did hear evidence touching the eligibility of said Humphreys. The grounds of ineligibility urged against said Humpheys was that he held an office of trust and profit under the United States.

In the Louisiana case the same question of ineligibility for the same reason was raised against two of the Hayes electors, and evidence was offered tending to prove the same, and Commissioner BAYARD offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That no person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States is eligible to be appointed an elector, and that this commission will receive evidence tending to prove such ineligibility as offered by counsel for objectors to certificates 1 and 3.

This resolution was voted down by the immortal eight, and an order made that the evidence be not received. Judge Bradley, having voted to admit such evidence with the seven democrats in the Florida case, changed his vote in the Louisiana case and voted with the republican commissioners. Under these orders evidence was excluded in the Louisiana case.

Then comes the Oregon case now before the House, and the same question of ineligibility for the same cause has been raised against Watts, one of the Hayes electors, and the commission decided to hear and did hear evidence touching Watts's ineligibility.

The commission first decides in the Florida case that evidence is admissible touching the eligibility of electors; and then in the Louisiana case it reverses that decision, and holds that such evidence is not admissible: and then in the Oregon case it reverses its decision again, and decides to hear and does hear such testimony. O, consistency, thou art a jewel! These decisions are plainly inconsistent and contradictory. They are not all right and lawful. If the decision in the Florida and Oregon cases is the law of those cases, then the decision in the Louisiana case is not the law and vice versa.

The Constitution of the United States declares that "no Senator or Representative or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector." Notwithstanding this constitutional prohibition the immortal eight have decided that persons holding offices of trust or profit under the United States may be appointed electors, and after they have voted as such electors their votes are genuine and must be counted, thereby nullifying and holding for naught a provision of the Federal Constitution, which is the supreme law of the land.

The rulings and decisions of the immortal eight will, in my judgment, be condemned, loathed, and despised by all right-thinking people.

Mr. Speaker, I voted for the electoral bill, believing it was the best thing that could be done, and having faith that the commission would rise above party, investigate the charges of perjury, forgery, bribery, fraud, and want of jurisdiction in the Louisiana returning board, and give the country decisions that would meet the approbation of the people and forever condemn the use of fraud and corruption to defeat the will of the people.

I believed when I voted for the bill and I still believe there was a wide-spread conspiracy to inaugurate Hayes at all hazards, and that without some law, rule, or measure making some provisions for the counting of the votes in the controverted States there was not the remotest chance for Tilden to be inaugurated President. I have heard it said the democrats in this House at one time held the solution of the presidential question in their own hands, and could have had Tilden inaugurated, but they had surrendered to the republicans.

This is not true. The democrats in this House never at any time had it in their power to solve the presidential problem in their own way. The people had voted in the several States, and the votes had been sent to the President of the Senate.

These votes have been in the possession of the President of the Senate and not in the possession of this House. It was claimed by one party that the President of the Senate had the power and authority, and that it was his duty, to count the votes in the presence of the Senate and House, and determine for himself what votes he would count; on the other hand it was claimed that the Senate and House were to count the votes, each having equal power and authority in the premises. There was no rule or law to govern in the count; the twenty-second joint rule had been abrogated.

I believe the Senate would have had a President (if the present incumbent had not been equal to the task one would have been elected who would) on the day the two Houses met in joint session to count the votes who would have claimed and exercised the right to determine and count the votes and announce the result, in the absence of some law or joint rule directing otherwise.

Suppose he should have done so and declared Hayes elected, against the protestations of the House, how would the case have stood? The House, believing the action of the President of the Senate unlawful and revolutionary, and not having the votes in its possession, could have done but one thing, to wit: declare there had been no election and proceed and elect Tilden. There would then have been two men declared elected President. The heads of the Departments that hold over under the laws of the United States would have recognized Hayes as the President after the 4th of March, and the Senate would have done the same thing; Hayes could have appointed a new Cabinet, and the Senate, under the Constitution, would have confirmed the same. The House could have recognized Tilden as President, but no other department of Government would have done so. Hayes would have been in with a Secretary of War, of the Navy, and of the Treasury, and all the other Cabinet officers standing by him. The purse and the sword would have been in his hands and under his control. Tilden would have been without a cabinet, without an army, a navy, or a treasury, and could have done nothing.

But some say the peopie would have stood by him. It is meant by this that the people would have rallied to Tilden under arms to fight him into the presidential office. If this is what is meant, how futile. What lover of his country could desire such a state of affairs? That would be the end of all free government. He that would plunge his country into such a condition is an enemy to free government. Such confusion and disorder could not be tolerated for a moment.

Under these circumstances the electoral bill was passed. The results have not been wuat we expected; the country has been disappointed.

It is said now by some that this side of the House ought to defeat the count; yes, defeat the object of the bill. I know our first impressions when we see a great wrong and fraud about to be committed is to defeat and prevent the consummation of the same. But before we prevent the consummation of what we believe to be a wrong we should look well to the result of our action. If the count is defeated every lawyer knows there will be no President after the 4th of March and no authority in the Constitution and laws to make a President. An interregnum in the office of President would be produced without any authority under the Constitution to fill the same. Anarchy and confusion would be the result. To this I can never give my consent. I will never by my vote bring about such anarchy and confusion. The party that would bring about such anarchy and confusion in this country could not sustain itself. It would dissolve away like the snow and frost before the rays of a burning sun.

No party can expect to govern this great country that abandons the forms of law and order. We on this side of the House expected the other side to abide the result if it had been in our favor. I know it is hard to see so great a fraud committed, but we must remember that there is no remedy in disorder and confusion. Our party is a party of law and order, and under our form of government the people at stated intervals have the opportunity to correct such wrongs. Let us have the record of the black and infamous fraud made, and then like law-abiding citizens let us appeal to the people in the manner pointed out by the law and Constitution, and they in my judgment will correct the wrong in such majorities that it will be impossible for conspirators and perjured returning boards to defeat their will.

There is nothing to disband the democratic party. There has been nothing done by the republican party to draw off democratic support to the republican party; but on the contrary much has taken place to give the democratic party recruits from the republican laymen, if the democratic party is but true to itself and stands firm upon the Constitution and the laws.

The Election in Louisiana.

SPEECH OF HON. G. C. CABELL,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 20, 1877,

On the report of the joint electoral commission upon the vote of Louisiana.

Mr. CABELL. Mr. Speaker, I cannot forbear to enter at this time my solemn protest and that of the people whom I have the honor in part to represent against the illegal and partisan decision just made by the members constituting the majority of the joint electoral commission.

When the news was flashed through the iron veins of this great Republic that the Congress of the United States, in a spirit of patriotism never excelled in the history of ancient or modern times, had constituted a high commission for the settlement of the disputed matters growing out of the late presidential election—a commission to be composed of Senators and Representatives, and members of that august tribunal, the Supreme Court of the United States—a thrill of joy pervaded the hearts of the people of this country, and a genuine confidence was inspired that through the labors of this "high commission" every doubt in regard to the election would be fairly solved, every effort at fraud thwarted, fraudulent returning boards rebuked, and the presidential office awarded to that man who by the votes of the American people was justly entitled thereto. To accomplish its grand purposes the joint commission was invested with every power, privilege, and prerogative which belonged or pertained to either and both Houses of Congress under our Constitution and laws, and every facility afforded to enable its members to properly investigate, rightly consider, and fairly adjudge in reference to the mightiest issue ever submitted to the arbitrament of a human tribunal. The difficulties and disputes incident to the fiercest political campaign ever conducted in this country, with all the attendant circumstances, charges, and proofs of fraud and corruption, were turned over to the commission for investigation and determination. Counsel high in the esteem of the country and learned in the law were chosen to aid the deliberations of this high tribunal, whose authority it was said "none could question and whose decision all would accept as final."

How did this commission proceed and what work has it accomplished?

The case of the disputed election in Florida was first submitted. In that case the State of Florida stood forth proclaiming through her governor, her Legislature, and her supreme court that her people had voted at the late election for Tilden, and not for Hayes, as had been represented by a vile and faithless returning board.

But the voice of a sovereign State, protesting through her every department of government, was unheeded and stifled, and the votes of her people, by the great returning board of the nation, counted for a candidate for whom they were not cast.

Eight to seven, a strictly partisan vote, did the work; and the fact suddenly flashed upon the country that partisanship, not patriotism, controlled the actions of the majority of that commission from which the country expected so much.

The paltry pretext advanced by or on behalf of the commission, that no evidences or presentations of fraud were submitted with the Florida case, in some degree appeased the astonished country and gave ground for hope that when the case of Louisiana was reached the proofs of outraged justice and bare-faced frauds there presented would extort from the commission a decision favorable to the Tilden electors.

Vain hope! The State of Louisiana was put upon trial and a decision was reached. And such a decision!

If the country was astonished at the determination of the Florida case, it was made to stand aghast at the decision in reference to Louisiana.

A partisan majority of the grand commission coolly informed the country that they had no power, that Congress had no power to go behind the certificate of the so-called governor and report of the returning board of Louisiana; that, although invested with all the power and authority of the two Houses of Congress, the commission could not and would not hear evidence in reference to the glaring frauds and flagrant villainies whereby the people of Louisiana were robbed of their votes and the country at large of the President of its choice.

What an astounding revelation! What a monstrous confession! Why did not the gentlemen composing the majority of the commission go further and couple with their determination the necessary correlative proposition, that while the two Houses of Congress possessed neither power to arrest nor to repress fraud—a power exercised by the feeblest tribunal in the land—they yet possessed the power if not the will to perpetuate it.

The people of this country will be slow to realize the utter impotency of the Constitution framed by our fathers and the powers thereby conferred upon the Federal Legislature, as interpreted by the joint high commission. That Congress has no right to canvass electoral returns made to it in pursuance of the Constitution; no right to investigate when an injured State alleges fraud and proves it; no right to correct abuses and frauds when they are thrust patent and flagrant into the very faces of the two Houses, is a doctrine to which neither I nor the country will subscribe.

The spectacle which we present to the civilized nations of the world as represented by the conclusions of the committee will be as astonishing to them as humiliating to us. We have boasted that our Constitution was the grandest achievement of human wisdom known to history and our system of laws the simplest and yet the most perfect and comprehensive ever instituted for the government of a people. Yet how do our vain boastings fade away and our delusions vanish as we comprehend and other countries discover in the light of this new revelation that there resides neither strength nor vigor in the Constitution and laws of our country sufficient to repress the frauds and throttle the villainies of a few sweet-scented individuals organized into returning boards in one or two of the States of this Union.

Mr. Speaker, the defect does not exist in the Constitution, nor are there any powers wanting to Congress whereby the great objects in the creation of the commission might not have been attained. The defect turns out now to have been in the constitution of the commission itself, and the fault and the wrong of the final result will forever lie at the doors of those composing the majority of that commission—men "whom the world thought worthy," but who in an evil hour exchanged patriotism for policy and sunk the character of the judge in that of the partisan.

The joint commission has failed of its high destiny and wandered wide of its great mission. Instituted for the discharge of a high and imposing duty, it was expected by Congress and demanded by the country that the commission should regard no technicality, spare no labor, omit no investigation, and tolerate no fraud, but go boldly to the consideration of the whole electoral question and determine who by the honest votes of the people had been elected President of the United States. Instead of justifying reasonable public expectation, the commission has returned to us a decision which declares in effect that for more than two months Congress has been enacting a solemn farce and holding out vain and deceitful promises to a long-suffering and outraged people. For I declare here that to tell the people of this country, after more than three months of anxious suspense and business prostration, that the two Houses of Congress under the Constitution have not the power to look into the electoral votes of the several States to eliminate fraud from the returns and declare the true result of the election, is to insult their intelligence and to challenge their credulity.

It is too late now, especially too late for the "guide stars" of the republican party, to find defects in the Constitution and to affect a want of power in its provisions, when so much has heretofore been asserted and exercised at their instance and instigation.

For more than twelve years the Executive and Congress have assumed to hold the people under military control, to appoint governors and uphold them with the bayonet, to reconstruct States, and to make and unmake governments as fancy inclined or republican interests dictated. There was held to be power in all these years in Congress to meet any emergency. To assert a theory then was but to claim a power—power as construed to exist by some of the very gentlemen who now as members of the joint commission with farcical wantonness assure the country of the helplessness of its Congress to repress the frauds and forgeries certified from a State, although that State, panoplied in her sovereignty and writhing under her disgrace, may be standing forth pleading for justice and demanding protection from wrong. When we consider the ample powers conferred by Congress upon the commission, we fail to recognize any good motive which could have inspired the majority in coming to their conclusions. They refused to hear evidence to establish the truth. They refused to investigate the reeking, rankling frauds whereby the vote of a whole State was stolen, and in the exercise of powers which they were pleased to believe involved doubts solved every doubt in favor of the red-handed despoilers of a people's rights.

A decision so unjust in its character and so impotent in its conclusions can never be accepted otherwise than as the emanation of minds distempered by passion and blinded by party hate. If the two Houses of Congress possess no greater powers in relation to the electoral count than those ascribed to them by the majority of the joint commission, better would it have been for the country, better would it have been for them, if weeks ago they had called two of our pages to the bar of the House and required them to count every vote named in every certificate, whether fraudulent or not, sent under cover to the President of the Senate. And why not? If this decision establishes anything, it clearly establishes the principle that hereafter the President of the United States may be elected by "returning boards," and not by the people, and that, no matter by what means accomplished, whether by corruption or otherwise, the candidate who can win to himself the greatest number of returning boards may fill the highest office in the Government, the votes of the people and their Congress to the contrary notwithstanding.

I aver, Mr. Speaker, that my disappointment in this matter is greater at the manner in which the great wrong has been accomplished than at the failure of my party to win success. In common with a large majority of my democratic brethren on this floor, I voted for the bill creating the electoral commission. With every instinct of my nature warring against the miserable alternative, I yet believed it under the circumstances the best that could be done for our party and the country. I believed, as I am sure that our majority in Congress believed, that, although Tilden was fairly elected, the President of the Senate intended to count Hayes in, and that General Grant intended to seat him, if necessary, at the point of the bayonet. To such "complexion had it come at last." I believed that no effectual resistance was contemplated by the only people in a position to offer it; and thus believing I accepted the sole proposition—the electoral bill—which seemed to offer the one and only chance of a legal solution of the difficulties which surrounded us. We selected such men for the electoral commission as according to all human rules ought to have vindicated the object and purposes of their selection. If they or a majority of them have disappointed our reasonable expectations, the fault rests with them, and not upon us.

I sometimes hear it said that we should not have voted for the bill. Why not? What else could we have done? Who proposed a better scheme for the settlement of the perplexing matter? Frail mortals do not usually see things as well at the beginning as at the conclusion of a transaction; but in this we acted from a sense of duty and of patriotism—we took the only chance presented, and I see no reason now to believe that the result would have been different if we had defeated the bill. If any gentleman can point us to an honorable escape from the dilemma in which circumstances have placed us, if there are any so wise as to lead us to a different and better result, I am more than willing to follow; but I am not willing to be a "blind follower of the blind," and rush headlong upon schemes which promise nothing save to plunge the country into chaos and anarchy. The country desires peace, order, and good government, and we can best attain those ends by a faithful observance on our part of the great principles embodied in our Constitution.

The people of this country are quick to perceive any infringement of their chartered liberties, and they will in proper time fearfully rebuke the faithlessness of the republican party. The wrongs and injuries heaped by that party upon some of the Southern States of this Union, especially upon the State of Louisiana, will in time produce their legitimate fruits, and create a happy revulsion in public sentiment in favor of a State which has indeed been tried in the fire of affliction. For four years scourged by war, for eight years blighted by the withering rule of the alien plunderer, now stripped by an unjust decision of the rights and immunities of freemen, the chivalric people of Louisiana, in the sublimity of patriotism, have endured their wrongs and borne their afflictions with more than Roman firmness or Spartan bravery.

But the day of deliverance for Louisiana from the hands of the despoiler will come, as it will come for the people of this entire country. The wickedness of our opponents has culminated in an unjust decision rendered by a partisan majority upon the electoral commission. Never will the American people willingly assent to a decision so unjust. It may seat Mr. Hayes in the presidential chair, but it will add no luster to the good name which his friends have ascribed to him. It may give a new, but short lease of power to the republican party, but let me tell you gentlemen of the opposition that you have no cause for rejoicing. You can never feel satisfied with the treacherous means by which you have achieved your temporary triumph. "Be sure that your sins will find you out," for this partisan electoral decision, which troubles you even now, as sure as Heaven is just, will bring its bitter rewards to the party which so eagerly avails itself of the most stupendous wrong ever inflicted upon the rights, and liberties of a people.

The Texas Pacific Railroad—No more Subsidies—No more Partnerships between the Government and Private Individuals or Corporations.

SPEECH OF HON. L. T. NEAL,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 1, 1877,

On the Texas Pacific Railroad bill.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, among the many bills upon our Calendar which are appropriate subjects for discussion at this time, none exceeds in importance, or in the magnitude of the interests it involves, the bill amendatory of and supplementary to the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas and Pacific Railroad Company, and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871; and the act supplementary thereto, approved May 2, 1872; and the act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific Ocean," approved July 27, 1866. And although it has received the sanction of a majority of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, from which it is reported, I desire here and now to enter my protest against its passage.

During the first session of the Forty-third Congress, I submitted to this House my views upon the question of the power of the Federal Government to construct railroads within the States, or to create corporations to build such roads. I contended then that it had no constitutional power to do either the one or the other, and time and reflection have confirmed me in the opinion I then expressed. So that in my judgment there is an insuperable constitutional barrier to the enactment of this bill into a law, since it involves precisely the same principles as would one providing for the construction of a railroad within the limits of a State, or for the incorporation of a company to construct such a road, if it does not, as I believe it does, authorize more than one of the companies or corporations named therein to do that very thing.

But without repeating the argument that I made at that time, and waiving for the purposes of this particular bill the question of the constitutional power of Congress to enact it into a law, there are other reasons that induce me to oppose it, some of which I shall endeavor to state as briefly as I can. I can see nothing in it to commend it to the favorable consideration of this House. On the contrary it presents to my mind only a bold and skillful attempt of a set of adventurous speculators to put their hands into the Treasury of the United States and enrich themselves at the expense of the people by taking therefrom the enormous sum of nearly two hundred and fifty millions of dollars. The proposition is for the Government to guaranty the interest on the bonds of the several companies named in the bill.

The third section provides that the Texas and Pacific Railroad Company shall execute and deposit with the Secretary of the Treasury its bonds, payable in gold fifty years after their date, with interest coupons payable semi-annually in gold coin, at 5 per cent. per annum, to the extent of forty thousand dollars per mile; that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company shall issue and deposit its bonds of a like character to the same amount upon that part of the main line of its road east of the Colorado River, and at the rate of thirty-five thousand dollars per mile for its San Diego branch; and that the Secretary of the Treasury shall indorse for and in the name of the United States a guaranty of interest on such bonds.

By the provisions of the fourth section, whenever it shall be made to appear to the President, in the manner set forth therein, that ten or more miles of the main line of the roads of either of these companies have been constructed and properly equipped, the Secretary of the Treasury is required to deliver to it for such road so constructed and equipped these bonds at the rate of thirty thousand dollars per mile for the plain or open country, and forty-thousand dollars per mile for the rough or mountainous country, or an average of thirty-five thousand dollars per mile for the whole line—one-half of the roads being, for this purpose, considered by the bill as located in the plain or open, and the other half in the rough or mountainous country. It contains a like provision for the delivery of bonds upon similar conditions to the Southern Pacific Company for its San Diego branch at an average of thirty thousand instead of thirty-five thousand dollars per mile.

The interest upon the bonds of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company is authorized by this same section to be guaranteed by the Government in the same manner, to the extent of thirty thousand dollars per mile, and they are to be delivered to it upon the same terms, at the average rate of twenty-five thousand dollars per mile, the remaining five thousand dollars per mile being in each case retained by the Government as a partial security for itself. And the same rights, privileges, and benefits are conferred by the tenth section upon the other roads named in the bill, three in number. The mileage of the several roads is, according to the best estimate I have been able to make or obtain, as follows:

	Miles.
The Texas and Pacific Railroad Company, (main line,) Fort Worth to junction with the Southern Pacific in New Mexico, about	700
The New Orleans branch, Marshall to New Orleans, about	400
The Memphis branch, Jefferson to Memphis, about	350
The Vicksburgh branch, Shreveport to Monroe, about	140
The Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, Vinita to junction with Texas and Pacific at one hundredth meridian, about	375
The Southern Pacific Railroad Company, (main line,) junction with Texas and Pacific in New Mexico to Fort Yuma, about	500
The San Diego branch, San Gorgonia Pass to San Diego, about	100
Total	2,565

The aggregate amount of bonds which they will be authorized to issue will therefore be $89,450,000:

The Texas and Pacific, at $40,000 per mile	$28,000,000
The New Orleans branch, at $30,000 per mile	12,000,000
The Memphis branch, at $30,000 per mile	10,500,000
The Vicksburgh branch, at $30,000 per mile	4,200,000
The Atlantic and Pacific, at $30,000 per mile	11,250,000
The Southern Pacific, at $40,000 per mile	20,000,000
The San Diego branch, at $35,000 per mile	3,500,000
Total	89,450,000

And taking this as the basis for computation, the annual interest for the payment of which the United States will be liable will be $4,472,500 in gold, and the aggregate amount in the fifty years that the bonds are to be allowed to run before they become due and payable will reach the enormous sum of $223,625,000.

I might, indeed I ought, to add to this amount of bonds twelve million dollars more for the Texas and Pacific Company, because contingencies, the happening or not happening of which will rest wholly with the railroad companies, may arise which will authorize that company to build a road through from the Colorado River, near Fort Yuma, to San Diego, by what is designated in the bill as the direct line between those two points, a distance of about three hundred miles, with the same right to issue guaranteed bonds that it has on other parts of its main route. If we do this, it will swell the aggregate amount of bonds to $101,450,000, the annual interest to $5,072,500, and the interest for the full fifty years to $253,625,000.

But this is not all. The liability of the Government will not stop here. It may be continued for fifteen or twenty years longer, until the right of the creditor or bondholder to enforce the payment of his indebtedness shall be barred by the statute of limitations, and thereby increased in amount nearly or quite 33 per cent. by the failure or refusal of the railroad companies to redeem their bonds at maturity. Nor will this liability of the Government be nominal only. Whatever it may be upon its face, it will prove in the end to be most positive and real, and I have no doubt that every dollar, or nearly every dollar, included in or covered by it, will have to be paid by the Government, without any chance for its remuneration, save such compensation as it may from time to time retain for services rendered it by these companies. The past experience of the Government in projects of this kind leaves little or no room to doubt that this will be the result of its indorsement of these bonds. Such has been the universal history of its attempted aid in all such undertakings. In every instance of the kind its efforts have been attended with great loss to itself, little benefit to the enterprise intended to be helped, and disgrace and obloquy to Congress. To speak plainly, I do not believe that there ever was or ever will be a public subsidy of any kind into which fraud, dishonesty, and corruption did not and will not enter as the principal ingredients.

During the debates upon the acts under which the bonds to aid in the construction of the Pacific railroads that have already been built were issued it was urged with just as much zeal, earnestness, and apparent candor as it now is in this case, that the Government would never be called upon to pay one dollar of them, either principal or interest. The security proposed was alleged to be and was just as good and ample in every respect as that which is here offered. It was better in fact, because no third parties intervened to embarrass the Government in its rights, and it actually had there that which, I shall be able to show, only a pretense is made of giving it here. Yet to-day the Government has virtually been stripped of all its securities. One after another of the liens it had acquired has been released, more than twenty-seven million dollars have up to the present time been paid by it for interest upon these bonds, its payments of interest upon them are still being made at the rate of nearly four millions a year, and it is painfully manifest that it will ultimately be charged with the payment and suffer the loss of almost the whole of this indebtedness, principal and interest, which will amount in round numbers to one hundred and eighty-two million dollars; the paltry sums that it may be able to save for itself from year to year by the retention of one-half of such compensation as may be due these companies for services rendered by them to it in transporting mails, troops, supplies, and other things being in fact all that it will get from them to aid in its discharge. While the Credit Mobilier, with its wrecks of Christian statesmen and blasted reputation of other men who held high place in the esteem of the country, will stand for all time without a parallel as an example of the basest ingratitude and the most dishonest and dishonorable betrayal and plunder of a benefactor by those whom it had most fondly cherished and upon whom it had been most lavish in its bounties.

The advocates of this measure cannot avail themselves of the plea that this is no subsidy. It is simply pettifogging the case to urge with any degree of seriousness the argument that this is in no sense a subsidy; for it comes within the most rigorous and limited meaning of the word. A subsidy, as I understand it, is any class or kind of aid extended by one to another, or by the Government to any individual or corporation. Such at least is the ordinary signification of the term. And here the express object of the bill is to give the support, aid, co-operation of the Government to these corporations, by securing to them a loan of the public credit, and thus enabling them to accomplish by and through it that which they themselves declare to be an impossibility without it.

The fact that the liability of the Government is seemingly contingent does not detract in the least from the strength of the position that this is a subsidy. I say seemingly contingent because the probabilities that the Government will not be called upon to pay every dollar of the interest guaranteed are so slight that they are scarcely worthy of even a passing notice in the consideration of the bill, and that it becomes us as practical men to treat such sum, whatever it may be, as the absolute, unconditional debt of the Government. That private capitalists cannot be found, either at home or abroad, to take the bonds of these companies upon such terms as they now offer to the Government to save it harmless from any loss by reason of its guarantee of interest upon such bonds, is of itself strong, if not conclusive evidence of a gross exaggeration of the value of the security offered, and consequently of certain and inevitable loss to the Government should we accept it. But whether this inference can be justly drawn from this single fact or not is immaterial, since an examination into the nature and character of the security proposed will fully sustain me in all that I have said in regard to it, and show most clearly that I do not state the case too strongly when I assert with such confidence that the liability of the Government, although nominally contingent or conditional, will be in effect fixed and absolute.

The principal security proposed is this: Each company upon accepting this act—should the bill become a law—is to file with the Secretary of the Interior a mortgage upon its road, with its equipment, depots, shops, fixtures, and property of every kind, including the lands granted by Congress to aid in its construction, and in the case of the Texas and Pacific company the lands granted to it by the State of Texas, to secure the principal of the bonds issued, the interest guaranteed by the United States, and a sinking fund to be paid into the Treasury of the United States, commencing with the year 1886, of 1 per cent. per annum in gold on the whole amount of bonds issued. To guard against any failure or refusal to execute and deliver the mortgage required, the acceptance of the provisions of the act itself by either of said companies is declared ipso facto to constitute a first lien or mortgage upon the property I have named.

All the other provisions of the bill relating to the setting apart and payment into the United States Treasury, at certain times, of sums arising from the sales of land and the net earnings of the road, and amounts received from the Government for the transportation of troops and supplies, and for its postal and telegraph service, which are declared to be for the purpose of more specifically providing for the interest on the bonds, and a sufficient sinking fund to redeem them at maturity, add but little to the value of the security upon which the Government must rely. None of us acting for ourselves in matters affecting our individual interests would take or rely upon any such security in any case, much less in a case of this magnitude. No prudent, careful business man would do anything of the kind. Free transportation for its troops, supplies, mails, and other things, while the bonds are outstanding and unpaid, which the Government will be able to obtain by withholding whatever shall become due to these companies for such services, will be about all that can be expected from any of these provisions. I regard the others as perfectly nugatory and valueless for the purposes of security. I do not believe that one dollar will ever be realized by the Government under either of them. Nothing will be easier than for the officers of these soulless corporations, with whom the determination of the question must rest, to show that no net profits have been derived from the sales of land or from running and operating their roads.

Then, again, the bill contains no specific or summary remedy for a non-compliance with these provisions; and a resort to a suit at law or in equity, as might seem best, to enforce such compliance and obtain the benefits proposed to be given by them, will be attended with uncertainty, if not with absolute failure to secure the relief sought. The whole security of the government will therefore virtually rest upon the mortgage alone. For it will become apparent as I proceed that what is termed the additional security, that which is provided in the sixth section by retaining in the Treasury five thousand dollars per mile of the bonds to be issued, to meet any deficiency in the interest fund, will wholly fail in its purpose and prove no security whatever. And what will be the rights of the Government under the mortgage? When you come to foreclose it, which must be done in the usual way for asserting that right, no special mode or power being given by the bill for that purpose, who will have the first lien upon the mortgaged property, the Government or the holders of the bonds issued by the railroad companies? In my opinion, the rights and interests of the Government will be subordinated to those of the bondholders. The Government will be the surety, the bondholders the creditors, and as against the creditors the surety will stand only in the place of the debtor. Its rights in the mortgaged property will in equity be substantially the same as if it were not a party to the mortgage. So that, upon the general principles of eqhity, the Government will not be able to avail itself of the benefits of the mortgage until full payment of the principal of the bonds has been made, and will consequently lose all it will have been compelled to pay by virtue of its suretyship, as it cannot be seriously contended that a second lien will be worth anything at all.

However great the hardship may be the Government and not the creditors will have to bear it. To hold otherwise will be to violate every rule of construction applicable to cases of this kind, and to defeat the very object sought by the indorsement of the Government; for while such indorsement will secure to the creditors their interest, it will take away from them the only security they will have for the principal of their debt, if the mortgaged property is to be first applied to the repayment of whatever sum may be paid by the Government for their benefit. Now it may be that no case exactly parallel with this can be found. But other cases which lay down the same principle are reported, and the doctrine applicable to it is fully recognized and established. There is no rule of law or equity better settled than that which declares that the creditor is entitled to the benefit of any counterbond, mortgage, or other security which a surety may have taken from the principal to indemnify him, and that he may go into a court of equity and reach such security to satisfy his debt.

If, then, the creditor can appropriate to his use all securities given by the principal to the surety as well as those which may be given to himself, he certainly has the priority of lien where two mortgages are given by the debtor upon the same property, one to himself, the other to the surety, or where a mortgage is given to them jointly.

In one case that I recall—and there are many such—where the surety had obtained from the debtor a mortgage to secure him against liability and also to secure another debt due to himself, the court held that the creditor was entitled not only to the benefits of the mortgage but to be paid out of the first proceeds of the mortgaged property in preference to the surety. In other cases the courts have gone so far as to hold that where a creditor has lent the principal two sums of money on different and distinct securities, a party who is surety for the first sum only cannot, upon payment of that sum, have a transfer of the securities held for it until the creditor has also been paid the other sum, thus qualifying the rule that the surety is entitled to the benefits of all the securities held by the creditor by subjecting this right to prior rights in the creditor, and extending the one I contend for much further than it need be extended to become fully applicable to this case. And if this be true, as it undoubtedly is, it is a self-evident proposition that the only effect of the retention of the five thousand dollars per mile out of the forty thousand dollars per mile of guaranteed bonds will be to increase rather than diminish the liability of the Government. The object of retaining these bonds in the Treasury is to throw them upon the market and sell them to meet any deficiency in the amounts to be realized from the sources of which I have already spoken and deposited for interest.

But if the rights of the Government are subordinated to those of the creditors, you will by selling the bonds held in reserve not only increase by one-seventh the interest to be paid by the Government, but will increase the debt to be paid out of the proceeds of the mortgaged property prior to that of the Government to the extent of the five thousand dollars per mile, and decrease in a corresponding degree the chances of the Government to be re-imbursed for whatever sum it shall have paid upon the bonds guaranteed. Besides all this, the Government will be charged with the duties and responsibilities of trustee for the creditors or bondholders. It will have thrust upon it the care and management of all the business of these companies from the beginning to the end of this whole transaction in so far as it relates to their bonded debt, it being made the express duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to take charge of the issuing and registering of the bonds, the purchase and cancellation of the bonds for the sinking fund, the sale of the bonds held in reserve to meet any deficiency in this fund, and all other things pertaining to the execution of the different provisions of the bill, should it become a law.

The sum of the whole is that it is one grand organized scheme for plunder and robbery under the guise of law; and I entirely mistake the character and temper of the American people if they do not refuse longer to submit to be thus plundered and robbed, however specious may be the pretexts or plausible the theories advanced to gain their consent to any such undertakings. They want no more partnerships between the Government and private individuals or corporations in which the Government pays all and the individual or corporation gets all. I know the people of my own State do not, because a little more than two years ago, when the question of railroad aid was directly submitted to them in the shape of an amendment to our State constitution, they declared against it by an overwhelming majority, a vote of more than six to one. And that, too, in the face of the fact that that amendment was carefully guarded by restrictions most stringent in their character, requiring, among other things, that no subscription, loan, or contribution should be made to any railroad company unless it should be first authorized by the votes of two-thirds of the electors of the city, township, or incorporated village proposing to make it, given at an election held for that purpose, and that the order for such election should specify all the conditions of the subscription, loan, or contribution proposed; the consideration to be given therefor, the estimated cost of the proposed work, the means secured for its completion, and the part of the work upon which the proposed subscription, loan, or contribution was to be expended. And I think I will be justified in saying that at least eight out of ten of those voting affirmatively upon said amendment were opposed to the principle of it, and only gave it their support because of a desire upon their part to apply it to some local enterprise in which they were either personally or otherwise directly interested.

The cry of the originators of this outrageous and iniquitous scheme, and of their advocates and lobbyists, which has resounded through the halls and anterooms of this Chamber, and which has been heard upon this floor itself, from the very commencement of this session, that the passage of this bill will revive trade and business, give employment to thousands of idle and unemployed laboring-men, and bring us unbounded prosperity in a thousand other ways, will fall dull and listless upon the ears of the people. Even those who in their anxiety, poverty, and distress are willing that almost any experiment shall be tried that will afford any well-founded hope or chance for relief, by putting bread into their mouths and clothes upon their backs, will not be deluded by any such appeals. They have learned long since that the promises of such men are not made to be fulfilled, that they but "keep the word of promise to our ear and break it to our hope." He will be most rash and inconsiderate who shall attempt to offer in justification of his vote for this bill any such reasons and expect to escape the wrath and indignation of his constituency, unless perchance he shall be the representative of some locality or section whose people will be immediately and directly benefited by the construction of these roads, and who will favor the project upon purely local, sectional, and selfish grounds, regardless of the cost or consequences to the Government and the country at large.

Mr. Speaker, if we pass this bill, it will be a most flagrant, not to say dishonorable, repudiation and reversal of our own solemn judgment duly entered upon our Journal, by which, on the 15th day of December, 1875, we, by the unprecedented vote of two hundred and twenty-three to thirty-three, declared against all subsidies of every kind to individuals or corporations, whether in money, bonds, public lands, or by indorsement or pledge of the public credit. And I warn the leaders of the democratic party in this House that if they permit this bill to pass, it will be a violation of every pledge of reform and an honest and economical administration of the affairs of this Government that we have made to the people, and will result in our overthrow in almost every State in the Union in the first general election that shall be held.

Territory of Oklahoma.

SPEECH OF HON. ERASTUS WELLS,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1877,

On the bill to provide for the organization of the Territory of Oklahoma, and for the better protection of the Indian tribes therein.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I should fail in my duty to my constituents and to the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor if I did not, even in the present unfavorable condition of political events and public feeling, ask of this House a fair and impartial consideration of the bill providing for the organization of a territorial government for the aboriginal tribes now domiciled in the Indian Territory. The measure proposed, it is true, does not in its provisions carry to the extent I myself, and as I believe my constituents, desire to see carried in a proposition of this character, the principles of self-government, and consequently of enlightenment and civilization.

At the last session of Congress, after a consultation with many of the warmest and truest friends of the Indian race, and after full and careful consideration of the social and commercial interests of the people of the great States immediately interested in, as they are intimately associated with, the settlement of this question of the development of the country embraced in the limits of the Indian Territory, I introduced in this House a bill providing for the organization of Oklahoma Territory, based upon the rights of the Indian as a prospective citizen of the United States to that ownership of property which is the distinguishing feature of true civilization. That bill proposed that to each Indian, male or female, residing in the Indian Territory, and entitled to an interest in the commonalty of property therein at present obtaining, should be allotted, in fee-simple, one hundred and sixty acres of land, inalienable for a term of years, and that all other lands should be disposed of under direction of the Federal Government, reserving certain sections for school purposes, and the proceeds be vested for the sole use and benefit of the Indians now occupying this Territory and their descendants. That bill carried, as I think, to a logical conclusion the ideas of civilization intended to be inculcated in the now proposed measure, by giving to the Indian that idea of self-dependence, based upon and sustained by individual absolute control of property, without which moral responsibility, and consequently civilization is impossible. If, however, it is impossible to obtain the full measure of security and advancement for these Indian tribes, I for one, so far from throwing obstacles in the way of any advancement, am willing to accept and sustain the measure now proposed, knowing full well that civilization once commenced cannot be turned backward, and that the near future must bring with it the full progress thereof in the Indian nation as in every portion of the Union.

That I do not overstate the desire of the agricultural, mechanical, and commercial interests of the Mississippi Valley for the institution of a republican form of government in the Indian Territory and the advancement of the Indian tribes therein domiciled from a state of semi-barbarism to that of civilization; or, to state the case more concisely, from the condition of pauper wards to that of citizenship, is evidenced by the memorials and petitions praying Congress to place the Indian nation under a territorial government, presented at preceding sessions from the Board of Trade and the Chamber of Commerce of Saint Louis, and from the national commercial convention held at Saint Louis in December, 1872, which convention, composed of delegations from the chambers of commerce and boards of trade of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Chicago, Milwaukee, Saint Louis, Louisville, Memphis, New Orleans, and all other leading cities of the Union, deemed this question of so much importance to the whole Union as to make its consideration a prominent feature of its debates, and to formulate its opinion thereon in the following resolution:

Resolved by the national commercial convention, assembled in Saint Louis, That Congress be, and is hereby, respectfully memorialized to establish without delay a territorial government over the country known as the Indian Territory, bringing the people thereof under the laws and jurisdiction of the United States, on such equitable basis as will secure: First, a homestead to the head of each Indian family, the title to which cannot be alienated for a designated term of years; second, the sale of the remaining lands on such terms as will induce the rapid settlement and development of the Territory, the proceeds of such sales to be held or invested by the Government as a fund, the interest on which shall be distributed annually and equitably among the several tribes; third, the establishment of free schools, to the end that the Indian may learn the arts and occupations of civilized life.

The interest these representative mercantile bodies take in this question requires no explanation to those who have watched with even cursory interest the development of the agricultural interests of the West and Southwest. Within the memory of the youngest member of this House the center of wheat cultivation and production has passed, by successive stages, from the Genesee Valley of New York to Ohio, thence to Indiana and Illinois, and will, with the present decade, pass from Illinois and Wisconsin to Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, and that vast fertile plain extending from the Red River of the United States to the Red River of the North, and from the Mississippi River to the Rocky Mountains. So, too, with the production of maize and its attendant rearing of hogs, which is rapidly following the western march of wheat production. Nor does the progress of cultivation in the South tend in a different direction. Passing west from Georgia to Alabama, the center of cotton production is now in the State of Mississippi, and the extending settlements of Texas threaten to carry it to, if not west of, the Mississippi River, where now exists the very center, or rather bulk, of the beef production of the Union.

Nor has this western and southwestern extension of grain and animal-food production been without its accompanying extension of mechanical arts and mining industries. These have grown within a decade, not only in Missouri, but in other western States interested in this question, to formidable proportions. Situated on the borders of Missouri, Arkansas, Louisiana, Texas, New Mexico, and Kansas, with a territory of upward of seventy-two thousand square miles—larger than any State in the Union excepting only Texas—this Indian Territory forms a barrier on which the waves of commerce dash with ever-increasing violence. On the north and northwest of this Territory must be produced the corn and the cured meats necessary to sustain the cotton and sugar cultivators of the lands lying south and southwest of it, while on the south and west of this Territory, if not even within its limits, with the wide stretch of pasture lands, unaffected by frosts of the North or the drouth of the extreme South, must be reared those immense herds of beeves necessary to feed the teeming operatives of northern and eastern manufactories.

There is no fact more firmly established in commercial economy than that any increase in the costs of carriage of an article to market both decreases the value of such article at the place of production and enhances its cost at the place of consumption. So this barrier thus raised by the Indian Territory at once decreases the value of cereals and bacon to the farmer of Missouri, of Kansas, of Nebraska, of Iowa, of Wisconsin, of Illinois, of Minnesota, and of all the Northwestern States, at the same time that it enhances the cost of the cotton and sugar production of Texas, Arkansas, and Louisiana. It enhances the cost of the beef supply in each of the Northern and New England States at the same time that it circumscribes the market for the production of the factories of those States by enhancing the cost of the carriage, and consequent cost of the article, to each consumer in extensive sections of our common country. This barrier, too, shuts off in a large measure the developments of the rich mineral regions of New Mexico and Arizona, and the extension of sheep husbandry on the vast plains of those Territories. It limits the production of useful articles of husbandry and other manufactures from the minerals of Missouri and other States west of the Mississippi; it prevents the citizens of Texas, Arkansas, and Kansas from developing manufactories that might consume a portion of the raw products of those States by preventing the development of the rich coal-fields lying within the limits of this vast Indian Territory, which, containing but sixty thousand aborigines, scattered over a space larger than all New England, reduces the great States of Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, and Texas to the condition of border States, and forces the interstate commerce of these as well as of other and more populous States to circuitous routes of communication, enhancing to each the cost of articles of consumption, and depreciating in each the value of commodities produced by its labor and capital.

Sir, a glance at the map will show the error of those who, in the removal of the Cherokees, Choctaws, and other tribes from the east to the west side of the Mississippi, deemed that in locating them anew west of the Arkansas and Missouri State lines they had placed them beyond the march of civilization, and in a region which could be closed against intrusion by lines of commerce and national intercommunication. The Indian possession of the State of New York would be no greater barrier to commerce and communication between the people of New England and those of Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, and Illinois, than the exclusive possession by that race of the Indian Territory as common and indivisible property does between the people of Texas and New Mexico and those of Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Illinois. The closing of the State of New York by such possession, and the sundering of the water communication between the great lakes and the Atlantic, would be scarcely a greater calamity to the commerce of the Union than will be the irrevocable setting aside of a large Territory of fertile country in the very center of the western portion of the Mississippi Valley, and the maintaining of an impassable barrier between the grain-producing regions of the Northwest and the cotton and sugar producing lands of the Gulf regions, between the wool product of the extreme West and the manufacturers of the East, preventing the completion of a midland route to the Pacific and delaying for scores of years the settlement of Arizona and New Mexico, and the development of the varied mineral resources of these vast Territories. Not only so, but should the project which seems to find favor in some quarters, to extend those reservations and gather thereon other tribes of Indians, including the warlike Comanches, Arapahoes, Sioux, &c., be carried into effect, the States which now form the boundaries of this proposed new Territory would forever remain border States. In that event neither Missouri, Texas, Arkansas, nor Kansas could hope to develop the border portion of their domain; their inhabitants would never be free from apprehension of an Indian war; the personal property of their citizens would never be safe from the depredation of predatory strife, for where you by law exclude civilization you cannot cultivate moral responsibility; and, lacking the facilities for cheaply transporting the products of their fields to the markets most requiring them, cultivation would be neglected, and a portion of the country, the richest and fairest, as it is the most central of all its domain, would be doomed to a mere backwoods existence until the poverty following ignorance, the feuds engendered by lawless life, the disease arising from forced idleness and restraint from accustomed pursuits, unrelieved by preparation for other occupation would slowly decimate the victims of national sentimentality, leaving broad tracts, capable of awakening the industry of communities, as large as some of the seaboard States, to the possession of a few scattered representatives of a race, and the ultimate spoliation of renegade white men, willing to sink their birthright by adoption into another race for the sake of seizing the reversionary interest in its lands.

Such, sir, are the reasons which impel the people of Missouri to sustain any effort to organize the Indian Territory into a real Territory of the Union, with laws which shall protect its aboriginal inhabitants in all their vested and proper rights, but shall prevent such assured rights from trespassing upon the common rights of citizens of the United States. It is too from these reasons that spring the unanimous demand from all the mercantile interests of the Union for the erection of this Indian Territory into a community governed by the laws to which each citizen of the United States must bow, while securing to each of the aborigines all the rights of property, all the protection to person, and all the liberty of action, social and moral, enjoyed by the most favored citizens of the Union.

But, sir, it may be contended here, as it has been elsewhere, that Congress is bound by Indian treaties and cannot legislate except in the light of the provisions by which the Choctaws, Creeks, Cherokees, and their allied tribes surrendered other lands in exchange for reservations within this Indian Territory. I will not, however, detain the House by even an attempt to discuss the legal questions which have been raised whenever these Indian treaties have been discussed. This is a topic upon which other members may express with propriety positive opinions and give authoritative decisions. I am not a lawyer, and am not fitted by education or habits of thought for a discussion of the principles of law which must underlie a decision of that character. It is possible, too, that by a strict interpretation of phrases those treaties have sought to recognize in certain Indian tribes an inherent right to an ownership in common of a portion of the soil of the country, a possession from which they may not be diverted without the commitment of an assured legal force, arbitrary, and therefore repugnant, to the terms of the treaties. This possession, however, does not in any material respect differ from that by which the aborigines at one time held the lands upon which this Capitol stands: and, to admit that these treaties are beyond the power of Congress to amend, change, or set aside, is to create a new lien upon all property in the country, and to assert that a nation or nations with distinct customs, rights, and privileges can exist within our own nation, deriving their life and support from this Government, and yet form no part of it; nor, even if the theory be carried to its legitimate conclusion, be at all subject to its internal police laws, save when that police is administered as a right of war. From such an anomalous position a nation must recede, even at the expense of violating the letter of treaties—if compacts with subjects can be called treaties—or it must surrender the principle of inherent sovereignty upon which its own existence depends.

In the consideration of these Indian treaties, therefore, I prefer to be governed rather by the spirit than the letter thereof; and to rather recognize the Indian as a possible citizen than as a child-like ward or an implacable enemy. In so far, too, I believe that, despite the nominal maintenance of the treaties by the Indian Department, this position has been assumed by the United States courts, in adjudging guilty of misdemeanor those who have violated the internal-revenue laws upon this reserved land of the Indian, even when such violation has been tacitly, at least, approved by the tribes or nations which claim exclusive ownership of and jurisdiction over the land and the people residing thereon, and even where such violation was sanctioned by the express letter of the so-called treaties. (See 11 Wallace, 616.) Certainly where the tax gatherer and informer may go in violation of treaties, we may proceed in the extending of more noble attributes of civilization.

I have said, sir, that where civilization is excluded moral responsibility cannot be cultivated. I should, perhaps, have said that where self-dependence is rejected civilization cannot be assured; that the buying of hoes and spades, the giving of harness, the consignment of plows, the subsidizing of carpenters and blacksmiths, and even the erection of school-houses and churches and the employment of teachers and the clergy, will fail to elevate the Indian into manhood and cultivate in him those elements of self-independence which form the basis of republican citizenship, the submission to no authority except that of law and order, not even that of self-will and self-indulgence. It is in this respect, to my apprehension, that so far while caviling over the letter of the treaties with the Choctaws, Cherokees, and their associated tribes, the Government has broken, if not well-nigh destroyed, the spirit thereof. Promised civilization, they have been given only its husks; placed in possession of a vast proporty, sedulous care has been taken that they should neither understand nor realize its value. They have in all respects been treated like a bevy of children, to whom we give costly articles for common playthings, yet refuse to allow them even by common consent to divide them into individual ownership or to utilize the value thereof for their own benefit or that of others. They have been hedged in by restrictions, prevented from developing their own capability for self-government by a refusal of all participation in the General Government except at the cost of abandoning their race; and now, while it is claimed that this elevation may not be accorded to them, it is not denied that other and less civilized tribes may be forced into communication with them and be placed upon adjacent reservations to be governed by the same agents and to share in the same mockery of self-government so long as it be done in the form of independent, but the terrible subjectiveness of conquered and abased nationalities. It is these errors in the treatment, for I cannot call it government, of the Indian tribes that this bill seeks to, and in my opinion will, rectify. Carried into effect this proposed organization of the Indian Territory will give to these Indian tribes laws to be executed by themselves; courts within their own limits to administer justice; the right of trial by juries composed of their own people; legislation enacted by representatives of their own choosing; and it will secure to them under protection of the Federal Government inalienable and ultimately personal ownership of the soil which they may till, at the same time that it effectually guards them as tribes and as individuals from appropriation of their lands for railroad grants. It will, I believe, lead to the cultivation of the now wild lands of that Territory and to the development of its rich coal and mineral resources by affording facilities for the transportation of products to market, by exciting emulation, by creating the respect incident to citizenship, and by infusing the incentive of individual proprietorship of the soil and ownership of the crops grown thereon. And this, sir, seems to me to be the proper solution of the whole Indian question, as it disposes of the anomaly of conflicting nationalities; as it makes every person, Indian or Caucasian, amenable to the laws; as it opens the pathway of civilization toward our rich possessions in the Southwest, affords direct communication between the people of the Northwest and the vast cotton-producing region west of the Mississippi, removes from four of the principal States of the Union the curse of border life, prepares for the more speedy settlement and development of New Mexico and Arizona, prevents the closing of an important route to the Pacific Ocean, and places the Indian in a position where he may acquire a right of citizenship and the power to prolong his race by competing with the white man on equal terms as to self-government and respect to laws which must and will be enforced even if that race be extinguished thereby.

The Electoral Count.

SPEECH OF HON. J. H. BAGLEY,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 1, 1877,

On the question of counting the electoral vote for President and Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. Mr. Speaker, when I voted for the act known as the electoral commission bill I did not deem it necessary to place myself upon the record in any other manner than by my vote. I am but a humble layman, and the explanations given by men whom I considered practical lawyers and jurists were sufficient to convince me that the act was framed in the interest of truth and justice, and that a fair and liberal interpretation of it must bring peace and quiet and a solution of difficulties which at the time presaged confusion in our political affairs and possibly disaster to the country. I voted for that bill with the assurance, as I supposed, that its terms implied, if they did not declare distinctly, that all the evidence of fraud and corruption in the disputed States of Florida and Louisiana were to be fairly submitted to the tribunal to aid in its decisions; that whatever there was of wrong was to be brought to the light of day; that the wisdom of the two Houses had invented a plan which would confirm the adage that "truth is mighty and must prevail."

In my mind the election of Mr. Tilden or Mr. Hayes was a secondary object. From the evidence obtained it was fair to conclude that Mr. Tilden had received at the polls in the State of Louisiana a majority of 8,000 to 10,000 votes. But this result was disputed and the contest must be settled. Our republican friends of the Senate, in their alarm and consternation, seeing the danger that environed their candidate, early in the beginning of the session repealed the twenty-second joint rule, a rule framed and adopted by a republican Congress, and which embodied the plan pursued for years—almost since the organization of the Government—and which answered the purpose quite well until they were endangered. Contrary to and in direct opposition to their own arguments of less than a year before, and directly in the face of precedents, they assumed that the President of the Senate had the right to count the votes. It will be a strange page of history when written, the sudden change of position from what I believe was known as Mr. MORTON'S plan for counting the electoral votes and that occupied by the advocates of that bill to-day. The student of history will be likely to ask for the motive of the change. Turning to the next page of history he will find the creation of the electoral commission, and then its decisions and the manner thereof; and if he fails to discover the motive for the change from Mr. MORTON'S plan he will be a dull scholar indeed. I do not claim to know the motive. I only say the student of history will be apt to discover a motive even though it be a mistake or error of judgment on his part.

Mr. Speaker, I do not regret my vote for the electoral bill, but I do regret most sincerely the manner in which the tribunal created by that bill arrived at its conclusions. In the interests of humanity, of our country, and of common honesty it were better that the commission had never been born. I voted for it in good faith; hence I do not regret it. It was a bill conceived in the interests of peace, of truth, of justice, by a part, if not the whole, of the committee, set to adopt a plan; and, had it been administered as was intended, naught but good would have resulted. And this need not have involved the election of Mr. Tilden either. It would have been quite as consistent to admit the evidence of both the Senate and House committees, or pretend to admit it, and then decide precisely as the decisions now stand, as to have concluded without the evidence. In that event, the people would have said your tribunal has done as you required, and has rendered a verdict according to its honest judgment. But when they read the bold declaration of unfairness embodied in the resolution—the honest and fair-play sentiment of the millions of American freemen must revolt at it as a subversion of justice. I doubt not this will be the case. This is not a nation of lawyers, and although the gentlemen of the legal profession may say that the act has been administered according to its legal construction, yet the equities of the case have been neglected, and the masses of the people, who do not deal in technicalities and ask but simple justice, will feel themselves wronged and outraged.

Ordered, That the evidence offered be not received.

I say I regret the manner in which this tribunal arrived at its conclusion. I regret it so much that I would gladly see its decisions frustrated. If we are to have Mr. Hayes for President, or no matter who, let us have him without the verdict of this commission, which, if established as a precedent, with its apparently partisan decision, must for all future time bring demoralization and shame to this people and Government.

The Presidential Question.

SPEECH OF HON. H. Y. RIDDLE,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 1, 1877,

On the subject of counting the electoral vote.

Mr. RIDDLE. Mr. Speaker, during the present session of Congress I have felt that the political situation was of such gravity and magnitude that "length of days should speak and multitude of years should teach wisdom;" and acting upon that conviction I have studiously refrained from occupying the valuable time of the House in the expression of my own views and opinions. But now that the session is rapidly approaching its legal termination, I feel it to be my duty to put on record my views in regard to the great question of the presidential succession which has so profoundly agitated this body and the entire country.

After one of the most spirited and hotly contested presidential campaigns of our political history, the people of the United States went to the ballot-box on the 7th day of November, 1876, and by a majority of two hundred and sixty thousand votes declared that it was their will that Samuel J. Tilden, of New York, should be the President and Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, should be the Vice-President of the United States from and after the 4th day of March, 1877, for the constitutional term of four years.

In the early and purer days of the Republic the voice of the people would have been at once recognized as the voice of God, and every good citizen would have bowed to its majesty with a cheerful and unquestioning submission. The Rob Roy politics,

> They may take who have the power,
> And they may keep who can,

had not then been inaugurated. They were reserved until the accession to power of the republican party, which from the outset was founded upon an idea of hostility to the institutions of the South and which has uniformly represented the oppression of the southern people.

On the day after the election it was announced to the country by the representative head of the republican party that Rutherford B. Hayes and William A. Wheeler had received 185 electoral votes and had been chosen President and Vice-President of the United States; and the ingenuity of the most astute leaders of that party has, since that period, been taxed to the utmost to sustain that declaration, and machinations of the most disreputable character, which have fatigued the public indignation, have been resorted to for that purpose.

The corrupt returning boards of Florida and Louisiana were encouraged by the highest dignitaries of the party in their nefarious work of setting aside the popular judgment at the polls and subverting the republican governments of those States and of substituting therefor the fraudulent creations of their own villainy and rascality.

Such was the painful situation of the country when Congress met on the 4th day of last December; and a large majority of the American people looked with confidence to the democratic majority in the House of Representatives for the adoption of such a policy as would vindicate the ballot and prevent the inauguration of a Chief Magistrate who had not been elected by the people. To secure such a result it soon became manifest that a bold and decided policy was an indispensable condition. A firm adherence to the twenty-second joint rule in counting the votes for President and Vice-President by the two Houses of Congress and an inflexible determination by the House of Representatives not to retreat from that position and to meet the dangers of the situation with a manly vigor might have secured the inauguration of a democratic President. It is now evident that no other policy could have secured that result.

The failure to adopt such a policy and the general conviction that Mr. Hayes would be counted in by the President of the Senate, and than an election of Mr. Tilden by the House of Representatives would not be re-enforced by such positive and affirmative action as would be necessary to insure his inauguration, rendered some such measure as the electoral bill an absolute necessity. Under the circumstances, Mr. Tilden stood no earthly chance to be President without the adoption of some such measure. And this was so thoroughly understood by the democratic party in Congress and throughout the country that the electoral bill received the overwhelming indorsement of the people and the acquiescence if not the active support of the democratic candidates for President and Vice-President. Believing the bill to be both constitutional and expedient I gave it my vote with the apprehension, however, at the time that it might disappoint the expectations of its friends.

I clearly understood the provisions of the bill, and that the commission created by it was to determine the extent of its powers and what evidence under the Constitution and laws was admissible in the consideration of the objections made to the certificates opened before the two Houses of Congress by the President of the Senate. But, as the commission was expressly clothed with the same powers possessed by the two Houses of Congress acting separately or together, and as both Houses of Congress had repeatedly exercised the power of investigation into the manner and means by which elections had been conducted in the States, there was every reason to believe that the commission would receive and hear evidence in order to ascertain whether the certificates from the disputed States were correct and true representations of the actual popular majority in those States.

Such evidence they have persistently refused to hear, and have predicated their decisions upon the fraudulent declaration of the corrupt returning boards of Florida and Louisiana. The commission, by a partisan majority, have done just what it was proposed by the worst elements of the republican party that the President of the Senate should do. They have counted in Mr. Hayes by a simple arithmetical enumeration, without any attempt by fair and honorable investigation to ascertain who had received a majority of the bona fide votes of the American people for the first office in their gift. By such a course they have disappointed the reasonable expectations of the country and have engendered in the hearts of all true patriots the most gloomy forebodings as to the future of the Republic. We asked of the commission bread and they have given us a stone. We asked of them a fish and they have given us a serpent. They have adhered to the letter which killeth and have disregarded the spirit which maketh alive.

If the electoral bill had been carried out in the spirit in which it was conceived, its passage would have been one of the greatest events of our political history, and would have been of potential influence by way of example in the settlement of all future difficulties growing out of our presidential successions.

But the partisanship and ambidexterity which have characterized its administration have made it a mockery and a fraud and the most conspicuous failure in our political history. It was gold that melted in the hand and an apple of Sodom that turned to ashes on the lips. It held out a beautiful promise, but tantalized with a bitter disappointment. Its notorious maladministration is one of the most melancholy illustrations of the domination of that pestilential party spirit whose calamitous results were so earnestly deprecated in the farewell address of the Father of his Country. It is a most lamentable evidence of the declension of public virtue and of the want of moral and intellectual integrity in eminent public men who have been trusted with great political responsibilities, and can but remind the reflecting statesman of the alarming prediction of the honored head of the American bar, (Charles O'Conor :)

> From the despotism in which it begins, every human society passes through a succession of governments, each more liberal than its predecessor, but each in turn decaying from natural causes, until at last, having reached the loosest and most liberal form attainable, a refuge from intolerable evils is found by completing the circuit and returning to that arbitrary rule under which it commenced. Thus it has ever been and ever will be with human governments.

The inquiry is pertinent at this crisis, are we not rapidly completing the circuit and approaching the subversion of our republican institutions?

While there was no disposition on the part of the representatives of the people to toy with anarchy and experiment with revolution, yet they felt it to be their duty to protest against the iniquitous decision of the majority of the commission in terms of unmeasured indignation and with a spirit of resistance commensurate with their appreciation of the great crime which they had committed against the freedom of popular elections. It certainly was not to be expected they would evince an indecent haste by their ready acquiescence in the most stupendous fraud ever perpetrated under a republican form of government in consenting to the inauguration of a President who had not been elected by the people. There are times when there should be a wholesome disturbance of the public repose Where there is a great abuse there should be a great clamor and a tremendous agitation. From the decision of the partisan majority of the electoral commission an appeal is taken with confidence to the great tribunal of public opinion. There has been as yet no defilement of the mind and conscience of the great body of the American people. They will in their own way and in their own good time rectify the great wrong. For that purpose they will adopt no policy born of a temporary impulse, which, like the transient flash of the meteor, leaves the world in deeper gloom, but with considerate step they will march forward with scourge in hand for the purification and renovation of the temples of American liberty.

Political virtue must be equal to political calamity. There is no occasion to despair of the Republic so long as the spirit of liberty remains fresh and warm in the hearts of the people. Spain preceded England in the forms of liberty, but was destitute of its spirit. England had no popular representation until 1264, but in Castile they had it in 1169, and in Aragon in 1133. Let us but preserve the spirit with the forms of liberty and our political redemption is sure, and we shall certainly arrest the dark planet of corruption which is now making a transit over the disk of our free institutions.

The Electoral Commission.

SPEECH OF HON. A. HUMPHREYS,

OF INDIANA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 26, 1877,

On the decisions of the electoral commission under the act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President for the term commencing March 4, 1877.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. "To this complexion it has come at last." Though I have not actively participated in the discussions of questions before the House, I have not been an inattentive witness of its proceedings.

Having been elected a member for the present session, I have thought it more becoming rather to learn wisdom in silence and be a good listener than to obtrude immature instruction on others.

But I cannot withhold an expression of my well-matured dissent from the findings of the electoral commission, a tribunal organized in good faith expressly to impartially examine and consider all questions submitted to it bearing on the subject of counting the electoral vote.

In dealing with the acts of the commission and its perversion of all known methods of deciding without evidence, as well as with the wonderful procedure of that modern invention, returning boards, I must be permitted neither

> To spare the criminal and expose the vice
> Nor to damn the sharper, and not blame the dice.

The conspiracy, inaugurated after the result of the late presidential election was generally known, by the chairman of the national republican committee, to count in and proclaim elected President of the United States a man who, as is well known to every intelligent adult in the land, had neither the popular majority of all the votes cast nor a majority of electoral votes, is now about being crowned with success.

In the congressional district I have the honor to represent we have certain antiquated notions of honesty, and among these primitive, but it now appears visionary and crude vagaries, we have indulged in the folly of believing that elections elect and that votes honestly and legally cast count.

And in the lessons of wisdom taught us by the electoral commission we learn the supreme vanity of our old-fashioned ideas of political integrity and the purity of the ballot-box.

In this centennial year of grace we take a new departure.

Under the dissolving, purifying sleight of hand of State canvassing boards, supplemented by the equally marvelous feat of deciding without proof by the electoral tribunal, we are indoctrinated in the fine art of legalizing fraud, canonizing villainy, invading the sanctity of the ballot-box, rendering respectable political burglary, and investing with honor the perpetrators of political theft instead of consigning them, as preferred candidates, to penitentiaries.

During the last presidential canvass in the West we were reminded by a distinguished patriot and an Ex-United States Senator, Hon. Carl Schurz, of the profound debt of gratitude due to this Administration for demonstrating the capacity of the republican party to develop the most corrupt civil service ever known and the most multiform rottenness to which party servility and party debauchery could descend.

This debt of gratitude is now greatly augmented by the illustrated lessons of State canvassing boards, rendered operative by the sanctifying power of electoral commissions.

We are further taught that admitted tampering with ballot-boxes, canceling eight thousand majority of votes actually cast for one set of electors and converting such majority into a majority of near four thousand for another set, by returning board jugglery, is sound, orthodox, political ethics.

Our hitherto unenlightened ignorance is now illuminated by the lesson, that in the case of Louisiana not even the forms of law need be observed, provided only the seal of State be affixed by the governor to the handiwork of an infamous canvassing board; that there is no curative virtue in the Constitution, no corrective power vested in Congress, no balm in our political Gilead to nullify acknowledged fraud, and no physician of sufficient skill to undo the effect of larceny of ballots; and in the case of Florida, that the attempt to give validity to the honest vote of the State by its executive, legislative, and judiciary departments is of no avail, for the plain reason that glaring and proved fraud is santified if it only be well done and fully consummated.

We also learn that a miscreant, who, to use the words of General Sheridan, is a political trickster and a dishonest man; who turned out of office Union men who had supported the Government and put in their stead rebel soldiers, some of whom had not dropped their gray uniform; a man whose conduct has been as sinuous as the mark left in the dust by the movement of a snake; a person, in fine, who has not one friend who is an honest man—as soon as he becomes a politically useful member of that "thing of beauty and a joy forever," a self-propagating, self-perpetuating returning board, of plenary power, responsible to no one, and amenable to no law human or divine, is suddenly transformed into an angel of light, of immaculate and unquestioned purity, a persecuted saint, and, if we may believe a distinguished gentleman in the north end of the Capitol, the peer of any United States Senator; and I might add, if certain recent exhibitions of senatorial decency be taken into view, there is no great reason to question the compliment.

However other members of this House may feel, I acknowledge myself profoundly impressed by these lessons of instruction, not to say wisdom. They will not be wasted nor lost on barren ground.

And when I return to my benighted constituents and diffuse among them the lessons I have learned; when I impart to them instruction from the abundance of my newly acquired knowledge and instill into them the wisdom, not of the upper world, that abounds in such exubera.ce in a favored portion of the electoral commission; if I shall succeed in even partially convincing them of the justice of the wonderful political ethics developed in this centennial epoch by the evermemorable, venerable, patriotic, and unpartisan, the immortal eight of the aforesaid tribunal, it will certainly be conceded that my varied congressional labors, my improved experience in the redeeming virtue of returning boards, and my endeavor to draw inspiration from a national tribunal, which decides grave questions without any evidence, will not have been in vain.

When we were told by a leading advocate of the electoral bill, and now a member of the commission, that there was to be no more partisan, no more friend, no more opponent, no more enemy, but the solemn judgment of the judge; when we were advised by another republican defender of the same bill, and now also a member of the electoral tribunal, that they, the supreme judges, will not consent by a party division to have themselves or their court go down in history as incapable of the judicial function in the presence of the disturbing elements of partisan desire for power in regard to the greatest cause ever brought into judgment, and when two other modest gentlemen of sensitively tender conscience, at present members of the national returning board—one of the House, one of the Senate—opponents of the electoral bill, informed us that their opposition to said bill arose from the fact that its plain provisions not only permitted but required the admission in evidence of all facts in any way bearing on the subject of ascertaining the full truth, in the receptive simplicity of innocence we betrayed a credulity which, while it did honor to genuine manhood, did not reflect the true inwardness of this world's wisdom—the total depravity, as illustrated by the ever-memorable eight.

If the members of the national returning board had done what their oaths expressly required of them, impartially examine and consider all questions submitted to them, the procedure, it seems, would have involved a criminal aliunde, the admission of testimony outside of the returns of perjured canvassing boards, certified by equally perjured governors, whereas all the immortal eight had to do in the plenitude of their wisdom was to enact the farce of doing what every congressional member of the commission had denied to the President of the Senate the power to do, perform the solemn mockery, the ludicrous pageantry, of adding up, recording, and sanctifying the beautiful display of legerdemain of Wells and his pantomime associates.

To what imaginable greater depth of stultifying infamy could the eight possibly descend?

It would seem the refinement of absurdity distilled through the electoral commission teaches us that impartially to examine and consider simply means that no proof whatever, which alone would enable them to execute their sworn duty, was admissible.

I for one am duly grateful for this dispensation of legal and unpartisan lore.

We are further condescendingly advised by a conscienceless member of the commission, upon whose every lineament are written in retributive justice evidences of nature's violated physical and moral laws, that although the Constitution in terms specifically designates what persons are ineligible as electors, nevertheless if such persons should act as electors notwithstanding their constitutional disability their votes are valid if sanctified by a returning board, accompanied by the seal of State.

A mere technical infraction of the Constitution, and such monstrous mockery of decency, such insult to common sense, are commended to our grateful acceptance.

Let us be duly grateful and bow in humble reverence at this fountain of wisdom.

Under the enlightened, christianizing guidance of such political missionaries the republican party is fast developing a capacity for refined rascality that is discouraging, an indifference to the ordinary forms of common decency well calculated to reflect dishonor on our reputed lowly origin.

We learn to our amazement, by an innocent look, outside, that throwing out by the Wells board over ten thousand votes actually cast and legally in the ballot-box, in order to equalize, as it were, a deficiency in the republican vote, was a merely innocent display of political pleasantry, reflecting the shrewdness of Wells and his associate patriots, under the inspiring influence of that model of temperance and virtue, Zachariah; but that to correct these harmless irregularities would do violence to aliunde, which being interpreted means Hayes.

We are further apprised by the decision of the unpartisan eight that aliunde is a bar to correcting the criminal and admitted fraud of adding respectively 1,364, 1,362, 1,334, 1,364, and 298 votes, not cast, in one county of Louisiana to the votes of five Hayes or aliunde electors, on the patriotic pretense that these votes might, could, would, or should have been polled, but through inadvertence of the voters were not deposited.

This procedure, we must presume, is merely an evidence of the rare executive ability and Roman firmness of the unhung vassal, Wells.

But, presto, change! In the last scene of a four-act farce we are treated to a slight variation, to illustrate the power in reserve possessed by the versatile eight of the national canvassing board, in comparison with whose exploits the performances of the novice, Wells, pale into insignificance.

Our venerable eight are not unskilled in the game of the little joker. Now you see it and then again you don't.

And whereas, in the case of Louisiana and Florida, no aliunde testimony is admissible, outside of the well ordered columns of figures arranged by Wells and Stearns, when we come to Oregon, business requires that we must advance behind the certificate of the governor just enough to count in one ineligible elector, illustrate the sublimity of the ridiculous, consummate a foregone determination, and pronounce elected President, Returning Board Hayes.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, and in all seriousness, if the American people are prepared, without a solemn protest, to see their dearest rights thus trifled with and made the sport of partisan perjured demagogues, if they will tamely submit to such degradation and dishonor, without exhausting every honorable, peaceable, legal means of redress; if by servile acquiescence in procedures, which their authors know to be in violation of every principle of justice and of right; if in imitation of ancient Rome in her degeneracy, we are ready to witness the most exalted office in the gift of a free people, auctioneered off to the highest bidder, then indeed have we as a people seen our last centennial; then truly have we lived too long already as a government, in the imagined possession of freedom, in name only, and not in reality.

If a victory thus secured by the dominant party, rendered insolent and reckless by long possession of power and plunder; if a temporary triumph thus tainted does not prove Dead Sea fruit, and turn to ashes ere enjoyed; if it shall not eventuate not only in the annihilation of the republican party but of civil liberty, and consign our boasted institutions as a by-word and a mockery to the monarchies of the Old World, our rescue from such sad fate cannot be credited to the display of the lofty patriotism illustrated by our magnanimous national canvassing commission.

We have survived a civil war; whether we can survive some of its legitimate results, the moral and political debauchery of this last crowning act of infamy of the republican party, remains to be seen.

I do not assume to dictate the course of others, but for myself I would be recreant to my sense of duty not boldly to proclaim that, in view of the shameless, partisan, indefensible ruling out by the ever-memorable eight of all evidence the admission of which could alone enable them intelligently to execute even in form their high trust—to fulfill their judicial oaths—I am fully justified, in good faith, in withholding from the finding of the tribunal all decent respect, all moral support. On the contrary I desire to place on record an expression of my deep sense of humiliation at this further evidence, if more were wanting, of the growing insensibility to political decency, to the requirements of common honesty, and to the demands of even-handed justice, and of the absence of all political conscience in the reckless leaders of the reigning dynasty, and the diffusion of this same moral blindness among the servile, unreasoning masses, who stupidly follow wherever public plunderers dare to lead.

While the intelligent voter of all parties, in the true spirit of law-abiding citizens, may give the tortuous decision of the execrated national returning board a grudging, vengeful, imbittered legal acquiescence, every sentiment of honor, every impulse of true manhood, every inspiration of genuine patriotism, impel all self-respecting men everywhere to denounce with scorn and contempt the authors of its infamous, foregone conclusion, and to remand them for rehearing to the court of final appeal and of irreversible jurisdiction, the people, the true sovereigns.

And, Mr. Speaker, before closing my remarks I would give utterance to the hope, may I not say my belief, that the better elements of the republican party, while in the excitement of the hour they may naturally indulge in felicitating themselves on this questionable and ephemeral success, when the prejudices and the passions of the occasion shall subside, and reason hold sway and resume supremacy, will despise and execrate the falsifiers of their oaths who have proved themselves indifferent to the ordinary requirements of political honesty and to the common obligations of moral decency.

And while under the thinly disguised forms of law they may be disposed to accept for a time the fruits of treason, they will visit with ignominy and retirement to private life the authors of the badly tainted instruments of victory.

Electoral Vote of Oregon.

SPEECH OF HON. ANDREW R. BOONE,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1877,

On the decision of the electoral commission in the case of Oregon.

Mr. BOONE. Mr. Speaker, I voted for the bill creating the commission to count the electoral vote for President and Vice-President. I did so after the most careful consideration and the maturest reflection I was capable of bringing to my aid. I did so from the deepest convictions of duty to my country and from the purest motives of patriotism. I voted for the bill in good faith, believing it to be in the interest of peace and public tranquillity. I voted for it believing it to be one, if not the only, means of averting the calamity of a cruel and devastating war. I voted for it believing that the tribunal for the creation of which it provided would be composed of men who, from their exalted characters, could afford to and would rise above the demands of party or the arts of the mere politician or the low cunning of the demagogue; men who could sacrifice all personal preferences and look alone to the law they were to administer and the country they were to serve.

I voted for this bill believing that it would bring peace and quietude to an anxious and disturbed country. I did so believing that under it the voters of this country would secure that justice which I believed would be denied them without it. I had no scruples about the constitutionality of the bill, nor did I doubt its justice and fairness. I do not agree with gentlemen who assert that the bill was a snare into which we were unwittingly led, a cunningly devised scheme laid to entrap us. I believed then and believe now that it was fair, just, and equitable. I believed then and believe now that a fair, legal interpretation of it would have secured the peaceful inauguration of Mr. Tilden as President of the United States. The fault, sir, is not in the bill but in the partisan and illegal interpretation of its provisions. The wrong lies in the fact that a majority of the commission, some of whom are the highest legal functionaries in the land, could not, or did not, dare to rise above the clamor of party demands, but lent themselves as willing tools to effectuate the plans of that party whose only hope of success was in the perpetration of the most nefarious and damning fraud ever attempted to be thrust upon an unsuspecting and confiding people. Hence, I say that it is in the tribunal, and not the law, that I have been deceived.

Sir, both parties have been deceived in this commission. The democratic party believed it would, under this bill, secure the inauguration of Mr. Tilden, who was evidently the choice of the American people, for the office of President, and who had received at the polls a large majority of the popular vote of the country. The republican party believed the same thing, as was shown by the fact that a large number of them voted against the bill; some of them declaring that to enact this law would be throwing away the victory of which they felt certain and would result in the election of the democratic candidate. Thus, sir, have both parties been deceived; and why? Simply because everybody felt that a fair and impartial count of the electoral vote would result in the inauguration of Mr. Tilden and it was believed by both parties that such a count would be secured before such a tribunal as this bill created.

But, sir, instead of the high expectations of the country having been met by this august commission, it has by a majority vote most shamefully abandoned the just rights of the people and shown a truckling subserviency to the most shameless and audacious demands of party. Sir, I regard this as the darkest day in American history; not only because the American people have been cheated and defrauded out of their choice of a Chief Magistrate as expressed at the ballot-box, but more especially because the highest judicial officers in the land have lent their aid and mighty influence in carrying out the most stupendous conspiracy and fraud that ever characterized the history of any country. Is it possible that we have come to this, that an infamous returning board, composed of the bitterest and most unscrupulous partisans, in utter disregard of law, justice, and decency, can by a most foul and corrupt conspiracy defeat the will of an overwhelming majority of the voters of this country? And are we, as the representatives of the American people, to be told that we must witness all this and see this fraud sanctified and sit here with our arms folded, impotent and powerless, and strike no blow for the vestiges of freedom which remain to us? For one, Mr. Speaker, I say, No, never!

I said, sir, I voted for this bill in good faith. I was willing to take whatever responsibility attached to that vote. I was willing to abide the fair and legitimate results of that law, and to accept in good faith whatever decision should be fairly rendered under it, even if that decision should result in the inauguration of a man to the high office of President of the United States who had not been elected thereto by the people.

To this view and this determination I have steadily adhered. I have seen the vote of Florida cast for men who did not receive a majority of the votes of that State. I have seen this high commission strangle and hush into silence the voice of poor, unfortunate, downtrodden Louisiana, and her vote cast for the candidates of the republican party, when every man who is at all acquainted with the facts knows that a majority of the voters of that State cast their votes for the candidates of the democratic party. I have seen law, justice, equity, good conscience, and fair dealing all disregarded and trodden under foot by a majority of this commission. And yet, sir, I have felt that it was my duty to stand by the law I helped to create and abide by the decision of the commission, notwithstanding I believed it had outraged the spirit and intent of the law. Still, sir, I did not like to lose my confidence in the high officials who composed the commission.

But, Mr. Speaker, a new phase of this question is presented now by the action of the commission in reference to the vote of Oregon. Having decided in the Louisiana case that they could not go behind the certificate of the returning board, infamous and corrupt as it was charged and proven to be, with strange facility and most unaccountable readiness, they decide in effect to reverse their decision in the Louisiana case, and go behind the certificate of the Governor of Oregon and receive evidence touching the eligibility of one of the electors of that State, all of which in my judgment means that, right or wrong, Hayes must be "counted in."

Sir, the question now presented to us is, do the dictates of honor or patriotism require us longer to respect the decisions of this commission or consent to be longer bound by them? For one, sir, with a full consciousness of the responsibility which attaches to my course, I unhesitatingly say that I feel no such obligation resting upon my conscience. And I believe it to be the duty of this House now to take a strong and decided position on the side of justice and right and to stand firmly by the rights of the people in this contest between them and this high-handed and shameless attempt to effectuate the most stupendous conspiracy and fraud that ever threatened the liberties of a free people, and to interpose every possible obstacle to the consummation of this high crime against the rights and liberties of the people.

Sir, the people generally rejoiced when the bill creating this commission was passed, because they felt that we had reached a legal and peaceful solution of the difficulties which threatened the peace of the country. They, too, had confidence in the wisdom, integrity, and fairness of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States. They had confidence to believe that a fair and legal count of the electoral vote would be obtained, and they were willing to abide the result whatever it might be, whether it resulted in the inauguration of the man of their choice or not; and if the action of this commission had been characterized by that degree of judicial fairness and impartiality which has been the pride and glory of our judiciary in days gone by, they would have accepted the results cheerfully and without complaint.

But, sir, when the country sees that a majority of this high commission have not been able to free themselves from the miserable party shackles that manacle the actions of the smallest ward politicians, and have prostituted their high powers to the base and ignoble purposes of a reckless and desperate political organization, to further whose designs they have forgotten, or purposely and willfully ignored, the high duties they were called upon to perform, and have absolutely stultified themselves, is it any wonder that a storm of indignation is gathering everywhere, which in its resistless course will consign the names of the immortal eight to eternal infamy and disgrace.

Mr. Speaker, I do not counsel or advise resistance to the laws of the land, nor do I advocate forcible opposition to the decisions of this commission, as much as I despise the miserable fraud they are attempting to justify and uphold. My voice, humble as it is, has always been and is now for peace, unity, and concord. I have cherished the liveliest hopes for the prosperity of our common country and the perpetuity of our cherished institutions. But, sir, I would not restrain the indignation of an outraged and insulted people. They have a right to be heard, and they will be heard, and their voice will consign a majority of this commission to no more honorable graves than shall cover the hideous deformities of the infamous returning board of Louisiana, whose villainies find their counterpart only in the readiness with which this commission has attempted to cover up their fraud and sanctify their rascality, whether willful or otherwise.

The Recent Election in Louisiana.

SPEECH OF HON. JAMES PHELPS,

OF CONNECTICUT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1877,

On the report of the committee to investigate the late election in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, it has been my purpose to refrain from participation in this debate. Words are cheap and so freely used that the daily record of our proceedings overflows with them. Mere congressional declamation is idle and withal expensive to the Government, and speech-making simply to gratify the vanity of the declaimer is both disreputable and unwise. My position as a member of the committee from which the report now before the House has proceeded, and as one of those who earnestly favored the passage of the bill providing for the commission to count and determine the electoral votes of the contested States, perhaps demands a brief expression of my views, lest an unwarranted construction should be put upon my silence.

While the investigation made by this committee of the unsettled and unhappy condition of political affairs in the State of Louisiana was by far the most extended and exhaustive of any, and for that reason the most satisfactory and reliable, it must, from circumstances which have since transpired, be regarded as the most fruitless and unimportant. The passage of the electoral bill immediately after the conclusion of the labors of the committee, by which jurisdiction of the whole question was given to the commission established by that bill, changed the tribunal and transferred the power and the responsibility to a body who have exercised the power and discharged the responsibility in a manner that has confounded the reason and disappointed the just expectations of those by whose votes it was created, and rewarded with undeserved and fraudulent triumph those who desperately struggled to insure its defeat and who professed to oppose it because it authorized inquiry into questions of law and fact lying behind the mere paper certificates of the certifying officers; in other words, authorized an examination for the purpose of ascertaining which candidate was honestly elected.

The surprise of fair-minded men of all shades of political opinion occasioned by the refusal of the commission by a strict party vote and majority to investigate the question of the legal existence of the Louisiana returning board, whose foreheads had been stamped by a republican committee of the last Congress with the Cain-like brand of infamy for their fraudulent conduct in a former election, which was still more palpable and flagrant in the late canvass, was only equaled by their amazement that the Warwick of the commission could deliberately and with an air of seeming impartiality give his vote to inquire into the disputed eligibility of a republican elector in Florida which was challenged on clearly untenable grounds, and refuse the same inquiry with reference to two republican electors in Louisiana whose ineligibility confessedly could have been established beyond all question. Because this accidental member is a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States only shows that men occupying that high position have not always the courage or the integrity, when the Presidency depends on their action, to divest themselves of that miserable partisan bias which is only expected from the mere politician.

It is always an ungracious and ill-mannered act to criticise as corrupt or unfair the decision of a respectable judicial tribunal for its determination of a legitimate question, but this proves to have been a mere partisan tribunal, influenced only by partisan considerations, and deciding by party feeling every important question presented for its decision. The theory or impression that judges of the highest court in the land will always act as becomes judges, and never as partisans, is thoroughly exploded by this experiment, and the humiliating spectacle is presented to the world, and will be recorded to our shame in history, of a President of the United States elected through the partisan decision of sworn judges, without investigation and inquiry, who knew they were appointed for the purpose of investigation and that they were trusted by their political opponents for their judicial character and supposed freedom from improper political bias, and who have rewarded the confidence reposed in them by stinging to the death those who magnanimously gave them their confidence.

And this outrage has been perpetrated on the threshold of the second century of our national existence. If the present standard of political honor and of judicial impartiality and purity is to be adhered to, it will require no prophetic vision to discern how far down the course of centuries we can continue and maintain either a character for respectability or an existence as a Republic. The deadly rock of party spirit is now full in sight and the ship of state is drifting toward it with a rapidity which is appalling; and unless the unseen hand which beneficently guided our fathers shall give the people a worthy and trusted leader, and direct them by another pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night through the dangers which surround them, there is, indeed, just reason for fear that the ark of liberty which contains all that is dear to the hopes of the American people will soon be broken upon it. Why are manhood, integrity, public virtue, silenced by its clamor? Why is reason clouded, judgment darkened, and conscience stifled by it? The answer is found in lust of power and place which strengthens by long possession and which by the constant repetition of the means now resorted to may perpetuate itself indefinitely; and that startling purpose explains the monstrous wrong which has been perpetrated by the commission. A party which can accept a victory over the people thus achieved will, if there remain any traces of political virtue in the masses, find that a triumph won by betrayal, treachery, and dishonor has been dearly purchased, and that it will in the end prove more disastrous than honorable defeat. Even those who profit by it while they cling to the emoluments enjoyed through it will despise the instruments by which it has been so basely acquired.

The question of the legal organization and power of the Louisiana returning board was in the nature of a question of jurisdiction, always proper to be raised in the preliminary stage of an inquiry, and when so raised always entertained. It involved the question whether the votes of that State had in law been canvassed, and therefore whether they were entitled to be counted for either candidate. If not legally canvassed, they could not be legally counted, and they could not have been legally canvassed if there was no lawfully constituted authority to do it. The refusal to make that inquiry was an arbitrary violation of all precedent and an unjustifiable exercise of partisan power. Whatever might have been the decision of the commission with regard to inquiring into fraud, it was never for a moment conceived to be possible that they would refuse to consider a vital jurisdictional question which directly underlay the case of the State of Louisiana and on the determination of which the votes of that State and the Presidency itself depended. If the most sincere confidence had not been undoubtingly entertained by the democrats in the committee which reported the bill and in the House, it would never have received the support of a member of that party. This was perfectly understood by every republican in Congress, and when they take advantage of that just and reasonable confidence they are guilty of a moral fraud and of the violation of every principle of equity and good faith. It is known of all men that their refusal to consider that question was because a candid consideration of it would inevitably result in the rejection of the votes of that State and in the election of the democratic candidate. If they could have considered it with safety to the interests of the party to which a majority of them belong, a show of fairness would have led them to pursue that course; and their judgment with respect to that vital question is grossly unwarranted and indefensible and deeply tainted with the essential elements of official malfeasance. Such a tree can bear nothing but corrupt fruit, which should blister the tongue and turn to ashes on the lips of those who take it.

If there are any members of the commission who are chargeable above their associates with duplicity and dishonorable conduct, they are, in my judgment, those who were members of the committee which reported the bill and were subsequently, mainly by democratic votes, appointed to places on the commission, and who then treacherously voted to exclude all inquiry in the case of Louisiana. They knew the bill was passed and themselves appointed by those who expected such inquiry, and their acceptance of the high trust coupled with their subsequent conduct was an act of the grossest perfidy. They knew theState of Louisiana was the pivotal point in the great controversy. They knew the returning board was by the constitution of the State expressly prohibited the exercise of judicial power. The knew the fatal defect in the existing organization of the board. They knew their unparalleled infamy, and yet by the fatal vote of 8 to 7 they closed and barred the door against all inquiry.

That confidence is commendable which in a matter of great public concern generously trusts a political opponent, but when it has been once deliberately and basely violated it can never be re-established.

The authors of such unfairness perhaps deserve commiseration more than scorn, and may live to learn that they have lost more in the respect of their fellow-men than they have gained in partisan or personal advantage; and in the remarks I submitted to the House in support of the electoral bill, I wish to withdraw only the commendation I bestowed upon those gentlemen before they had betrayed my confidence.

At the risk of a seeming irrelevancy I desire, now the work of the commission is finished, to say an additional word concerning the merits of that bill. In the interest of peace and in an honest confidence in mankind I voted for it. It was right in principle because it was necessary to insure peace, and it was better for the quiet of the country that the wrong we have witnessed should have been committed under the forms of law than in defiance of all law. Without this bill it was certain to have been done in a manner much more objectionable.

Having voted for it, I have considered myself in honor bound, notwithstanding the villainy which has been perpetrated under it, to abstain from any attempt to defeat it by intentional delay in its execution. Bad as is the fraudulent object accomplished by it, it is better than anarchy and continued distress. The business interests of the country are struggling through the fourth year of a disastrous financial crisis, in the course of which thousands have gone down in bankruptcy, and a similar condition is impending over many others unless commercial and industrial prosperity, which would be fatally delayed by political disturbance, can be speedily re-established. The demands of a suffering people are more sacred than the claims of party and should receive the first attention.

I gave no halting or reluctant support to the measure and feel no regret, but only disappointment, for having done so. For the fraud and wrong committed under it, I am absolved from all responsibility. I feel the injury most keenly, but one wrong does not justify another or fraud excuse violence and disorder. The hands of the democratic party are clean from this great iniquity and should be kept unstained. Since the democratic friends of the bill are grievously disappointed in the result accomplished through it, it seems a pleasant thing to those of their political associates who opposed its enactment to taunt its friends with the responsibility for that result. If it had been successful, as it ought to have been, in securing justice and confirming the action and votes of nearly a quarter of a million majority of the freemen of the country, it would have been accepted as a model instrument of political deliverance and its friends as the authors and advocates of the wisest and most successful measure of conciliation ever incorporated in the legislation of any nation. Now there are none so poor as to do it reverence save those who have undeservedly and unexpectedly profited by it. The mother who bore it is ready to disown it and most of the sponsers at its baptism wish it had never been born.

To claim that it is constitutional is, in my judgment, to claim too much. I gave it my support believing it to have been otherwise, in that it contained a partial delegation by Congress, in whom the power is alone vested, to a body not of its own members, of the right to participate in the counting of some of the votes and in the determination of the result. Differing from many others, I also regard it as clearly in the nature of a compromise, and not for that reason to be condemned. If unconstitutional, it is fully justified by necessity. The peace and life of the country were in peril, and its safety and perhaps existence demanded the violation. Without it a greater and grosser violation would have been committed, because the party in power were determined to inaugurate their candidate and had in their possession the means to do it, and were not scrupulous of their use. The electoral bill was therefore not only necessary, but the lesser evil. The surgeon amputates a limb to save the body, or takes the mother's life to bring into being a living child. It was cowardly to defend the bill on the ground that it was not a compromise and was strictly constitutional. Every national crisis has been bridged by a compromise, and every such compromise has contained a friendly stab at the Constitution. The Missouri compromise, the emancipation proclamation, and the congressional and judicial legal-tender action are illustrious examples of a violated Constitution; and if that venerated parchment had the power to act and speak, it would proudly point to its scarred body and say, "These are the wounds I received through the kindness of those who smote me friendly."

Thank God, the Constitution possesses such saving vitality as to be able to endure such injuries and be the stronger for their infliction when the peace of the country and the welfare of the people are to be secured by them.

So much of the election laws of the State of Louisiana as are material to show the powers and the duties of the commissioners of election, the supervisors of registration, and the canvassing officers, commonly known as the returning board, are found in the statutes of that State in sections 2, 3, 26, and 43 of the act of 1872, and are as follows, namely:

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, &c., That five persons, to be elected by the senate from all political parties, shall be the returning officers for all elections in the State, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum, and have power to make the returns of all elections. In case of any vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise, by either of the board, then the vacancy shall be filled by the residue of the board of returning officers. The returning officers shall, after each election, before entering upon their duties, take and subscribe to the following oath before a judge of the supreme or any district court:

"I, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully and diligently perform the duties of a returning officer as prescribed by law; that I will carefully and honestly canvass and compile the statements of the votes, and make a true and correct return of the election: so help me God."

Within ten days after the closing of the election, said returning officers shall meet in New Orleans to canvass and compile the statements of votes made by the commissioners of election, and make returns of the election to the secretary of state. They shall continue in session until such returns have been compiled. The presiding officer shall at such meeting open, in the presence of the said returning officers, the statement of the commissioners of election, and the said returning officers shall, from said statements, canvass and compile the returns of the election in duplicate. One copy of such returns they shall file in the office of the secretary of state, and of one copy they shall make public proclamation by printing in the official journal and such other newspapers as they may deem proper, declaring the names of all persons and officers voted for, the number of votes for each person, and the names of the persons who have been duly and lawfully elected. The returns of the elections thus made and promulgated shall be prima facie evidence in all courts of justice and before all civil officers until set aside after a contest according to law of the right of any person named therein to hold and exercise the office to which he shall by such return be declared elected. The governor shall, within thirty days thereafter, issue commissions to all officers thus declared elected who are required by law to be commissioned.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, &c., That in such canvass and compilation, the returning officers shall observe the following order: They shall compile, first, the statements from all polls or voting-places at which there shall have been a fair, free, and peaceable registration and election. Whenever, from any poll or voting-place, there shall be received the statement of any supervisor of registration or commissioner of election, in form as required by section 26 of this act, on affidavit of three or more citizens, of any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, which prevented, or tended to prevent, a fair, free, and peaceable vote of all qualified electors entitled to vote at such poll or voting-place, such returning officers shall not canvass, count, or compile the statements of votes from such poll or voting-place until the statements from all other polls or voting-places shall have been canvassed and compiled. The returning officers shall then proceed to investigate the statements of riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences at any such poll or voting-place; and if from the evidence of such statement they shall be convinced that such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influence did not materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting-place, or did not prevent a sufficient number of qualified voters thereat from registering or voting to materially change the result of the election, then, and not otherwise, said returning officers shall canvass and compile the vote of such poll or voting-place with those previously canvassed and compiled; but if said returning officers shall not be fully satisfied thereof, it shall be their duty to examine further testimony in regard thereto, and to this end they shall have power to send for persons and papers. If after such examination the said returning officers shall be convinced that said riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting-place, or did prevent a sufficient number of the qualified electors thereat from registering and voting to materially change the result of the election, then the said returning officers shall not canvass or compile the statement of the votes of such poll or voting-place, but shall exclude it from their returns: Provided, That any person interested in said election by reason of being a candidate for office shall be allowed a hearing before said returning officers upon making application within the time allowed for the forwarding of the returns of said election.

SEC. 26. Be it further enacted, &c., That in any parish, precinct, ward, city, or town in which, during the time of registration or revision of registration, or on any day of election, there shall be any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, at any place within said parish, or at or near any poll or voting-place, or place of registration or revision of registration, which riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences shall prevent, or tend to prevent, a fair, free, peaceable, and full vote of all the qualified electors of said parish, precinct, ward, city, or town, it shall be the duty of the commissioners of election, if such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences occur on the day of election, or of the supervisors of registration of the parish, if they occur during the time of registration or revision of registration, to make, in duplicate and under oath, a clear and full statement of all the facts relating thereto, and of the effect produced by such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences in preventing a fair, free, peaceable, and full registration or election, and of the number of qualified electors deterred by such riots, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences; from registering or voting which statement shall also be corroborated under oath by three respectable citizens, qualified electors of the parish. When such statement is made by a commissioner of election or a supervisor of registration, he shall forward it in duplicate to the supervisor of registration of the parish, if in the city of New Orleans to the secretary of state, one copy of which, if made to the supervisor of registration, shall be forwarded by him to the returning officers provided for in section two of this act, when he makes the returns of election in his parish. His copy of said statement shall be so annexed to his returns of elections by paste, wax, or some adhesive substance that the same can be kept together, and the other copy the supervisor of registration shall deliver to the clerk of the court of his parish, for the use of the district attorney.

SEC. 43. Be it further enacted, &c., That immediately upon the close of the polls on the day of election, the commissioners of the election at each poll or voting-place shall proceed to count the votes, as provided in section 13 of this act, and after they shall have so counted the votes and made a list of the names of all the persons voted for, and the offices for which they were voted for, and the number of votes received by each, the number of ballots contained in the box and the number rejected, and the reasons therefor, duplicates of such lists shall be made out, signed, and sworn to by the commissioners of election at each poll, and such duplicate lists shall be delivered, one to the supervisor of registration of the parish and one to the clerk of the district court of the parish, and in the parish of Orleans to the secretary of state, by one or all of said commissioners in person, within twenty-four hours after the closing of the polls.

It shall be the duty of the supervisors of registration, within twenty-four hours after the receipt of all the returns for the different polling-places, to consolidate such returns, to be certified as correct by the clerk of the district court, and forward the consolidated returns with the originals received by him to the returning officers provided for in section 2 of this act, the said report and returns to be inclosed in an envelope of strong paper or cloth, securely sealed, and forwarded by mail. He shall forward a copy of any statement as to violence or disturbance, bribery or corruption, or other offenses specified in section 26 of this act, if any there be, together with all memoranda and tally-lists used in making the count and statement of the votes.

In addition to the foregoing, the law provides that the governor shall appoint a State supervisor, by whom a local supervisor for each parish shall be appointed, whose duty it shall be to register the names of all persons entitled to vote, and issue certificates of registration to each one of them, to establish and give public notice of all polling-places, and appoint three commissioners of election to attend and take charge of the election at each poll—one of whom shall be of different politics from the other two—who shall conduct the election and make returns to the parish supervisor in the mode prescribed by law.

I shall endeavor very briefly to show how the provisions of the law were complied with and what difficult results were corruptly and ingeniously produced.

Of the character of the returning board I have already spoken in a general way; and that it may appear that I have not misrepresented them I present the corroboration of distinguished republicans whose title to credibility, opportunity for information, and absence of unfriendly partisan prejudice will be readily recognized.

A committee of the last Congress—composed in part of GEORGE F. HOAR, one of the high commission; WILLIAM A. WHEELER, the republican candidate for Vice-President declared elected through the returning board and the commission; and WILLIAM P. FRYE, another leading member of that party—reported with reference to their official conduct as follows:

> Without now referring to other instances, we are constrained to declare that the action of the returning board, on the whole, was arbitrary, unjust, and, in our opinion, illegal; and that this arbitrary, unjust, and illegal action alone prevented the return by the board of a majority of conservative members of the lower house

General Sheridan, in an official report as commander of that military department after the war, said of the chairman of the board:

> Wells's conduct as governor has been notoriously corrupt. He had illegally appointed a board of levee commissioners, who were authorized to hold over by an act of the Legislature, and a conflict of authority ensued, and in the mean time the Mississippi overflowed and great damage was done to property. There was an appropriation of $4,000,000 made by the Legislature for repairs of the levees, and Wells wanted to finger some of this money.

Again, in a letter to the Secretary of War:

> After the adjournment of the Legislature the governor of the State appointed a board of his own in violation of this act, and made the acknowledgment in person that his object was to disburse the money in the interest of his own party by securing for it the vote of the employés at the time of the election. The board continued in office, but the Legislature refused to turn over to the governor's board, and each side appealed to me to sustain it, which I would not do. The question must then have gone to the courts, which, according to the governor's judgment when he was appealing to me to be sustained, would require one year for decision. Meantime the State was overflowed. The levee boards were tied up by political chicanery, and nothing was done to relieve the poor people, now fed by the charity of the Government and charitable associations of the North. I say now, unequivocally, that Governor Wells is a political trickster and a dishonest man. I have seen him myself, when I first came to this command, turn out all of the Union men who had supported the Government, and put in their stead rebel soldiers, some of whom had not yet dropped their gray uniform. I have seen him again, during the July riot of 1866, skulk away when I could not find him to give him a guard, instead of coming out as a manly representative of the State and joining those who were preserving the peace. I have watched him since, and his conduct has been sinuous as the mark left in the dust by the movement of a snake. I say again that he is dishonest, and dishonesty is more than must be expected of me.

Again, in a communication to General Grant:

> He has embarrassed me very much since I came into command by his subterfuge and political chicanery. This necessary act will be approved by every class and shade of political opinion here. HE HAS NOT ONE FRIEND WHO IS AN HONEST MAN.

It should not be forgotten that at the time of the former congressional report the board consisted of the same individuals as now, and while the chairman may have been more notorious, he was not less honest than his associates; and these are the men who make a President by fraud and perjury!

The investigations of the committee incontestably establish the fact that a majority of 7,639 votes was cast for the democratic electors, and that the majority actually returned was 6,405. The difference between those sums is the majority cast at fourteen democratic polls and withheld by the parish supervisors for alleged informality and other reasons. The law gives them no such authority for any reason, and no such power for any purpose; but requires them to return all the polls to the returning board. Every supervisor in the State was a republican, and many of them exercised authority illegally because they were not residents of the parishes in which they assumed to perform the functions of their pretended offices. The constitution of the State expressly requires them to be residents, and without that qualification they were clearly ineligible. Many of them were active partisans of very disreputable character, sent out from the city of New Orleans, and several of them under indictment for infamous crimes.

The democratic majority of 7,639 was by the skillful and practiced manipulations of the experienced returning board in secret session changed to a republican majority of 3,437. To accomplish this feat of political legerdemain they rejected sixty-nine polls, of which sixty-eight were democratic, and the remaining one was only lost to the republicans because it happened to be located in a parish which was thrown out entire, and no ingenuity of discrimination could by any possibility save it.

These polls were all excluded under section 26, and in no instance were the provisions of that section complied with.

The general charge of intimidation is made against the democrats, but almost the only evidence offered in support of it consisted of ex parte affidavits of negroes, written by republican clerks and officials in the New Orleans custom-house, which were entitled to no credit, were in many instances shown to be forged and false, and were generally contradicted and disproved. The claim that there was any considerable intimidation by democrats in the last election in Louisiana is a bald and wicked perversion of the truth. They had been deprived of success in the two previous elections, and perhaps with too much reason, on account of violence and terror committed and produced by them in some localities, and they were now especially counseled and careful to avoid all appearance of disturbance, that a too-willing returning board should have no possible pretext for again excluding their votes.

The balance of intimidation was very largely on the other side. Many thousands of the colored voters had become disgusted with the broken promises and maladministration of the republicans. Their school funds had been stolen, their Freedman's Bank robbed, their people plundered of their substance by tax-gatherers and other official vampires, till industry had become paralyzed and property nearly worthless. Even the poor African had been forced to see that republican administration was corrupt and wasteful and destructive, and he had determined to give the democratic party a trial and look to it for deliverance from the wrongs which he endured. They organized in large numbers into democratic clubs and were the most enthusiastic attendants of democratic meetings, and in that way unwittingly drew upon themselves the hostility of those of their own race who still adhered to the republican party.

Not only were democratic colored clubs broken up and forcibly dispersed, but social proscription was brought to bear, marital relations were sacrificed, the rights of baptism and communion denied, colored men corraled in cattle-pens by the hundred, marched to the polls by armed guards, and forced to vote the open republican ticket; churches burned because the pastors refused to preach Louisiana republicanism from their pulpits; personal chastisement inflicted until democracy was abjured by the unfortunate victims, and outrage perpetrated for no other reason than the making of democratic speeches.

It is claimed by the republicans that they were not only intimidated, but defrauded. This charge is unsupported by the slightest proof. It was impossible under the circumstances. The national and State administrations, all the election officials and machinery, constables and deputy United States marshals, almost without number, surrounding the polls, Federal troops quartered wherever requested, and a returning board which could be relied on in every emergency, all in the hands and the willing instruments of the republican party; and the democrats, naked of all authority and powerless as sheep in the shambles. Which party had the opportunity for perpetrating fraud? which was most likely to have perpetrated it? which in fact did perpetrate it? There can be but one answer, and that will neither criminate nor accuse the democratic party.

Honest men never shun investigation; rogues always do. How was this committee met when they arrived in New Orleans and attempted to enter on the discharge of their duties? The members of the returning board were the first witnesses summoned before them. They answered by protest and defiance the inquiries of the committee; denied the authority of Congress to investigate their conduct; intrenched themselves behind bodies of armed police in a barricaded State-house; refused to produce for inspection their original records and papers or to allow to be certified pretended copies of them, and at length preferred imprisonment for contempt in the bastile of the Capitol to a disclosure which would expose their fraud.

A significant telegram from the republican United States marshal at New Orleans addressed to a republican United States Senator from Louisiana then in Washington, under date of December 3, in the following language, "Have seen Wells; board will return Hayes sure; have no fear," shows the criminal design of malignant plotters to overthrow, by the most corrupt and fraudulent means, democratic success fairly won.

The law of the State creating the returning board attempts to confer upon them judicial power, in direct violation of the constitution, which limits the exercise of all such power to the courts of the State. The board, regardless of solemn and earnest protest, persisted in the prohibited exercise of such power, and through its exercise nullified the votes of nearly eleven thousand democratic electors, and thereby with felonious intent stole from the people of the country a President honestly elected; and the commission are about to install a usurper in his place.

The law requires that the returning board shall consist of five members and be composed of both political parties, and that they shall fill all vacancies that occur. In the late canvass it was composed of only four, all republicans, who stubbornly refused every request to fill the vacancy with a democrat. They were determined that no democrat should be allowed to witness their secret transactions and stand between them and the consummation of their purpose to "return Hayes sure."

That the election was substantially free, fair, full, and peaceable, is established by the fact that the largest number of votes ever polled in the State was cast at it, and no pretense is made that every one of the 83,000 citizens who voted the democratic ticket were not qualified electors, duly registered by republican officials, and had the right to cast their votes for the candidates of their choice. Yet nearly eleven thousand of them, by no fault of theirs, were by an unlawful and criminal canvassing board deprived of the highest privilege of American citizenship, and through that unprecedented political crime, defended and taken advantage of by the republican party, the result of a national election is changed and the will of a large majority of the people thwarted.

I trust I have demonstrated that the electoral votes of the State of Louisiana honestly belonged to the democratic candidates, and the question whether, in view of that fact, and of the arbitrary, unreasonable, and contradictory rulings of the commission, the candidate this day declared elected can honorably accept the Presidency is one which appeals alone to his individual conscience now, but which will ultimately be determined by a Judge who is too wise to err and too just to render unrighteous judgment.

The Election in Louisiana.

SPEECH OF HON. JEPTHA D. NEW,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 24, 1877.

Mr. NEW. Mr. Speaker, the democratic candidates for electors for President and Vice-President were elected in the State of Louisiana at the late election. Notwithstanding the action of a majority of the electoral commission, the judgment of fair-minded men throughout the country, of all parties to-day, is, that Mr. Tilden fairly received the vote of that State. Mr. Speaker, this will be the pronounced opinion of posterity, and some of those who are of the electoral commission will live long enough to read from the pages of impartial American history the statement, uncontroverted, that Mr. Hayes was inaugurated and permitted to serve as the Chief Executive of the Union without having received the required number of electoral votes, and in the face of the fact that upon a popular vote he was in the minority nearly a quarter of a million of votes. Those who come after us will wonder how this could be. With the people of other countries it will be a puzzling question whether a fact so anomalous in our history, quietly submitted to by the people, should be received as testimony for or against our system of government.

Mr. Speaker, it is the highest evidence of the intelligence and patriotism of the democratic party, constituting as it does a decisive majority of the voters of the country, that it has been able calmly to meet the emergency. I believe it will abide by the result. Not even the shadow of revolutionary disorder has made its appearance. No turbulence, such as would have been witnessed under such a trial in other countries claiming to have stronger governments, has been heard of among our people. For one, sir, I feel that our constitutional system has never been more severely tested. To no era in our nation's life will history hereafter refer with greater emphasis as illustrative of the cohesive strength of our Union of States than that in which we now live.

Mr. Speaker, I have said that the State of Louisiana cast her vote for Tilden and Hendricks. To the proof of this proposition I invite the attention of the House and the country.

The vote as actually cast for presidential electors is accurately given in the following table:

The supervisors of registration were all republicans, and as a rule were selected from the most unscrupulous and villainous class, yet it being impracticable for them to confer together after the polls were closed and before making their several returns, the aggregate figures returned by them as in the above table give W. A. Seay, the highest democratic elector in this table, a majority of 4,114 over the highest republican elector and 6,405 over the lowest; while the lowest democratic elector's majority is 3,459 over the highest republican elector and 5,750 over the lowest.

The vote as promulgated by the returning board is as follows:

It will be seen that the board threw out polls in nineteen parishes which the supervisors had not disturbed. The supervisors rejected fifteen polls, and the returning board sixty-nine—total eighty-four. In this way the returning board has fabricated a majority of 3,437 for Mr. Hayes. The total democratic vote thus discarded is within a few votes of 13,205, while the loss to the republican vote is but 2,414—a difference of 10,791.

That there was a settled purpose on the part of the republican office-holders, Federal and State, in Louisiana to continue in office without regard to the will of the people, white or colored, is so clear that it will not be doubted by any one who can take the time to examine the testimony. This fixed and fraudulent purpose manifested itself in the taking of the census in 1875 and culminated in the registration of 1876.

As an example of how the true census of 1875 was falsified, we make the following extract from the testimony of Robert Poindexter:

By Mr. JENKS:

Question. What is your first name?
Answer. Robert Poindexter.
Q. Where do you live?
A. I live in the city of New Orleans.
Q. How long have you lived in the city of New Orleans?
A. I have been here about fifteen months.
Q. Where did you live prior to that?
A. In the parish of Assumption.
Q. In the State of Louisiana?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How long have you lived in the State of Louisiana?
A. About thirty years.
Q. By whom was the census taken of Assumption Parish in 1875?
A. It was taken by Poindexter.
Q. By you?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. When you made return of that census, what was done in reference to the number of colored voters in that parish, as to the number you returned as true and the number put down by the officers of the city of New Orleans? State the facts in your own way.
A. I brought my final report to the State registrar's office and made my report, and after I had made my report he told me to come back the next day and straighten up all the business. I went back the next day to straighten up, and he told me his report was a little nicer written than mine was, and asked me to sign that one. I kept a copy of the report I made to him. I did not look over the figures at all until I had signed them. I then looked over the figures and I found he had reduced the number of the population nearly one hundred, but had increased the voting population nearly two hundred and fifty, and he told me that instead of being two hundred and eighty, or something like that, that it was six hundred and some odd majority of colored votes in the parish.
Q. The number of colored votes in the parish was then actually increased in that parish?
A. Yes, sir; increased the amount to over three hundred.

The fraudulent census of 1875 thus procured was intended to be used with a view to political results in 1876. Of this there can be no doubt, for the election of 1876 was the first thereafter. That such was the intention is further shown by the letters addressed by D. J. M. A. Jewett, secretary of republican State central committee, to the supervisor of registration, of which the following is a copy:

HEADQUARTERS REPUBLICAN PARTY OF LOUISIANA,
ROOMS JOINT COMMITTEE ON CANVASSING AND REGISTRATION,
Mechanics' Institute, September 25, 1876.

DEAR SIR: It is well known to this committee from examination of the census of 1875 that the republican vote in your parish is 2,200, and the republican majority is 900.

You are expected to register and vote the full strength of the republican party in your parish.

Your recognition by the next State administration will depend upon your doing your full duty in the premises, and you will not be held to have done your full duty unless the republican registration in your parish reaches 2,200, and the republican vote is at least 2,100.

All local candidates and committees are directed to aid you to the utmost in obtaining the result, and every facility is and will be afforded you, but you must obtain the results called for herein without fail. Once obtained, your recognition will be ample and generous.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. J. M. A. JEWETT,
Secretary.

SUPERVISOR OF REGISTRATION
Parish of Assumption, La.

This is the same parish of which Poindexter has testified. Its colored registration in 1874 was 1,821 and the white 1,665. The republican majority at the general election held in November of that year was only 41 upon a total vote of 3,037. Poindexter swears that the colored majority under the true census of 1875 was about 250, and that the State registrar changed these figures so as to increase the majority to over six hundred. Not content with this, it was in the last canvass regarded necessary, at the headquarters of the republican party of Louisiana, to bring the majority up to 900.

Henry Boudreaux, the supervisor of registration for this parish, testified as follows about the letter which I have just read:

By Mr. JENKS:

Question. Where do you live?
Answer. In Assumption Parish, Louisiana.
Q. Were you supervisor of registration of Assumption Parish during this last fall's election?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Please look at that paper and state whether you ever saw it before; and, if so, from whence did you get it?
A. I saw one similar to this, and I expect this is it; it looks like it.
Q. Did you ever see Mr. Jewett write?
A. No, sir; I never did.
Q. To whom did you give this paper, or the one that looks like it?
A. When I received this letter I consulted several of the prominent citizens in that parish. I went to both democrats and republicans. I first went to Mr. Tete, parish judge, and told him that I had received this letter, and I hardly knew how to act upon it; that I had a notion to resign my position; that I did not intend to return the parish 900 if it was not entitled so to be; if the returns did not show the republicans' 900 majority, I was not going to return them; that I didn't want to act according to these instructions. He asked me to take a copy of this letter, and I told him I had no objection to that. He took a copy of that letter and me the original. After having taken a copy of the letter I showed it to several other parties, among whom was Judge Beattie. I showed him that letter, and told him I hardly knew what to do; that I didn't intend to do anything of that kind, and the judge told me not to do it.

It should not be lost sight of that the period of registration is from the 28th of August to the 28th of October inclusive. These letters were sent out while the supervisors were in the midst of their work of registration, and they were plainly informed that their recognition by the next State administration would depend upon their doing their full duty in the premises. It was predetermined to carry the State, and the supervisors of registration who did their duty in the premises were not to be forgotten.

The registration of 1876, by such appliances as I have described, will be found upon a careful examination of the testimony to be in excess of the real figures and fraudulent to the extent of 20,000 at the very lowest calculation. At least 10,000 of this was in the city of New Orleans. These false figures were a necessary part of the unlawful programme. It was intended to make just the use of them after the election that we find on page 7 of the Sherman report, where it is claimed that by the registration there is a colored majority of 22,314 in the State of Louisiana.

The registration was under the exclusive control of the republicans. The democratic State central committee asked to be allowed one clerk, which was refused. Michael Hahn, the State registrar, was a republican, and a candidate for the Legislature. Prior to the beginning of the period of registration it was known by the republican State central committee in what parishes the democrats were making the largest gains among the colored voters. Men were selected and sent into those parishes who could be relied upon to do their full duty in the premises. For example, M. J. Grady, collector of internal revenue, was made supervisor of registration for Ouachita. Mr. Grady could not afford to lose the lucrative office of collector of internal revenue. F. A. Clover, an ex-roper-in for a snake-show, was appointed supervisor of registration for the parish of East Baton Rouge. He was a total stranger to the people, and was there only while acting as supervisor. He has since received "recognition" by the Packard State government by appointment to a clerkship in the Packard legislature. Other specimens could be given.

The returning board attempts to justify its disfranchisement of over ten thousand democratic voters by saying that at the polls rejected, fear, intimidation, &c., existed to such extent that many republicans refrained from voting altogether, and that a large number of those who voted the democratic ticket did so against their will because of unlawful influences.

Before proceeding further I will speak of a matter which would seem to require notice.

I regret that it should be necessary for me to refer to the unfounded charge that the minority of the committee was not fairly treated in the matter of the examination of witnesses. There is not the slightest ground for such complaint. After the committee was divided into subcommittees and the latter were assigned to the investigation of certain parishes, and had entered upon their work outside of New Orleans, it was sought to have persons who were said to be absent from their own parishes, and in New Orleans, examined before the committee in that city. The motion was placed upon the alleged ground that those persons were afraid to testify in their own parishes.

It was very properly refused. To have granted it would have been an admission by the committee, as true, that which was not. It would have been equivalent to a declaration by the committee that the charges of intimidation were true. This was one of the questions which the committee was investigating. The Senate committee at that time, and for weeks thereafter, was in session at New Orleans, and could hear all such persons, if any there were. Republicans, white and colored, testified with entire freedom before the subcommittee of which I was a member, in the parishes where they resided. All witnesses subpœnaed upon motion of the republican member thereof [Mr. JOYCE] testified, and after our return to New Orleans that gentleman was authorized by the majority to call for examination in New Orleans any of those persons for whom he had elsewhere caused process to be issued and who had been returned as not found. He availed himself of the offer and had witnesses subpœnaed at New Orleans, who were thoroughly examined and cross-examined.

The republican witnesses who appeared before the subcommittee of which I was a member did not manifest the slightest unwillingness to state fully all their complaints, when they had any, against the democrats.
